More tragic, in every sense, than the end of Perkin Warbeck, was that of his fellow prisoner in the Tower, the poor earl of Warwick. He was now in the twenty-ninth year of his age, but his lifelong imprisonment had left him almost a child in manners and understanding. By the king's desire, the earl was not brought to trial before the ordinary judges at Westminster Hall, but at the bar of the House of Lords, to show the respect due to one of royal blood. Nevertheless, the formalities were but few, and the result not a moment doubtful. Arraigned before the lords on the 21st of November, for "conspiring to raise sedition and to destroy the king," he spared his judges all trouble by pleading guilty at once; whereupon he was condemned to death, and beheaded three days afterwards on Tower Hill. "This," says Bacon, "was the end of the line male of the Plantagenets, which had flourished in great royalty and renown from the time of the famous king of England, King Henry II.; howbeit it was a race often dipped in their own blood." They grew in blood, and perished in blood, like many another royal race before and since.

With the execution of Warwick ended the stormful period of Henry's reign. He was henceforth allowed not only undisturbed sway at home, such as few kings before possessed, but even foreign potentates became eager to court his good-will, justly considering him as the foremost representative of the principle of absolute monarchy. This led to a series of matrimonial alliances, which had no little effect upon the course of events for the next two or three generations. Foremost in importance among these alliances was that of Henry's eldest daughter, Margaret, born 1490, to King James IV. of Scotland. Henry was greatly in favour of this alliance, which he hoped would lead to the ultimate union of the crowns of England and Scotland, and, by his instructions, the shrewd bishop of Durham, Fox, went to negotiate the matter with James IV. The latter seemed little inclined at first for the match, but the bait of a large dowry, skilfully held out before his majesty, had the desired effect; and on the 25th of January, 1502, Princess Margaret, now full twelve years of age, was married by proxy to King James. The proxy-wedding was consummated at Edinburgh, in the month of August following; King Henry bringing his little daughter as far as Collyweston on the way, and then consigning her to the attendance of the earl of Northumberland, who, with a great troop of lords and ladies of honour, accompanied the rather too juvenile bride to her husband. The union gave rise to great rejoicings in England, though there were some, even among the royal counsellors, who argued "that if God should take the king's two sons without issue, that then the kingdom of England would fall to the king of Scotland, which might prejudice the monarchy of England." To which, according to Bacon, the king himself replied: "that if that should be, Scotland would be but an accession to England, and not England to Scotland, for that the greater would draw the less." This passed as an oracle, and silenced those that moved the question.

Previously to this Scotch alliance, which so soon after realised the high expectations formed by King Henry, a marriage of lesser importance, yet likewise not without political consequences, had taken place between Prince Arthur, eldest son of the king, and Princess Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. In point of age of the chief parties concerned, the latter marriage was even more unnatural than the former, the Spanish princess being three years older than Prince Arthur, and the latter barely fifteen at the time of the nuptials. These were celebrated with immense pomp, on the 14th of November, 1501, under the chief superintendence of Bishop Fox, who was generally held "not only a grave counsellor for war or peace, but also a good surveyor of works, and a good master of ceremonies, and anything else that was fit for the active part belonging to the service of the court or state of a great king." The bishop's ceremonies were, on the whole, of a somewhat heathenish character, there being no end of gods and goddesses, Greek and Latin, called up for the occasion, but Henry was well-pleased with the whole affair, his mind pleasantly full of the good dowry which the princess had brought with her to England. Always fond of money, which he looked upon, and with good reason too, as a political power, his fondness, in the latter years of his reign, grew into avarice, leading him into many a dishonourable act. This marriage itself was discreditable to the king, and, more still, its consequences. Less than five months after his marriage with the Spanish princess, little Arthur, weakly in body, and still almost a boy, died at Ludlow Castle to which place he had been sent with his wife "to keep court." In order not to return the dowry of the princess, amounting to the large sum of two hundred thousand ducats, the king now forced his second son, Prince Henry—renowned Henry VIII. to come—to enter into a marriage contract with Catherine. The contract was signed in 1503, Prince Henry being then only in the thirteenth year of his age, but the nuptials, fortunately, did not take place till five years after, the royal boy, a good deal stronger, both in body and mind than his elder brother, showing a decided opposition to become the husband of a dark foreign lady nearly twice as old as himself.

In the summer of 1502, not long after the decease of her eldest son, Queen Elizabeth died in child-bed, to the moderate grief of the king her husband. Getting more avaricious with ever increasing wealth, Henry lost no time in announcing his intention to take a second wife, looking out chiefly, or almost solely, for a rich dowry. Scores of fair princesses, old, young, and middle-aged, were ready to have the diadem of England placed upon their brow; yet Henry was difficult to please, discarding one after the other, always, when nearly ready to make his choice, discovering a still more attractive figure—arithmetically speaking—in the background. After lengthened negotiations, the king fixed his mind upon Margaret, duchess of Savoy, a comely widow, possessed of immense wealth. She was not unwilling to become queen of England, but her brother, Archduke Philip of Austria, husband of Joanna, the only daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, and who had become Queen of Castile since the death of her mother, opposed the match, to the great indignation of Henry. However, by a curious accident, the poor archduke was very unexpectedly forced into giving his consent

Returning with his young wife, who hung upon him with devoted fondness, from the Netherlands to Spain, the ship in which they embarked was driven by stress of weather into Weymouth, and they were glad to seek shelter on English ground. Henry had no sooner heard of the arrival of these illustrious though unwilling guests, when he invited them to court, and entertaining them for several months with tournaments and other displays, sought to make their sojourn as pleasant as possible. It was clearly impossible for Archduke Philip—who, with a most handsome face, had a great want of pluck, and felt, in the hands of Henry, very much like a squirrel in a cage—to refuse anything to so amiable a host; and, accordingly, he at once set his hand to the proposed marriage contract between his sister and the king. More than this, he agreed that his infant son, Charles—subsequently world-renowned Charles V., monarch of half the civilized world—should be married to Princess Mary, Henry's youngest daughter; and also that the principal English refugees, members and adherents of the House of York, who continued to carry on their intrigues in Flanders, should be delivered into the hands of the king. The unhappy archduke, in fact, refused nothing of all that he was asked to do; and, having signed all the treaties laid before him, including a commercial pact between England and the Netherlands, deemed himself happy when he was allowed, at the end of three months, to quit the hospitable court of King Henry. Leaving England in March, 1506, he safely arrived in Spain, but less than six months after died in the arms of his wife.

Queen Joanna grew raving mad at the death of her husband. Of a strongly melancholy temperament, and subject to fits of mental aberration, she had, it was believed, been saved from insanity by an intense and almost frantic love for her handsome young husband—a love not at all returned by the latter, but openly despised in the show of affection for other women. Constant jealousy, but too well founded, continued to undermine the reason of the poor queen, so that, at Philip's death, the dark veil of hopeless insanity fell down upon her. During the whole of the illness of her husband she had not left his bed. After his spirit had fled she sank down in a long swoon; but no sooner had she recovered and heard that he had been buried, than she gave orders to have the corpse taken up and placed again by her side. Arrayed in costly robes, the dead body was once more carried into Joanna's room, and placed in a chair, opposite which the queen sat the livelong day, not turning her eyes from the livid, ghastly features, once so well beloved. But jealous as ever, not a woman was allowed to come near the room, and even when soon after brought to bed of a child, Joanna refused all female aid. Not long after she went on a tour through Spain, in company, as always, with her husband's corpse. Refusing to believe that he had really died, all the wreck of her thoughts was bent upon the idle idea that he was only asleep and would soon be awake. Thus the queen of Castile rode up and down through her kingdom, until the corpse of her husband fell into hideous putrefaction, leaving nothing but the fleshless bones in her fond embrace.

Henry had no sooner heard of the death of Archduke

Philip, when he offered to marry Joanna, giving up his already settled match with the duchess of Savoy. The information that she had become insane did not appear to detract in the least from his anxiety to wed the queen of Castile, now the richest heiress of Europe. Like many other men of large intellect and small imagination, Henry did not think very highly of women, and, with the sole exception of his mother, whom all through life he regarded with the deepest veneration, and submitted to with almost child-like obedience, he never treated the sex otherwise than with a sort of silent contempt. Thus the love madness of poor Joanna of Castile could not but appear to him extremely ridiculous; he probably fancied that all she required for a complete cure was another husband. His scepticism about the frantic love of the unhappy woman was justified, to some extent, by what he had seen of her and her husband during their three months' sojourn in England, which was not exactly calculated to give the highest idea of connubial bliss. Handsome Philip, much-adored archduke, showed himself to Henry's sharp eyes as little better than a brainless fop, simpering at the skirts of pretty chambermaids and ladies of honour; while the queen, his fond wife, kept hawk-like watch over him, pouncing down with immeasurable fury on such fair delinquents as might fall within her reach. This was clearly not the sort of "heavenly union upon earth" to impress an old observer of mankind like Henry; and while feeling silent contempt for the beautiful archduke, he had no high admiration either for the jealous queen, his wife. Therefore in offering himself as second husband—an act visited with fierce indignation by poetical historians of subsequent generations—Henry was probably unconscious of committing any offence against morality, nay, looking upon poor Joanna's mad grief as a temporary excitement, akin to her former jealousy, and sincerely believing that he would make a far better husband than her rakish archduke, he was, perhaps, even led to look upon his own offer as an extremely noble act. But Henry, with all his cold, worldly wisdom, forgot two things—forgot that he was fifty and that he was plagued with the gout. Henry should have known that these were qualities not likely to recommend him to a queen stark mad of jealousy and love.

However, the negotiations for the hand of Joanna of Castile were continued very earnestly for more than a year, the representatives of the widowed queen being her father, Ferdinand of Aragon, and his great minister, Cardinal Ximenes. The world had not often before seen two such sets of politicians matched against each other as Henry, with his astute arrow-bearer, Bishop Fox, at his side, and Ferdinand, greatest of living statesmen next to Henry, accompanied by Ximenes. Though in political intrigue and all the arts of dissimulation which go by the name of diplomacy, Henry was undoubtedly superior to Ferdinand, yet, on the other hand, the Spanish cardinal was far more perfect a hypocrite than the English bishop, and thus the chances were pretty even in the joust. Ferdinand's chief object throughout was to keep Castile to himself; but he was anxious likewise not to offend Henry, whose alliance was of the highest importance to him in the struggle against French supremacy. Perhaps he would have been really delighted to let King Henry have any of his daughters or sisters, whether sane or insane, old or young; but Joanna possessing Castile in right of her mother, and an immense private fortune besides, he was quite determined not to let the match take place. But Ferdinand and Ximenes hid their refusal under the softest and most endearing terms, professing no other motive but the deep affliction of the unhappy queen. Henry replied, more cutly, that poor Joanna would be all right by-and-by; that she wanted somebody to take care of her, and that all her sorrow and affliction had been brought upon her solely by the cruel treatment of her husband. Ximenes, with tearful eyes, would not allow this. He was sure the queen's love for her dead husband was more overwhelming than ever the world had seen, making it impossible that she should wed again. Henry soon perceived that the cardinal was his master in fine sentiments and romance, and thereupon turned over another leaf. He gave his "dear cousin," King Ferdinand, to understand, that if he himself could not have the hand of Queen Joanna, his son and heir, Prince Henry, would not be permitted to marry Princess Catherine, the king's daughter, to whom he was betrothed. This was a serious threat; but Ximenes again parried it off with skilful fence. He reported on the increasing disease of Queen Joanna's mind, while his secret agents in England skilfully spread a rumour that Joanna's private fortune was in reality very small, the greater part of it having been spent by her husband, and the rest being settled upon her children. Henry now drew back cautiously, his thoughts again reverting to the comely widow of Savoy, and the 300,000 crowns which she was going to bring him. In this mood he accepted a new offer on the part of Ferdinand to remit the remaining part of the dowry of Princess Catherine, amounting to 100,000 Spanish dollars, in four half yearly instalments, on condition of the marriage of the princess with Prince Henry taking place at the end of the term. The Spanish dollars came as promised, but the king himself had only the satisfaction of seeing two instalments arrive, grim death stalking in before the final cash account.

The last years of Henry's reign were sadly marred by financial oppression, due to his ever-increasing avarice. Compared with the enormous weight of modern taxation, the imposts ordered by the king were in reality mere trifles, nevertheless, his subjects, who certainly were the best judges in the matter, did not look upon them in this light. Besides the subsidies granted to him by parliament, which, almost from the first year of his government, had been but an abject tool in his hands, he exacted large "benevolences," "casualties," "redemptions," and a variety of other imposts from the more wealthy of his subjects, little mindful of the resistance of his victims as long as they were really able to pay, but scrupulously careful not to touch in any of his exactions the lowly and the indigent part of the population. There were two harpies, both lawyers, whom the king had made his chief tax-gatherers. The first was a man of good family, called Dittley, possessed of some eloquence, and acting frequently as speaker of the servile House of Commons; and the second one Empson, the son of a sieve-maker, altogether low and vulgar, and doing the viler part of the work. By alternately preying upon the covetousness, the fears, and the expectations of rich people; by persecuting some and cajoling others, by packing juries and intimidating judges; and by making free use of prisons and hangmen, these "horse-leeches and shearers," as they were called, managed to extract large sums from the upper and middle classes, a portion of which found its way into the king's coffers and the rest into their own. Their chief hunting ground was the wealthy city of London, and no game they liked so much as a good portly lord mayor or alderman. At times their proceedings were marked by the most oppressive tyranny. Sir William Capel, lord mayor of London, was twice condemned by them to pay the then enormous fine of 2000*l.*, for some alleged misgovernment in municipal affairs, and though he gave the money the first time, he refused on repetition, being "a man of stomach, and hardened by his former troubles." He was thrown into the Tower thereupon, remaining a prisoner for several years, till the king's death. Out of another city man, lord mayor Knesworth, the two "horse-leeches" got one thousand four hundred pounds, through a frivolous charge; a third, Sir Lawrence Ailmer, had to give one thousand pounds, and in default was committed to prison; and one poor furt-hearted alderman, named Hawis, got so frightened at similar proceedings against him, that he died "with thought and anguish." The king appears to have personally superintended the whole of these exactions, according to the testimony of Lord Bacon. "I do remember," says the learned historian, "to have seen long since a book of account of Empson's, that had the king's hand almost to every leaf by way of signing, and was in some places postilled in the margin with the king's hand likewise, where was this remembrance —

Item, Received of such a one five marks, for a pardon to be procured; and if the pardon do not pass, the money to be repaid, except the party be some other ways satisfied.

"And over against this Memorandum, of the king's own hand, 'Otherwise satisfied.'"

Lord Bacon states that he mentions this fact "because it shows in the king a meanness, but yet with a kind of justness. So these little sands and grains of gold and silver, as it seemeth, helped not a little to make up the great heap and bank."

At times Henry himself did not object to play the tax-gatherer. "There remaineth," says Bacon, "to this day a report that the king was on a time entertained by the earl of Oxford, that was his principal servant both for war and peace, nobly and sumptuously, at his castle at Henningham; and at the king's going away, the earl's servants stood, in a seemly manner, in their livery coats, with cognizances, ranged on both sides, and made the king a lane. The king called the earl to him, and said, 'My lord, I have heard much of your hospitality, but I see it is greater than the speech: these handsome gentlemen and yeomen, which I see on both sides of me, are sure your menial servants.' The earl smiled, and said, 'It may please your grace, they were not for mine own ease: they are most of the my retainers, that are come to do me service at such a time as this, and chiefly to see your grace.' The king started a little, and said, 'By my faith, my lord, I thank you for my good cheer, but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my sight; my attorney must speak with you.' And it is part of the report, that the earl compounded for no less than fifteen thousand marks."

Henry was for a long time a great sufferer from the gout, and feeling it twitch hard in the last year or two of his life, he repented himself of his sins as a taxgatherer, and resolved upon making restitution, at least to some extent. He ordered large sums to be distributed in alms, and on one day discharged the debts of all prisoners not amounting to above forty shillings each. But the time had now approached, when all almsgiving, and all the power, wisdom, and glory of the world was to vanish from before his eyes. In the spring of 1509 Henry began to feel that the end of his earthly career had arrived. To his other complaints was added a dry hectic cough, indicating the last stage of consumption. The king suffered much, but, as always, did not give vent to what he felt, bearing his pains in silence and solitude, neither caring nor hoping for sympathy. His mother sat watching at his bedside, and to her, now and then, he gave a look which seemed to reveal his heart. For weeks the king kept lying on his couch, in the palace of Sheen; and as the green leaves came springing from the trees, and the birds began singing in the groves, his spirit fled, on the morning of the 21st of April, 1509. "Thus," says Bacon, "this Solomon of England, having lived two-and-fifty years, and thereof reigned three-and-twenty years and eight months, being in perfect memory, and in a most blessed mind, in a great calm of consuming sickness, passed to a better world."

Of the character of Henry VII. the most contradictory estimates have been given by different historians. Lord Bacon, though not blind to his faults, yet calls him a Solomon; and Lord Buleigh says that his heart was "a storehouse of all heroic virtues," while writers less known to fame have contented themselves with describing him as a vulgar despot, loving power more than justice, and money more than men. But it may be safely asserted that as Bacon's life of Henry is the best picture of the first Tudor king of which our literature can boast, so the estimate of the great statesman and historian is the truest to be arrived at in our time. "He was a prince," says Bacon, summing up Henry's character, "sad, serious, and full of thoughts and secret observation," which is a wonderfully striking portrait in a few touches. "No doubt," continues the great historian, in an equally lofty spirit, "in him, as in all men, and most of all in kings, his fortune wrought upon his nature, and his nature upon his fortune. He attained to the crown, not only from a private fortune, which might endow him with moderation, but also from the fortune of an exiled man, which had quickened in him all seeds of observation and industry. And his times being rather prosperous than calm, had raised his confidence by success, but almost marred his nature by troubles. His wisdom, by often evading from perils, was turned rather into a dexterity to deliver himself from dangers, when they pressed him, than into a providence to prevent and remove them afar off. And even in nature, the sight of his mind was like some sights of eyes—rather strong at hand, than to carry afar off. For his wit increased upon the occasion, and so much the more if the occasion were sharpened by danger."

Henry's qualities as a king have been justly appreciated by Mr. James Gairdner, editor of the 'Historia Regis Henrici Septimi,' and two volumes of 'Letters and Papers illustrative of the reigns of Richard III. and Henry VII.' works which give a clearer insight into the period than any other book since the time of Bacon. Henry VII., Mr. Gairdner holds, and every impartial student of history will agree with him, "was the very king of whom England then appeared to stand in need—pre-eminently fitted to command the respect, if not the affections of his subjects. Though no admirer of war, he was always ready for it; on several occasions took the field in person, and never met with a reverse. Trained in the school of adversity, he was not rash and violent like the kings who preceded him, but prudent in his counsel and moderate in his dealings. As far as possible, he allowed the evils of an unquiet age peacefully to settle themselves; yet one means he employed against them no less merciful than effective. Rebellion was expiated, for the most part, not with bloodshed but with money; offences were dealt with as debts to the crown. By this means the king's treasure was augmented, and the royal authority was strengthened. What was of still more importance, the people were interested to support him. Each new disturbance only created fresh taxation. The impatient west and the unquiet north were alike compelled to pay the subsidy, and all who resisted were burdened with fines besides. Thus Henry enlisted in the cause of order every man who knew the value of money; and this, perhaps, was beginning to be known somewhat better than it had been before. He checked his accounts with his own hands, and governed his people by his cashbook." To a certain extent, Henry was the founder of what is vaguely designated nowadays as the constitutional system, the essence of which is cashbook government.

In personal appearance, Henry is described by Bacon as "a comely personage, a little above just stature, well and straight limbed, but slender. His countenance was reverend, and a little like a churchman, and as it was not strange, or dark, so neither was it winning or pleasing, but as the face of one well disposed. But it was to the disadvantage of the painter, for it was best when he spake. . . . He was affable, and both well and fair spoken, and would use strange sweetness and blandishments of words where he desired to effect or persuade anything that he took to heart." Altogether, England has reason to cherish lovingly the memory of her first Tudor king.

COINS OF HENRY VII.

HENRY VIII.

On the 9th of May, 1509, the road from Richmond to London was crowded by a gorgeous procession, of immense length. Files of halberdiers, trailing their battle-axes on the ground; rows of choristers, chanting solemn prayers, and vast numbers of monks, priests, and prelates, reciting hymns and psalms, preceded and followed a chariot of great height and of most singular aspect. It was covered with rich cloth of gold and pearl-embroidered cushions, on the top of which there lay a figure dressed in royal robes, ball and sceptre in hand, and on the head a golden crown. The figure was meant to represent King Henry VII., whose dead body was hidden underneath the cloth of gold, no more visible to men's eyes. Slowly the huge procession moved along, and it grew night before it reached the gates of London. Then, when the shadow of darkness had fallen upon the earth, a thousand torches came to be lighted, and again the procession kept moving on, till the flaming fires were reflected in the waters of the river Thames. At London Bridge, the mayor and aldermen of the city, all in black, followed by fresh crowds of monks, priests, choristers, halberdiers, and torch-bearers, took charge of the waxen figure with the corpse below, and St. Paul's received for the night the mortal remains of King Henry VII., together with the gaudy trappings of his funeral car. The next day, the 10th of May, the chariot took its course from St. Paul's cathedral to Westminster abbey, and the body underneath the great cloth of gold having been lowered to its last dark resting place, the chief officers broke their staves and cast them into the grave, while the heralds shouted at the top of their voices, and the whole crowd repeated the shout, "Vive le Roy Henry le Huitième!" "The king is dead. long life to the king!"

There was long life in store for King Henry VIII. Never did monarch of England ascend the throne under fairer auspices than Henry; never, since the days of the Conqueror, was the wealth and power of the realm more concentrated in one grasp than now, when falling into the hands of a young man of not quite eighteen. It was but natural that the world, always hoping that which it desires, should lavish high expectations upon this youth, and that even great thinkers, high above the vulgar multitude, should prophesy a time of unequalled prosperity to the young king, as well as to the country over which he was set to rule. Erasmus of Rotterdam, foremost in the rank of philosophers of the age, deliberately pronounced his opinion that young Henry was "sent from Heaven to regenerate Britain," and quiet Melancthon himself, bosom friend of Luther, and most unassuming of thinkers, stated his conviction that there was now in store for England "such a golden age as was formerly in Egypt under Ptolemy Philadelphus." The whole of these transcendent hopes were based upon the fact of the son and heir of King Henry VII. being a lusty youth of tolerably good education, not deficient in courage nor in knightly accomplishments, of comely aspect, and of great energy of mind, approaching obstinacy. Destined originally for the Church, and not spoiled by flatterers until arrived at the age of nearly eleven, when the death of his brother Arthur brought him to the foot of the throne, Henry possessed, moreover, the great attraction of suasive speech and condescending affability; and it was the weight of these natural gifts and educational accomplishments together, which laid for him the foundation of an immediate and boundless popularity as soon as the crown had fallen upon his head. The head was too unwrinkled as yet to look upon life in general, and life on the throne in particular, as anything else but sunny and golden; and the first impulse of the young king was to give himself up, heart and soul, to the intoxication of his new career. Immediately after the great officers of the realm had thrown their broken staves into the tomb of the father, the son hurried them off to the royal palace, "where," says the old chronicler, Hall, "they had a great and a sumptuous feast." Thus the first act of the reign of Henry VIII. was a hearty Irish wake.

On the advice of his shrewd grandmother, the countess of Richmond—veritable founder, in more than one sense, of the line of Tudor kings—Henry determined to retain all his father's advisers, which suited him the more as allowing his unrestricted devotion to pleasure and amusements. The leading men in this ministry were three prelates, Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, Fox, bishop of Winchester, and Ruthal, bishop of Durham, with whom acted six lay figures, with high-sounding titles but no particular influence. One of the first questions to be discussed by these royal advisers was, whether Henry should marry his brother Arthur's widow, Catherine of Spain, or send her, with the rich dowry, back to her father, King Ferdinand. There were weighty reasons in favour of the latter, and, in fact, except the money question, there was no ground whatever for committing such an outrage upon morals as this marriage with Catherine involved. Nevertheless, the majority of ministers decided in favour of the union, and, what was more important, the young king himself was eager for its accomplishment. Eight years older than Henry, Princess Catherine was now in the very height of her somewhat voluptuous beauty, and the easily inflamed passion of the king made him not only consent to the marriage, but hurry it on with quite indecent speed. On the 3rd of June, 1509, exactly six weeks after the death of his father, and less than a month after his burial, Henry celebrated his nuptials with the Spanish princess at Greenwich, with such extravagant pomp and gaiety as if mourning for a good and wise parent had never been known upon earth. The dead father having left immense treasure behind, the carousals of the son were of the most magnificent character, and altogether, in modern phrase, regardless of expense. Not for a long time had England seen such a show of finery and upholstery—utterly at repugnance with the principles of the first Tudor, to whom life was a serious thing, and who had too much work to do to find time for playing—and great accordingly was the admiration of courtiers and fine ladies for the new king. The marriage festivities had no sooner been concluded when came those of the coronation, which took place on the 24th of June. To judge by the elaborate descriptions of the old historians, all London went fairly mad at sight of the splendours exhibited on this occasion. The palace of Westminster had been converted into a vast theatre, in the midst of which there was a wooden castle, gilded all over, on the top of which the king and queen took their seats. Then "the trumpets blew to the field, and the fresh young gallants and noblemen, gorgeously apparelled, entered, taking up and turning their horses neatly and freshly. Next followed a turret, wrought with fine cloth of gold, whereon was a lady bearing a shield of crystal"—the said shield of crystal being the only garment provided for the lady. But this was far from being all. Another troop of horsemen was soon ushered in by drums and fifes, "with coifs of gold and high plumes on their heads." Eight knights followed in superb armour, who were introduced to the queen, and besought her leave "to prove themselves against Minerva's scholars, and to have the crystal shield their prize if they won the triumph." They jostled with each other till night, when somebody took the coveted crystal shield; and on the next day they all assembled for a fresh spectacle, declared to be a perfect marvel of beauty. "A park with green pales, containing fallow deer, and exhibiting artificial trees, with bushes and ferns, was brought in and set before the queen," and, all being ready, "the gates were opened; the deer ran out into the palace; greyhounds pursued, caught, and killed them; and the bleeding animals were presented to the queen and her ladies by the eight knights, who declared that they were servants to the great Diana, and that news having been brought them that the scholars of Minerva had come for feats of arms into these parts, they had left their chase, to fight with them for the love of ladies." Thus the jousting and theatricals went on day after day, the king throwing his whole heart into the matter, never wearying of the childish play. Even the death of his venerable grandmother, noble pillar of the Tudor race, did not interrupt Henry's delight in the mummeries. But, true to his instinct of vanity, he gave the old lady a splendid funeral, after the model of that of his father, with only the waxen figure left out.

While Henry was thus amusing himself and his courtiers, a ferment gradually arose among the people, on account of a long neglected claim of justice. The pecuniary extortions which so sadly distinguished the last years of the reign of Henry VII. had raised a strong spirit of opposition even in the king's lifetime, and he had no sooner closed his eyes, when it found vent in a great clamour for the punishment of the two state counsellors, Empson and Dudley, held to be the chief instruments of oppression. To appease the clamour, the young king's ministers had no hesitation whatever to throw their former colleagues into prison, and even to put them on their trial, although they well knew that all the acts complained of were committed, not only with the connivance, but often the express order of the royal master whom they all served. Nevertheless, Empson and Dudley, with numerous so-called accomplices, were found guilty of illegal extortion, and being condemned to death were thrown into the Tower. A lingering feeling of shame prevented their immediate execution, but the excitement continuing, with the unpleasant cry for restitution added to that for punishment, Henry signed the death warrant at last, and the heads of the two unlucky royal counsellors fell on Tower Hill. The immense fortunes they had amassed found their way into the king's exchequer, and the numerous victims of injustice were promised restitution in full. But promises were the beginning and the end. The fact soon became plainly discernible to most men, that King Henry VIII., though not possessed of all the qualities of his great father, had at least, to a high degree, the one of extreme love of money. Spending it lavishly, for the gratification of his vanity, he yet grasped at wealth with immense eagerness, and not too fine perception of right and wrong, whenever occasion offered. When Sir Thomas More, no mean admirer of Henry, was congratulated by his friend on the fact that the young king walked arm-in-arm with him, he pointedly remarked, "I believe he doth as singularly affect me as any subject within his realm: howbeit, if my head could win him a castle in France, it would not fail to go."

The life of pleasure and dissipation, with which Henry commenced his reign, continued uninterruptedly for nearly four years, the chief occupations of the young king during the whole of this period being jousting, tilting, dancing, shooting, gambling, and flirting with the beauties of the court. Of course, there was no tournament in which he was not the winner; no tilting, shooting, or wrestling, in which he did not carry off all the prizes. The flatterers with whom he was surrounded were allowed to exercise their craft to the utmost, even to the border of the ridiculous. Thus, the Venetian ambassador, adept in the art, like most of his countrymen, addressed Henry as follows, in open court: "If we look upon your highness's face, we believe we see an Apollo; and if we contemplate your breast and shoulders, or the other parts of your adorable body, we behold the image of a Mars." Then cried another courtier, Henry listening all the while very demurely, as if the subject under discussion was the man in the moon:—"Who can observe that august majesty of his whole body, and not say that this noble frame was born for a diadem, and for royal robes, and for a kingdom? Who can behold that forehead, that countenance, even from afar, and not acknowledge it to be the seat of clemency and divine wisdom." Kings may be pitied for living in an atmosphere which encourages the growth of a rant knaves delivering such foolish speeches; nevertheless, in Henry's case the pity must be mingled with contempt. Gifted as he was with great energy of character, and with an intellect scarce inferior to that of his father, he might have roused himself, even at the youthful age of twenty, to something better than court mummeries; and, driving the fools and knaves from his presence, devoted at least part of his time to the serious work of government.—government never more wanted than now, the old feudal state having gone to wreck and ruin, and all the might of the realm lying concentrated within the folds of the throne. But it was Henry's deliberate choice to subordinate, at the very beginning of his kingly office, his fine intellect to the grosser passions of his nature. The path once struck out was not easily left, but came to mark the whole course of Henry's life.

While the king was wasting the best years of his youth in puerile, and, but too often, vicious amusements, there grew into strength, at his side, an extraordinary man of low origin, destined to be for many years the real king of England—Thomas Wolsey. Although the son of a person in very humble circumstances—of a butcher at Ipswich, according to some, and, as others will have it, of a small farmer—Thomas Wolsey received a very superior education, and, having studied at Oxford for several years, and gained high honours, entered the Church at the age of twenty-five. For some years after he filled the post of tutor to the sons of the marquis of Dorset, when his winning manners and attractive conversation, together with real learning and acquaintance with almost all subjects of human knowledge, made him such a favourite, that, on the rectory of Lymington, in Somerset, in the gift of the marquis, becoming vacant, Wolsey was made the incumbent. He was inducted to the living in the latter part of the year 1500, at the age of twenty-nine. Lymington rectory, though well endowed, did not seem to be to the liking of Thomas Wolsey; at any rate, he behaved badly, and found his way, somehow or other, into the stocks. It was this, probably, which made him leave the place, to set out upon a wandering life. After filling, for a short time, the place of one of the chaplains of the archbishop of Canterbury, he went over to France, and got the appointment of priest in the household of Sir John Nefano, treasurer of Calais. As always, so here Wolsey succeeded in a very short time to gain the good graces of his patron; and Sir John being old and infirm, he allowed his chaplain to discharge the greater part of the duties of his laborious and lucrative office. However, not long after, age compelled him to resign the treasurership, and, in gratitude to Thomas Wolsey, he procured for him the appointment of one of the chaplains of King Henry VII. Once introduced at court, a brilliant career opened before the enterprising and ambitious priest. His handsome figure, his noble deportment, his fluent speech, his vast acquirements, and, above all, his obsequious servility, combined with masterly self-possession, soon made him the universal favourite: to such an extent, that even stern King Henry, who well knew the real worth of men, and was not easily deceived by superficial varnish, began to honour him with his confidence. After discharging several small orders to the king's satisfaction, Henry finally entrusted him with a secret mission of some importance. It proved, to some extent, the turning-point of the extraordinary career of Thomas Wolsey.

The king at this time, old and infirm though he was, had got deep into matrimonial speculations. He wanted a wife for himself, and a husband for his daughter Mary; but the first being the more immediate requirement, seeing that he was past fifty, and his daughter much under fifteen, he fixed his eyes upon Princess Margaret, widow of the duke of Savoy, and presumed to be possessed of great wealth. Princess Margaret was nearly related to the emperor Maximilian of Germany, whose grandson, Charles, was thought to be a fit match for little Mary; and

Henry's speculations turned upon the double scheme of negotiating his own marriage while preparing the prospective one of his daughter. It was necessarily a delicate enterprise, the proper execution of which required much diplomatic skill. Considerable progress having been made in the preliminary arrangements, it became necessary to despatch a confidential envoy to Maximilian, who had fixed his court for the time being at the city of Bruges, in Flanders. This mission the king entrusted to Wolsey. Early one morning, in November, 1507, Wolsey was called to the royal presence, and, after a lengthened interview, receiving his credentials and verbal instructions, was told to set out at once for the court of Maximilian. Determined to show his zeal, Wolsey started from Richmond palace at noon, in a fast-sailing barge, and, with prosperous wind and tide, arrived at Gravesend the same afternoon. Taking horse immediately, he hurried forward to Dover, which he reached in five hours, went on board the packet boat, and, in the name of the king, ordered the sailors to start without a moment's delay. Arrived at Calais in another three hours, he posted, in hot haste, to Bruges, found the emperor ready to receive him at once, made an elegant speech, received a gracious and favourable reply, forthwith endorsed on parchment, and, before the sun had set a second time, was on his way back to Calais. His lucky star again made wind and tide favourable, and the waiting packet having brought him safely back to Dover, and relays of horses to London, he found himself at Richmond palace in less than forty hours after he had left it. King Henry was just rising, and going to the chapel for early prayers. Wolsey officiated, and, prayers over, bended his knee before the king, presenting the reply of Maximilian. Henry was surprised beyond measure to find his envoy had come back from what was then held to be a long and difficult journey, before he was aware even that he had left the court. Possessed as the king was himself of the most active energy, he could not help admiring the zealous vigour of his chaplain-ambassador, and then and there resolved not to lose sight of so valuable a servant. As a beginning of royal favour, Wolsey was made dean of Lincoln, and to this high office there came to be added various sinecures, among them the rectory of Redgrave, Norfolk, the vicarage of Lyde, a precentorship at St. Paul's cathedral, and—in curious combination with his clerical offices—the ranger'ship of Brantsgisley park. This multiplicity of appointments did not prevent Wolsey from remaining at court, in the immediate neighbourhood of the king. The first steps upwards, so far from satisfying, but whetted the keen appetite of his boundless ambition.

The death of Henry VII., which occurred in the year after Wolsey's collation to the deanery, appeared for a moment to put a check upon his high aims. But he was too keen an observer of men not to see his advantages with any king: and before six months were over he was higher in the favour of the son than he had ever been in that of the father. Quite as able to get up a mummery, or a joust, in a couple of hours, as to travel to the continent and back in a couple of days, Wolsey had to wait but a short time to see his talents appreciated in the new court; and the courtiers were not long in finding that their brilliant royal master was more fond of his society than of that of almost any other man. Though twenty years older than Henry, the versatile dean showed wonderful skill in adapting himself to all the fancies, freaks, and passions of the king, humouring alike and guiding the burst of his lower instincts and the higher qualities of his head and heart. Besides his vulgar admiration of tailoring, gorgeous upholstery, and love of all sorts of shows and silly displays, Henry was not without the nobler ambition of literary fame, caused by genuine respect for knowledge and wisdom, and often enough, feeling satiated with the sight of paper trees, wooden castles, and ladies in crystal robes, he fled for refuge to intercourse and correspondence with the greatest scholars of the age, such as Melancthon, and Erasmus of Rotterdam. In reality, Henry's acquirements were of no mean order; he had studied philosophy to some advantage, was well read in the classics, and able to express himself with more or less fluency in German, French, Spanish, and Latin. It was no wonder, then, that Wolsey should become his immediate favourite, there being no man at court so well able as he to share all and every pursuit and amusement of the king. Vastly superior as was Wolsey's understanding to that of Henry, he took good care not to make the superiority felt before the vain youth; but, on the contrary, laid it as a foil to set off the royal qualities. The crafty Venetian, who addressed Henry as Mars and Apollo, was scarce half so good a flatterer as this greater courtier, whose adulation was not in mere words, but acts. With all his vanity, there could not be but slight mistrust in the young king's mind at the genuineness of the Mars-Apollo worship, and the pleasure of the incense thus offered was not to be compared to the higher gratification afforded by the sweet reflex of the royal person in the magic mirror of Thomas Wolsey.

A few months after Henry's accession, Wolsey was appointed royal almoner, with the duty to be constantly about the king, and daily to perform the mass. His sacred functions did not in the least prevent him to act as leader of all the revelries and amusements of the court. According to Tyndale, "there was no man so obsequious and serviceable, and in all games and sports the first and next at hand, as a captain to encourage others, and a gay finder out of new pastimes." Henry was not slow in rewarding his useful and interesting almoner, and numerous gifts and church preferments quickly followed each other. In January, 1510, the splendid residence of the late king's unlucky favourite, Knypson, situate in Fleet Street, was given to him as a present, and in the month following he obtained a prebendary at Windsor. He next got another rectory, that of Torrington; then two more rich deaneries, and the lucrative appointment of registrar of the Order of the Garter. So rapid was his rise in the royal favour that the ministers themselves now began to court him. There was an old antagonism between the clerical and the lay members of the cabinet, the former headed by Fox, bishop of Winchester, and the latter by the earl of Surrey. Both tried to propitiate Wolsey, but Bishop Fox tried hardest; and the great almoner leaning naturally to the Church party, his friends were but too glad to stretch forth their hands and draw him up to their side into the royal council. They were left to repent their act when seeing that the presumed ally had risen to be their absolute master. But they did not see it all at once, and Thomas Wolsey came to rule England long before England was aware of the fact.

Wolsey rose to power at a moment when England's position stood higher than it had been for centuries. Internally, the country was quiet, and even prosperous, the limitation of feudal power under the sway of the first Tudor king having imparted new life to commercial and industrial activity and the general progress of the nation. At the same time, both the concentrated strength and visible stability of the Tudor throne, and the advancement of the people in all the arts of peace, raised the influence of the kingdom abroad, giving a weight to the English name such as it scarcely ever possessed. Foreign monarchs, even the mightiest of the continent, began to look for counsel, help, and assistance to England, and it was within the grasp of the sovereign of this country to become the arbiter in the international affairs of Europe. The position of the island king derived additional strength from the troubled state of the political atmosphere, and the imminence of a general European war. The war clouds were hanging over the old battle-field of the world—Italy. For centuries, the fair peninsula, rich, beautiful, and highly civilized, but weakened and prostrate through internal dissensions, had continued to be the seat of petty tyrants and the mark of conquerors, becoming at last the mere football of foreign politics. The kaisers of Germany claimed the greater part of Italy as a fief of the empire, the kings of France professed to have ancient rights in Lombardy and the Marches; and the rulers of Arragon and Castille demanded Sicily and the Neapolitan provinces as a family heirloom. For a time the German emperors were the only dangerous—because powerful—enemies of Italian independence; but as France grew in strength with the suppression of the great feudal dependencies and the concentration of regal power, another great foe was added, and a third stepped into the list at the union of Arragon and Castille and the foundation of the Spanish monarchy. France for the first time exhibited her power in the latter part of the 15th century, by making an effort for the conquest of Southern Italy. In August, 1494, King Charles VIII. of France crossed the Alps with an army of not more than thirty-two thousand men, and overran the whole peninsula with very little difficulty. Lingered a while at Milan and Florence, he made his solemn entry into Rome on the last day of the year, and into Naples on the 21st of February, 1495, and it seemed but to depend on him to annex the crown of Italy to that of France. But Charles was twenty-two, and more given to dissipation than work; and, instead of consolidating his easy conquest by wise government, he spent his time in feasts and revelries, distributing honours and high places among adventurers and court fools. The consequence was that all that remained in Italy of political power and influence united against him, and Charles was driven as quickly back over the Alps as he had come across. Nevertheless, the invasion of Charles remained a strong incentive to further conquest: the eyes of all the kings of Europe being opened to the great fact that it was possible to take possession of the whole of Italy in a very few months, and with a very moderate expenditure of men and money. So the kings of continental Europe went on fighting about Italy for centuries to come.

The king of England had no direct interest in the struggle; but Wolsey had. His measureless ambition, rising higher with every step upwards, looking farther ahead with every new victory, impelled him to seek the friendship, not only of his own sovereign, but of foreign kings and emperors. He dreamt of placing on his brow, at some future time, the papal tiara, and of extending his sway over the nations of Christendom as never pope had done before. It was not an idle, or a wild dream, by any means. Men of lower origin than the butcher's son of Ipswich had filled the chair of St. Peter, and all that was requisite to obtain the glittering prize was the assistance of some of the great powers who influenced the college of cardinals. At the head of these powers was the kaiser of Germany, and, next to him, King Ferdinand of Spain. Both were thoroughly well informed of Wolsey's position, and were quite willing to assist him—provided he would assist them. The pact was soon made. On the 17th of November, 1511, Henry signed a treaty of alliance with his father-in-law, Ferdinand of Spain, by the terms of which he became a member of a confederacy styled the "Holy League," having for object the extinction of schism and the defence of the pope against all his enemies—notably the king of France. The chief members of the league were the Emperor Maximilian of Germany and Ferdinand of Spain, both of whom buoyed up Wolsey with the promise that at the first opportunity they would use all their influence to obtain for him a cardinal's hat. The bait for the big child, King Henry, was a golden rose, blessed by the hands of the pope, and, as carefully mentioned in the autograph letter accompanying it, "sprinkled with odoriferous musk, and anointed with holy oil." Henry was likewise flattered with the promise of getting, besides his rose, the title of "Most Christian King," hitherto borne by the king of France, but which was to be taken from that unorthodox monarch. This was quite enough to make Henry hurry into war with as much impetuosity as if entering the tilt at Richmond Green.

The war against France commenced in the tournament style, so much admired by the young king. A couple of heralds, dressed up in gorgeous tailorings, their mouths filled with big speeches, were despatched into France to order King Louis XII.—successor, since 1498, of Charles VIII.—not to make war upon the pope, "the father of all Christians," under the penalty of being deprived of his throne and kingdom. Louis XII., politest of monarchs, ever fond of an occasional bit of fun, sent the fine heralds back with neat compliments, expressive of great affection for his brother of England, and of much sympathy with the Christian father, whose worldly possessions, he declared, he was exceedingly sorry to invade, but could not help it. Henry now was for attacking France immediately; but was restrained in his martial ardour by Wolsey, acting under the inspiration of Ferdinand of Spain. The latter—in many respects the greatest monarch of the age, and a match, more than once, for the astute diplomacy of Henry VII.—had his own objects to gain in the wars of the "Holy League," and being possessed of the advantage of knowing exactly what he wanted, meant to employ his young son-in-law as the mere fool of his designs. He persuaded Henry, through Wolsey, that it would be better to attack France in the south than in the north: and to show his friendliness in the matter, declared himself ready to send ships for the purpose of bringing an English army to the foot of the Pyrenees. The offer was accepted, and an army of ten thousand soldiers, under the command of the marquis of Dorset, left England in the spring of 1512, and was safely landed on Spanish soil, near the mouth of the Bidassoa, frontier river between France and Spain. French troops immediately rushed up to this point, to oppose the expected invasion; and all eyes being directed to the Bidassoa, Ferdinand quietly turned in the rear of the opposing armies, and took possession, on his private account, of the little kingdom of Navarre, fief of the crown of France. Ferdinand had long coveted Navarre, and by this clever strategy obtained his prize with the least possible trouble. The marquis of Dorset meanwhile, with his ten thousand, stood fixed at the river's mouth, unable to move for want of guns and other material of war, and watching the French on the other side, who could do neither less nor more than watch him in return. It was in vain that the English commander wrote home, to expose his helpless and almost ridiculous position. Henry, unable to see how he was being duped by his shrewd father-in-law, commanded Dorset to take his orders, as before, from Ferdinand, and, if not told otherwise, to remain at his post. But this was too much, if not for the English general, at least for his troops. The men, hopeless and helpless, and decimated by hunger and disease, began to mutiny, and in the end took possession of some of the ships of King Ferdinand, and set sail for England. About Christmas, 1512, some five out of the ten thousand men which had left the country set foot again upon English soil—starved, ragged, and miserable wretches, whom it was impossible even to punish for mutiny. It was the first fruit of the foreign policy of Henry VIII.

Though having not yet been quite three years on the throne, the king had very nearly exhausted the immense amount of treasure left by his father, as well as the rich dowry of his consort. His tailorings and upholsteries, artificial trees, wooden castles, and ladies under crystal shields, had proved somewhat expensive delights, and he was so far from giving them up that he added new ones every day. To carry out the invasion of France, therefore—costly, if in nothing else, in the manufacture of shiploads of new dresses for the king and his courtiers—Henry had to apply, for the first time, to parliament, and to ask for subsidies. The faithful commons, meeting in the winter of 1512-13, were liberally inclined, and readily granted two fifteenths and four tenths in the old form, besides sundry new personal and income taxes, which were expected to produce a considerable sum. It was understood that the money was to go for war with France, and the old national antipathy once more made the cash come forth more readily from the pockets of the tax-payers than it would have done in any other case. The king himself made immense preparations to put himself at the head of the invading army; but it took a long time to get his accoutrements ready, and to keep the people in good spirits, Wolsey resolved to send out another fleet. The king's almoner had been made war minister in the preceding year, and in his hands was the supreme direction of the great contest now preparing with France. Wolsey rightly judged that it would be best to fight the French by sea; but his plans to this effect proved very disastrous at the beginning. Admiral Sir Edmund Howard, a son of the earl of Surrey, was entrusted with the command of forty-two armed vessels, which sailed from Portsmouth towards the end of March, 1513, with orders to cruise in the neighbourhood of Brest, where the French had collected a large fleet. For several months, Sir Edmund was unable to bring the enemy to an engagement, till, losing all patience, he rushed upon them, with more zeal than discretion, in the roads of Brest, within range of the guns on shore. The battle that ensued, on the 12th of August, 1513, was terrific, and, as appears from a letter of Wolsey to Bishop Fox, was one of the most extraordinary exhibitions of brute valour that ever took place on the seas. "Our folks," Wolsey wrote, "met twenty great ships of France, the best furnished with artillery and men that ever was seen. After innumerable shooting of guns and long chasing, the Regent most valiantly boarded the Great Currick, of Brest, wherein were four lords, three hundred gentlemen, eight hundred soldiers and marines, four hundred cross-bow men, and one hundred gunners. Our men so valiantly acquitted themselves, that within one hour's fight they had utterly vanquished, with shot of guns and arrows, the said Currick, and slain most part of the men, but suddenly, as they were yielding themselves, the Currick was on flaming fire, and the Regent was so anchored and fastened to it that by no means possible she could depart from it. And so both, within three hours, were burnt, and most part of the men in them." A frightful holocaust, thus coolly described! Remarkable was the conclusion of Wolsey's letter to Fox. "Keep," wrote the almoner and war minister, "those tidings secret to yourself, for there is no living man knoweth the same here but only the king and I." Wolsey might have taken precedence in all fairness, writing "I and the king."

To appease Henry's anger about the loss of the Regent, the first vessel of the royal navy, Wolsey ordered the immediate construction of a larger and much finer ship, to be called the Henry Grace Dieu. Meanwhile, the preparations for carrying war into France proceeded actively, the king's vanity and military ardour being kept alive by constant flatteries from the pope and the other members of the "Holy League." According to the language of these allies, Henry was already considered, before he had even drawn his sword, the greatest hero in Christendom. "The pope and all other great men here," wrote

Cardinal Hambridge from Rome, "now look daily to hear that your grace shall utterly exterminate the French king." This impelled, Henry set out at last upon the work of extermination. In May, 1513, the larger part of the army of invasion, some twenty-five thousand men, in two divisions, under Lords Herbert and Shrewsbury, were landed at Calais; and on the last day of June following, the king himself, with a glittering train of courtiers, embarked at Dover, after having taken an ostentatious farewell of Queen Catherine, to whom was committed the nominal government of the realm. Fondly keeping to the tournament style, Henry did not go direct from Dover to Calais, but made a magnificent display of his prowess in the Channel. Sailing up and down the coast between Boulogne and Calais, with hundreds of flags and banners streaming, he commenced warfare upon the sea-gulls, ordering, as related by the herald, "a great peal of guns to be shot, that it could be heard both at Calais and Dover." Late at night he landed at Calais, with more overwhelming noise of guns and trumpets. The king's arrival, according to an eye-witness—Dr. John Taylor, clerk of parliament, who left a curious diary, now among the manuscript collections of the British Museum—"was gratulated with tanto bombardarum terribili boatu, from ships, walls, and towers, that you would have thought the ruin of the world was come." Old warriors looked with astonishment upon this entirely novel style of warfare, in which all the shooting took place before the battle.

When Henry arrived at Calais, the bulk of his army, under Lord Shrewsbury, had already taken the field by engaging, somewhat needlessly, in the siege of the little town and castle of Terouenne—now called Thérouanne, a poor village of eight or nine hundred inhabitants—in Picardy. The king was in no hurry to follow; but remained full three weeks, engaged in tilting, shooting sparrows, and other less innocent amusements. Among the courtiers was one Sir Gilbert Talbois, distinguished for having a beautiful wife; and Henry was kind enough to send the knight to the army, and to take charge of the lady. The presence of other attractive ladies at Calais made the three weeks pass pleasantly for the king, though it created some uneasiness with his royal spouse at home. Knowing the influence of Wolsey, Queen Catherine addressed a piteous letter to "Maister Almoner," praying him to send a certain Francesca de Cassoris away from court, with all haste. The poor queen did not know exactly where to dispatch Francesca, "for she is so perilous a woman that it shall be dangerous to put her in a strange house." However, "Maister Almoner" managed the matter in his own clever way. Many other letters, written by Queen Catherine about this period to Wolsey, serve to show the acknowledged power of the latter, and that he was in reality the absolute commander of the royal forces. But his military capability was certainly not equal to his political genius. Instead of attacking the French at once, which might have been done with great advantage, seeing that they had no good army in the field, and were vastly inferior to the English forces in the important matter of artillery, he lost more than a month in the siege of an insignificant nificant little castle, and even when taking the offensive at last, did it with seeming fear and hesitation. On the 21st of July the king quitted Calais, preceded, as usual, by his showy train of guards and archers, the latter "all in white gabardines and caps," and after a march of wonderful slowness, equalling a procession, arrived on the 1st of August before Terouenne. In Henry's company were a dozen very large guns, expected with great anxiety by the earl of Shrewsbury and his besieging army, and fustious, far and wide, as "The Twelve Apostles." The biggest of these pieces of ordnance, known by the French as "le grand diable," tumbled into a pond, on the way to Terouenne, and although more than a hundred men were harnessed to it, and tried to draw it out, they could not do it; and, to Henry's deep regret, it had to be left behind. King Louis afterwards recovered, and made good use of "le grand diable."

It was a dreadful rainy season, and the camp was one mass of mud when Henry arrived before Terouenne; nevertheless he could not help displaying his finery. He held court under a tent of silk, one hundred and twenty-five feet long, and kept strutting about in fine clothes, dangling with the ladies, while the poor soldiers perished in his sight, of cold, hunger, and fatigue. The misery of the English army, according to the testimony of the eye-witness already quoted, was fearful. "No mortal," writes Dr. Taylor, "could be of such an iron or stony heart as to see our soldiers in their night watches, sticking in mud up to their knees all the sleepless night, and not pity them." The French forces, too, kept hovering round the camp, attacking and killing all stragglers, and intercepting the supplies which ought to have arrived from Calais. A battle, or bold march forward, was called for loudly by the troops, but Henry felt not inclined to leave his silken tent. The chief reason for his stay was that he expected a most illustrious visitor, the emperor of Germany, nominal head of all the sovereigns of Europe; and to forego a show of this kind was more than he was able. After some delay, the emperor, Maximilian I., made his appearance, Henry riding forward some miles to meet him. The rain poured down in torrents; notwithstanding which the king and his courtiers were clad in embroidered garments of gold and silver tissue, overhung with jewels, and their horses ornamented with tassels and bells of gold. The emperor, on his part, was dressed in plain black cloth, while his attendants were chiefly clad in leather, well suited to "the foulest weather that had been seen." Perhaps this still more contributed to feed the childish vanity of Henry, whose exultation at the visit of Maximilian knew no bounds. Queen Catherine echoed the sentiments of her lord in writing to Wolsey: "I was very glad to hear of the meeting, which hath been to my seeming the greatest honour to the king that ever came to prince." But the honour conferred by Maximilian proved, like most honours, of considerable expence to the accepting parties. Some time before the meeting, the emperor got a subsidy of one hundred and twenty thousand crowns from the English treasury, in aid of raising an army for the invasion of France, jointly with that of the king. But this army he forgot to bring with him when meeting Henry; to whom he offered, however, his personal services, as a volunteer, at the small wage of one hundred crowns per day. The offer, of course, was most gratefully accepted, the king being beside himself for joy at the prospect of giving orders to an emperor.

Maximilian and his leather-clad friends were worth their money, after all. From the moment they arrived in camp, things began to take a better turn, the king throwing off his indolence to exhibit himself before the high guest, and submitting with deference to his military advice. The emperor's counsel was that he should take the offensive on the first occasion, and gradually advance upon the main body of the enemy, stationed at the camp of Blangy. A favourable occasion for attack offered itself a few days after the arrival of Maximilian, in the attempt of a strong body of French cavalry to provision the besieged town. When the French horse, some twelve thousand strong, had come sufficiently near, Maximilian, acting as commander for the day, with the red rose of Lancaster on the top of his helmet, made a flank movement, and, throwing a strong body of mounted English archers upon the enemy, suddenly brought confusion into their ranks. The attack being entirely unexpected, the French gens d'armes fled as if seized by a panic, the foremost lines falling back upon those behind, and so on, until the whole mass had got into inextricable disorder. There was little fighting, and no interchange of artillery; the whole was a mere scamper, but one in which the French showed nothing but their backs. The great question in the contest was which party could spur their horses the fastest, the pursuers or the pursued; and the affair being over, the French themselves settled the name of the English victory as the Battle of the Spurs. There were few men killed in this memorable skirmish, but a great many distinguished prisoners fell into the hands of the English, among them the renowned Bayard, the "fearless and blameless knight"—chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. The famous knight fell into English hands in rather a curious manner. Riding in the rear of his flying countrymen, spurring not quite so fast as the rest of the brave gens d'armes, he espied behind him a knight in rich armour, and swooping down upon him made him a prisoner. But before long Maximilian and his cavalry came up in the race, and now Bayard, seeing the uselessness of further flight, and recognizing the fact—true to the present day—of the English being the best horsemen in the world, surrendered himself to his own prisoner. It was at the side of King Henry, who had shown himself no bad rider during the day, that the fearless and blameless knight rode back into the English camp. The question now arose whether Bayard could be considered a prisoner, as he had been taken by one who was his own captive in the first instance; and the settlement of this nice point in the code of honour being left to Maximilian, he pronounced in favour of the renowned champion. A score of other French prisoners of the highest rank were dealt with very gently, Henry's vanity rising into magnanimity.

The Battle of the Spurs, unimportant as it was in itself, threw terror into the French army. King Louis momentarily expected that Henry, accompanied by the German emperor, would march upon the camp of Blangy, containing the only army he had been able to raise; which, when destroyed, would leave the road open to Paris. The crisis was all the more to be feared, as a body of twenty thousand Swiss mercenaries, in the pay of the pope, had broken into France from the south, and had got as far as Dijon, with no troops between them and the capital. Already the pontiff was preparing a jubilee, and the people of Paris were debating whether they should defend or open their gates. Neither proved necessary; King Henry being gracious enough not to pursue his advantages, but to continue amusing himself under the blue silk tent at Terouenne. Being reassured thus far, and seeing that he only had to deal with the Swiss, Louis despatched to them his ablest officer, Tremouille, who beat the twenty thousand into retreat in the simplest possible manner, by giving each a purse of gold. This being accomplished, the governor of Terouenne received orders to open his gates; whereupon Henry, having granted to the besieged a very favourable capitulation, marched in with great pomp. Even now he did not pursue his advantages, and instead of attacking the French army in front, turned aside upon the city of Tournay, in the Netherlands. This singular movement, which created extraordinary joy at the French court, was due to the advice of Wolsey, who in his turn was prompted by Maximilian. The emperor had long wished to possess Tournay, a French enclosure within his own dominions; and taking this good opportunity, he thought it would be best that his new allies should conquer the territory. He therefore promised Wolsey to make him bishop of Tournay, there happening to be just a vacancy in the see; and this little matter settled, the English army went to march upon the city. To keep Henry amused, various grand festivities were prepared at Lille, the emperor, with some members of his own family, doing ~~in~~ in their power to please their guest, and Wolsey providing the other indispensable ingredients of pleasure. The capture of Tournay proved no very difficult matter, and Henry arrived just in time, five days before Michaelmas, to hold his entry into the city. Then there was more jousting, dancing, and banqueting, with such an exhibition of finery as to bewilder all mankind. The king and his whole train were clad in coats of purple velvet and cloth of gold, they feasted under gold-embroidered tents, and often wore bonnets of gold, which, after the fumes of wine had got under them, were thrown among the mob, for a scramble. It was altogether the golden age—paid for by the English treasury.

While Henry was amusing himself at Tournay, weighty news arrived from England. It was nothing less than that the Scottish king had broken across the border, had been attacked by the English troops, and had lost the battle and his life on the field of Flodden. King James of Scotland, although married to Henry's sister, had never been treated with the consideration due to a royal kinsman; nevertheless, his personal grievances were scarcely of the kind to justify war. Into this he was driven by the shrewd diplomacy of the French monarch, who, making use of all the influence acquired by the old alliance of the two nations, persuaded James not to lose so favourable an opportunity as the absence of King Henry from England to assert his rights. The French counsel prevailed, and James resolved upon war; but, too honourable to take advantage of Henry's stay in France to attack his antagonist unawares, he began the contest in accordance with all the laws of chivalry, by despatching a herald to his royal brother-in-law, and proclaiming his intention. The Scotch herald, Lyon king-of-arms, arrived at Henry's camp the day after the gorgeous meeting with the Emperor Maximilian, which excited his vanity to such a pitch that he had nothing but a scornful answer to return. Henry's vanity, too, made him attach so little importance to the threatened invasion as to leave no thoughts to return home, and to quit his silken tents at Terouenne—a fact which, probably, contributed not a little to the safety of England. In the king's absence the command of the whole of the English forces, gathered to meet James, was left to an old and skilful general, the earl of Surrey, whose experience of warfare was vastly superior to that of his brave and chivalric but somewhat hot-headed antagonist. King James crossed the Tweed on the 22nd of August, at the head of an army of about thirty thousand men, including the flower of the Scotch nobility. Before them the strong castle of Norham fell in a week; and Wark, Etall, Ford, and other border fortresses surrendered almost without striking a blow. On the 8th of September James encamped near the river Till, a tributary of the Tweed, not far from the village of Branxton. Here the vanguard of the English army came in view, despatched from Alnwick, the head-quarters of the earl of Surrey. The latter, whose movements were planned with great strategic skill, and executed with mathematical precision, intended to cut his enemy off from the base of his supplies, and intercept his communication with Scotland. James, on his part, had scarcely any plans at all, but kept pushing forward with fierce impatience, less a general than a brave, hot-headed knight, fighting single handed. However, on tilting against Surrey's vanguard, and becoming aware of his plan, James turned to lay, and marching along the Till, near its junction with the Tweed, took up a strong position on the slope of a hill. The king of Scotland and his army were now standing on Flodden Field.

Flodden Field, or rather Flodden Hill, forms the last and lowest of the north-eastern offshoots of the Cheviot mountains. At the base of the hill runs the little river Till, and four miles to the north flows the Tweed, while southward stretches the large and perfectly level plain of Millfield, through which runs the great road from London to Scotland. At present the summit of Flodden Hill, distant about half a mile from its river base, is covered by a plantation of fir trees; but it was bare on the memorable 9th of September, 1513, when King James and his army encamped on the ground. From the top of a natural rock, still known as "the king's chair," James' eyes anxiously strained the horizon, until the gleam of the English halberds and battle axes became visible in the distance, and dark masses were seen moving up from many directions in the valley below. The earl of Surrey's forces were ranged in three divisions; the first, or vanguard, commanded by Lord Howard, the earl's eldest son; the second, or right wing, by Sir

Edmund Howard, a younger son; and the third, comprising the body of the army and rearguard, by the earl in person. Knowing the excellent and almost impregnable position of King James, the English commander felt extreme hesitation to engage in battle, and both Lord Howard and his brother were ordered to march with the greatest caution, and to keep on the defensive as long as possible. So the English troops came creeping slowly up the valley, to the extreme vexation of King James. He was prepared to be attacked; prepared to fight like a lion—prepared to do anything but to wait. But one hour passed on after another; it was four o'clock in the afternoon, and still the English bows and halberds appeared as far off as ever, and to the impetuous king it seemed as if they would never come near. Trembling with impatience, James at last gave the signal to attack, and rushing down from his high hill, he threw himself with fierce onslaught upon the right wing of the English army. The shock was terrific, and Sir Edmund's men gave way at once, the leader himself being thrown to the ground in the sudden rush. But he soon recovered his footing, and ordering his big guns to the front made them play upon the enemy. It was here that lay the real strength of the English and the real weakness of the Scotch. In personal bravery both armies were well matched, no less than in numbers; but in the newly invented scientific aids of warfare—the use of cannon—the English, thanks to the progress of industry under the wise rule of Henry VII., were much superior to their northern neighbours. So powerful, indeed, was the English artillery, that it silenced in a very short time the fire of the opponents. The "master gunner of Scotland" soon fell dead at his post, and all his men were driven from their ordnance. For the first time in English history, the fate of battle came to depend less upon men's bravery than their skill in the use of gunpowder.

The first onset of his troops having been partly successful, King James threw himself forward more fiercely than ever, aiming right at the centre of the enemy. Again the English retreated, stunned alike by the fury of their opponents and by a sudden deluge of rain which came sweeping stormlike across the battle-field. But the ranks had no sooner given way when they closed in again; and now from behind there came marching up, with steady tramp, the body of the English army under the earl of Surrey. His eye, calmly watching the progress of the terrible struggle, perceived at once the tremendous fault committed by James, in rushing with his best forces upon one point. To retain him here—to destroy him here—was the instant resolution of the old soldier. The plan was executed with military precision. Sir Edmund sweeping round with his right wing, and Lord Howard with the left, the army of Scotland found itself hugged in deadly grasp. The battle now turned into carnage—the Scotch fighting and falling in stubborn despair:—

"No thought was there of dastard flight, Link'd in the serried phalanx tight,
Glorious fought like noble, square like knight
As fearlessly and well."—Scott.

Thus, "in the serried phalanx," fell ten thousand men, of Scotland; fell the flower of the Scottish nobility; fell the Scottish monarch. King James, fighting with passionate fury, sank under the stroke of an English battle-axe, with corpses around and above. Night set in before the carnage was ended: a hideous night of woe and unspeakable misery, the living men lying on the damp ground among the dead, and the groans of the wounded and dying rising up to Heaven. So fierce and terrible had been the struggle, that the victors felt equally helpless with the vanquished, and ill prepared to pursue the contest. Though the regular army of King James had been annihilated, there were large bodies of stragglers remaining, bold enough to show front the day after the battle. The earl of Surrey, however, did not feel inclined to attack this new enemy otherwise than by bringing his guns to play upon them, on which the Scotch retreated leisurely and in good order, carrying not only large booty, but a considerable number of prisoners with them across the Tweed.

The news of the victory of Flodden Field came to Henry in the very heat of his Tournay rejoicings, furnishing a suitable opportunity for new disputes. In one sense a share of the success was due to Henry

SWORD AND DAGGER, JAMES IV.

—that of leaving the earl of Surrey alone in facing his impetuous brother-in-law. Imagination fails to paint the consequences that might have ensued had Henry commanded his army in person on the fatal 9th of September. As it was, the king did not hesitate for a moment to accept the whole glory of the great battle. An immense tent of purple and gold was erected on the banks of the river Scheldt, and a solemn Te Deum having been sung before the king, he galloped through the ranks of his army, dressed in magnificent clothes, amidst the clanging of trumpets and the roar of guns. But now the autumn was drawing near; the plains on the Scheldt got damp and uncomfortable, and the old city of Tournay, crowded with vulgar makers of woollen and linen stuffs, had not even a decent palace for dances and banquets. Wolsey, too, having been made, as promised, bishop of Tournay, wished to get back to England, and the return was therefore decided upon. On the 20th of October the king took farewell from his friend the emperor, a solemn compact having been previously made that Maximilian's son, Charles, destined to be lord of Germany, the Netherlands, Spain, and boundless territories west of the Atlantic, should wed Henry's sister Mary, now a beautiful girl of sixteen, in the course of a year. The marriage compact was the only practical result obtained by Henry's perilous expedition, for which the English people had to pay immense sums; and even this alliance, of which the king was very proud at the time, came to nothing in the end. On the 21st of October, Henry re-embarked at Calais for his kingdom, with the proud consciousness that while his first invasion of France had given the kingdom of Navarre to Ferdinand of Spain, his second had added the thriving city and province of Tournay to the dominions of Kaiser Maximilian. It was impossible to deny the fact of England being an entirely unselfish member of the "Holy League."

After his return to England, Henry threw himself into a new vortex of pleasure, leaving all the cares of state to Wolsey. The latter, was now in reality prime minister, though nominally still content with the humble title of king's almoner. Wise enough not to excite jealousy by a too sudden display of power, he had hitherto preferred climbing upward in the social hierarchy with great caution, but now deemed it prudent to show his position to some extent. Not long after his return from France, he was made, or made himself, dean of York; at the end of another few months the bishopric of Lincoln fell to him; and in a few weeks more he had become archbishop of York. The accumulation of titles brought with it a more than corresponding increase of riches, which he expended with great liberality, considering wealth as mere means for the attainment of his object, that object being power. Knowing better than any man the vacillating character of Henry, his combined weakness and obstinacy, his childish love of pomp mixed with avarice, his vulgar conceit, and his more than vulgar lustfulness, Wolsey could only hope to retain his position by constant care and watchfulness, alternately guiding and following, commanding and obeying the royal lion, or tiger, whom he had ventured to tame. The prize was high, but the game not a little dangerous. One false move, one moment's neglect in turning the eyes off the noble brute, and he might spring at the tamer's neck, drawing blood with his sharp claws. The safest way evidently was to keep the powerful creature engaged at play, harmless or otherwise, never too hungry, and with something always at hand to satisfy his passions. Wolsey proved a splendid lion-tamer—for a time. He had his own house in the city of London fitted up in magnificent style, as a temple of pleasure for the king, with a branch establishment, not less costly, near New Hall, in Essex. The latter place, called Jericho, served for the temporary sojourn of the fair Lady Talbois, whom Henry had met at Calais, and brought back with him to England. It was remarked with great truth that a large portion of the revenues of the see of Lincoln now went to Jericho.

It was due to Wolsey to some extent that Scotland was very leniently dealt with by King Henry. To recompense the earl of Surrey for the victory of Flodden was absolutely necessary, and he was made, therefore, duke of Norfolk, regaining the title which his father had lost at Bosworth. But Wolsey was very anxious that his old antagonist in the royal council should gain no more, and to prevent any fresh accession of military glory, he strenuously advocated peace with the northern kingdom. This was the less difficult to achieve, as Henry, too, felt somewhat jealous of his great commander, and was, moreover, warmly attached to his sister Margaret, who by the last will of her husband had become regent of Scotland, as guardian of her infant son James—subsequently known as James V. Thus the victory of Flodden remained without serious consequences, as far as regarded the political relations of the two kingdoms. Nevertheless, though the sword was not unsheathed, there sprung up deep bitterness, amounting to hatred, between the English and Scottish people, not a little owing to Henry's moral turpitude. So far from showing any compassion for the fate, or at least respect for the bravery of a fallen foe who happened to be his own brother-in-law, he was not ashamed to heap indignities upon his memory and even his dead body. The mutilated remains of King James, taken up on the field of Flodden, were first carried to Berwick, where some friends embalmed the corpse and put it into sheets of lead; but instead of being honourably buried, it was from thence conveyed, with other packages, to Newcastle and London, and finally deposited in a lumber room of the monastery of Sheen, or Richmond. Henry pretended not being able to give a burial to the dead king on account of some papal excommunication—for the crime of being friendly with France, enemy of the "Holy League"—and to remove this obstacle, he applied, with great ostentation, to Rome. The pope, Leo X., immediately gave leave to inter James' body, as desired, in St. Paul's cathedral, with all the rites of the Church. However, the royal corpse remained in the lumber room—remained there more than half a century, when a London glazier got possession of it, and for some mystic purpose of his own, cut off the head and brought it to his shop in the city, leaving the bones to fall into dust. The brutality thus exhibited was but a part of Henry's general demeanour towards a vanquished but brave foe. The "poet laureate," so called, or, more strictly, court lampooner, John Skelton, was encouraged to compose long strings of verses of the greatest sourrility upon "Jemmy the Scot," now "laid cold in his clay," for having been "stark mad to make a fray, his grace being then out of the way." The reply from the north came in the beautiful lyric called the "Flowers of the Forest," bewailing, in tender strains, the loss of Scotland's noble blood.

Henry's connection with the "Holy League" came to a sudden end in 1514, less than six months after his return from Tournay. The astute king of France, who had taken the measure of his royal brother's military and political capacities, saw that it would be easy to detach him from kaiser and pope by a simple little scheme, fitted at one and the same time to rouse in his mind suspicions against his former allies, and to offer a bait to his vanity. The scheme consisted in breaking off the engagement between Henry's sister Mary and prince Charles, grandson and heir of Kaiser Maximilian, and substituting for this union that of the French king himself with Mary. Louis XII. had just lost his second wife, the once renowned Anne of Brittany, and though fifty-three years old, crippled with disease and debilitated by excesses, felt very desirous to take the young and beautiful English girl of sixteen to his marriage bed. His shrewd diplomacy soon accomplished the first part of the scheme, by enticing Maximilian into negotiations for another marriage of his son, and then giving notice of it to Henry. The latter, ever distrustful and suspicious, was infuriated at the supposed treachery; and, to show his resentment, at once broke off all intercourse with the emperor, and consented to receive the flatteries of a French ambassador with becoming grace. Louis thereupon despatched the duke de Longueville, a sharp-witted and accomplished courtier, already known to Henry from the Battle of the Spurs, which had brought him as prisoner to the English camp. The duke managed matters with so much skill, duly propitiating Wolsey as well as the king, that all preliminaries were arranged in a few weeks, and the marriage was arranged to take place towards the end of the year. There was great reluctance on the part of Princess Mary to give her hand to a man old enough to be her grandfather; and the opposition was the stronger as she was violently in love already with a cavalier of her brother's court, the young and handsome Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. However, the opposition was soon overruled, and in the end Mary gave her consent, encouraged, probably, by the report of her intended husband being so decrepit in body, that it was not expected he would live many years, or even many months. But for all this, Louis was most impatient to get possession of his pretty young bride; and, giving way to his importunities, Mary was despatched into France some months before the appointed time. Early in the month of October, 1514, the fair princess embarked at Dover, with a numerous train of knights and ladies; among the former the handsome Charles Brandon and among the latter a modest little maiden called Anne Boleyn. On the 9th of October Mary exchanged rings with King Louis; on the 5th of the following month she was crowned queen of France; and in less than seven weeks she had become queen dowager. King Louis XII. died on the 1st of January, 1515, and two months after the not disconsolate widow was privately married to the accomplished Charles Brandon.

Louis XII. was succeeded on the throne of France by his son-in-law, Francis I., twenty-one years old, a king after the knightly Bayard type. Thirsting for renown, he had no sooner put the crown upon his head when he resolved upon a new war for the conquest of Italy. To secure his rear, by keeping on good terms with England, was absolutely necessary; and ambassadors were, therefore, at once sent to Henry, to renew the treaty of peace concluded shortly before. The negotiations ended favourably, though not without some opposition on the part of Wolsey. The young king of France, more soldier than diplomatist, took a few months longer to learn the nature of the "arguments" required to make peace treaties; and, until this was done, Wolsey remained more or less antagonistic. It did not suit Wolsey's policy, however, even now to break with Francis I., and to rely upon the friendship of the Emperor Maximilian, who did everything in his power to destroy the good understanding between England and France. The great objection to Maximilian was that he had no money to give, but, on the contrary, wanted it given to him whenever possible; to which was added the still more serious fault of harbouring the idea of becoming pope. The latter interfered too seriously with Wolsey's high schemes to be tolerated for a moment; and, though the realisation of the emperor's dream seemed so far off as to be high impossible, he yet kept on his guard, remembering what strange things had happened at Rome. The breach was widened by Wolsey perceiving that Maximilian, as well as his relative, Ferdinand of Spain, for whom he had done so much, showed great disinclination to serve him in matters nearest to his heart. To be a cardinal was the first step to the chair of St. Peter; and, easy as it would have been for either the kaiser of Germany or the king of Spain to procure this dignity for Wolsey, they neglected doing so. The much-coveted honour came at last through a sovereign from whom it was least expected, the young king of France. Having climbed with his army across the Alps, over paths never trodden but by chamois hunters, and having defeated the pope's Swiss mercenaries in a terrific battle, Francis found himself, in the autumn of 1515, face to face with Leo X., the latter ready to do anything to please the young king and conqueror. Francis, after receiving from the pope's own hands "a beautiful true cross, a foot long," was asked whether he wished any other favours; when the happy thought occurred to him to ask for a cardinal's hat for Wolsey. The request was granted immediately, and Francis, quick in all his movements, started the papal messenger at once off for England. Boundless was the joy of Wolsey when he heard that his hat was coming at last. Intercepting the envoy from Rome—a common sort of creature, entirely engaged in hat carrying, at small wages—he had him stuck into costly silks, and paraded slowly along from Dover to Blackheath, where the formal delivery of the hat to Wolsey took place with great pomp. Then there was a grand procession in, it through the city of London to Westminster, where now honours were in store for the red hat. It was placed on a kind of throne, in the midst of a large hall, lighted by innumerable wax tapers, and round the throne the chief personages of the court were ordered to march in solemn procession. "The greatest duke in the land," according to the old historian Tindal, "was compelled to make a courtesy to it"—the hat. "Nothing more clearly showed the growing success of the culminating object of Tudor policy, that of debasing the great nobles.

Wolsey's elevation to the dignity of cardinal was immediately followed by other honours, which lifted him to the highest position he could ever hope to fill in his own country. The old archbishop of Canterbury, Warham, who continued to hold the post of lord chancellor, was compelled to give over the seals to Wolsey, who henceforth became nominal as well as real head of the royal council. The last step in the ladder was reached the next year, when Pope Leo X. nominated Wolsey his legate a latere, or personal representative in England. As legate, Cardinal Wolsey now was at the head of the spiritual, as he was as lord chancellor at that of the secular government of the realm, and the combined dignities made his position almost equal to that of the king. Having reached this point, Wolsey did no longer hesitate to cast aside his former humility, and on all occasions, particularly in the presence of the hereditary nobility, assumed a high and haughty tone. It had the desired effect with not a few exalted personages, and many a proud earl, accustomed to look down upon untitled beings as serfs, knelt lowly in the dust before the butcher's son of Ipswich. Not behind in their adulation were the heads of the great seats of learning, and the university of Oxford went so far as to address Wolsey as "Your Majesty." The royal lion was now tamed sufficiently to allow all this display of pride and pomp, which seemed to please him even, as reflecting the lustre of his own exalted individuality. "In all things," reported the French ambassador, "the cardinal is honoured like the king's own person, and sits always at his right hand. In all places where the king's arms are put, the cardinal's have the same rank, so that in every honour they are equal." The ostentation, thus proclaimed abroad, had its practical results. Kings and emperors did not hesitate to correspond with Wolsey in familiar terms, and, what was more, to settle large pensions upon him, besides bestowing, whenever occasion offered, the most substantial bribes. It is probable that the attainment of this object was one of the reasons of all the absurd frippery in which the cardinal delighted after he had risen to visible power. Though not exactly of the stuff of which the great ones of the earth are made, Wolsey was yet a man of far too high an intellect to find real pleasure in the childish exhibitions of fine clothes and upholstery, and he probably looked upon them as mere means to an end. That end—sole object of all his dreams, hopes, and aspirations—was the triple crown of the pope.

The policy of England for the next fifteen years was the policy of Thomas Wolsey. For half a generation he was allowed to stand, as sole steersman, at the helm of the vessel of state; his flag the red cardinal's hat, and his pharos on the distant shore, the papal tiara. Never did vessel of state run such tortuous course before, as England did to bring her helmsman into port. To carry Wolsey to Rome, there were two pilots not to be dispensed with—the German emperor and the king of France; and the two being deadly enemies, an immense amount of craft, cunning, and deceit was required to secure the favour of both, and make them serve under the one flag. At the outset, Wolsey seemed inclined to put more faith in the emperor than the king; but gratitude for the great gift received from the latter, combined with hopes of larger favours to come, made him alter his course, and look chiefly towards France for support. The young king was fully aware of the importance of the English alliance in his high aims of conquest, and eagerly accepted the cardinal's propositions. A royal marriage being deemed the strongest tie between the two countries, Wolsey hit upon an extraordinary expedient for uniting England and France. King Henry VIII. had a daughter, baptized Mary, born to him on the 11th of February, 1516, and it was proposed to betroth the infant to a child which King Francis I. expected to be born to him. The queen of France was pregnant, and it was on the supposition that she would give birth to a son, that the pact was duly made and signed. For the honour of the high contracting parties, the expectation proved true; the fortunate queen was delivered of a male child, and France and England were made happy by the announcement that the two royal babies had agreed to be man and wife. In consideration of this important alliance, a "perpetual" peace was concluded between Henry and Francis, on conditions extremely favourable to the latter, and involving the cession of some English territory to France. But the balance was restored by a secret engagement immediately following the great treaty, by the terms of which Francis I. granted an annual pension of twenty thousand livres to Cardinal Wolsey, with full promises to be his pilot to Rome.

Wolsey's foreign policy, crooked, false, and selfish as it was throughout, was so far beneficial to England as keeping the nation from war. The smouldering hatred between the French and English people, engendered by centuries of dire contests, was ever ready to burst into fresh flame; but the cardinal kept it down with a strong hand, serving in this respect the true interest of England even more than his own. Wolsey had nothing whatever to gain by war; but ran the risk of losing much, by alienating one or the other of his illustrious foreign allies, as well as paving the way to the rise of some successful general. Thus, in spite of many provocations, peace was kept, not only with the great continental powers, but even with Scotland, the troubled state of which might have provoked the interference of any other English sovereign. After the death of King James on Flodden Field, the Scotch people consented to his widow Margaret, becoming regent during the minority of her infant son, not quite two years old. Margaret might have reigned in peace, but for the wild voluptuousness distinguishing all the children of Henry VII. Like her sister Mary, Queen Margaret no sooner found herself a widow, than she cast her eyes about for another spouse. In the case of the younger sister the infatuation was pardonable, inasmuch as she had been torn from her first lover to become the wife of a decrepit old king; but there was no such excuse for Margaret, supposed to be attached, with sincere affection to a young and valiant husband, whose memory was deserving at least of some outward show of esteem. Nevertheless, Margaret threw off her mourning with immense haste, uniting herself, a few months after the battle of Flodden, to a stalwart Scotch noble, Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus. The union became the more indecent through the fact that there was a strong belief among numerous people in Scotland that King James had not fallen, as asserted, at Flodden, but had made his escape from the carnage and gone to the Holy Land, in expiation of the crime of shedding so much precious blood. There was some justification for this story; for not only was the king's body not properly identified among the ghastly heaps of corpses on the battle field, but the victors, who paraded James' armour with much ostentation, could never show the very remarkable iron girdle which he used to wear next to the skin, in penance for youthful rebellion against his father. More than this, there came forward witnesses who solemnly asserted having seen James subsequent to the battle. One, Telfair, "a man probo et docto," declared positively that his own eyes watched the king as he was crossing the Tweed on the morning after the struggle, and the tale was confirmed by numerous others. However, neither the romantic belief of her subjects, nor the dictates of her own heart, prevented Queen Margaret from attaching herself to a second mate as soon as the first was out of sight. The stalwart earl, who had the honour of being second husband, was not the last one, either; for Queen Margaret got rid of him before long—setting the useful example of divorce to her royal brother of England.

The people of Scotland, both on moral grounds and for political reasons, took great offence at the hasty marriage of Queen Margaret, and an insurrection having broken out, she had to leave the country with her husband. In Margaret's stead, a nephew of James III., John Stuart, duke of Albany, who had long resided in France, was elected regent, and the infant son of James IV., wrested from his mother, was given over to his charge. Enraged both at the loss of her child and of her power, Margaret fled into England, imploring her royal brother to aid her in regaining her position. Henry was much inclined to take advantage of this splendid opportunity for making war upon the neighbouring kingdom, but on Wolsey opposing, the sword remained in its sheath. Scotland was not in the way to Rome; and a war in that direction being likely to lead to misunderstandings with France, Wolsey prudently abstained. Queen Margaret and the earl her husband got a residence assigned to them at Harbottle Castle, Northumberland, where she was delivered of a daughter. The child thus born, and christened Margaret, subsequently became the wife of Matthew Stuart, earl of Lennox, and mother, by him, of Henry Lord Darnley, husband of Queen Mary of Scotland. The earl of Angus and his royal spouse did not long reside at Harbottle Castle; he returned to Scotland in 1516, and she, after a short stay at Greenwich with King Henry, who received her joyfully—the temper of brother and sister being very much in the same mould—rejoined the earl in June 1517. Both husband and wife intrigued much, and quarrelled much, and the consequence was a divorce, which had no sooner been pronounced when Margaret sought and found a third husband in Henry Stuart, Lord Methvin. This ended for a time the immediate connection between the crowns of England and Scotland.

GREENWICH.

The political state of Europe underwent a remarkable change in the year 1519, with the death of Maximilian I., Kaiser of Germany. As candidates for the imperial crown, nominally the first of the Christian world, there came forward two extraordinary men, Charles V., ruler of Spain, of Burgundy, and the Netherlands, and Francis I., the young and chivalrous king of France, and conqueror of Italy. Distinguished as the age was for great monarchs, these two proved by far the greatest, and their life-struggle commenced in no meaner way than a contest for the diadem of Charlemagne. Charles V., grandson of the deceased emperor, and a German by birth, seemed to have the best claims to the crown, possessing also the high advantage of almost boundless wealth, drawn from the Spanish possessions west of the Atlantic. King Francis, however, was no mean adversary, being of undaunted energy, with his whole mind bent on gaining the glittering prize, and willing to spend all his treasure, his power, and his influence in the contest. The struggle was of the highest importance to nearly all the nations of Europe, as on its settlement depended the great principle, now first put forward and discussed, of the Balance of Power. With the united crowns of France and Germany on one side of the scale, there was fear that the political Balance would never stand even again; but there were apprehensions likewise, that Spain and the Netherlands would prove too heavy for the desired equilibrium. As far as England was concerned, its true policy went undoubtedly against France; but its true policy was not always Wolsey's policy. With his eye fixed upon Rome, the one consideration for him was the reaction of the imperial election upon the papal. Hitherto Germany and France had influenced each about one-third of the votes of the conclave: the two powers united, it was clear, could make a pope. Believing in the king's sincerity to place on his brow the papal tiara, Wolsey was willing to assist Francis in obtaining the crown of Germany; nevertheless he had strong doubts whether Francis would ever be successful, and, fearing irretrievably to offend a mighty antagonist, he hesitated to assist him openly, but took refuge in the old system of double-dealing. Sir Thomas More, English ambassador at Paris, was instructed to tell Francis I. that "the king and cardinal" were doing all in their power to further his German election; and the envoy at Madrid received exactly the same communication for Charles V., with the addition, however, to keep the matter secret. But the matter was not kept secret, and Francis, learning that he was betrayed, did not fail to remonstrate with Wolsey. To escape the dilemma which threatened to place him into serious difficulties, Wolsey conceived the notable scheme of putting King Henry forward as third competitor for the crown of Charlemagne. It was a ridiculous candidature, unaccompanied with even the slightest chance of success; nevertheless, it furnished Wolsey with a valuable excuse for not compromising himself either at Paris or Madrid, and was pleasing, besides, to the vanity of the hero of the pantomime. Ambassadors, in grand costume, and with plenty of English gold, were duly despatched to Frankfort, and came home again with the report—without the gold—that they had been too late in the field. The seven electors of the Holy Roman empire had met on the 1st of July, 1519, and elected Charles V. Kaiser of Germany. The contest was an expensive one to all parties concerned. Francis I. spent above two millions of crowns in the canvass, and Charles V. about half that sum. To Wolsey the election proved most ruinous of all, as it cost him the loss of friendship of Francis as well as Charles, both of whom were disgusted with his double-dealing. They continued to promise, but never even attempted to undertake the grand pilotage to Rome. From having duped others, Wolsey henceforth became the best duped man in Europe.

The election of Charles V. to the Imperial throne proved the beginning of the mighty struggle between him and his great rival Francis I. But, like giants preparing for battle, each well aware of the strength of the other, they did not rush into the arena all at once, but carefully mustered their forces and recruited their strength for the deadly onset. They both looked to England for aid, direct or indirect; and, thoroughly aware of the duplicity of Wolsey, tried to gain him over by the same arts of intrigue and cajolery he was so fond of employing. The king of France, always quick and energetic, was first in the field by entering into friendly correspondence with the cardinal, offering new bribes and honours, and presenting before his eyes the ever brilliant phantasma of St. Peter's chair. Wolsey eagerly grasped the bait, and restless with impatience, thankfully accepted the proposition of a personal interview with Francis. "He desireth more," Sir W. Fitzwilliam wrote, "to see your grace than any prince living, to the intent he may show you the secret of his mind, whereof hereafter he will declare to your grace largely." The interview was quite to the mind of Francis I., whose personal blandishments had often proved as good weapons as his trusty sword; and, all preliminaries being settled, it was arranged that "the king and cardinal" should meet him in the summer of 1520, in the neighbourhood of Calais, on the boundaries of France and England. Henry was overjoyed at the idea of exhibiting his splendour before a brother monarch, in a new manner, on such good occasion, and he, therefore, resolved at once to make the show as glittering, as magnificent, and as costly as the world had never seen before, and, in all probability, would never see again. More than three months before the appointed interview, a whole army of workmen was despatched to France, to prepare the trappings for the grand spectacle, the crowd including, according to the old 'Chronicle of Calais,' no less than "three hundred masons, five hundred carpenters, one hundred joiners, many painters, glaziers, tailors, smiths, and other artificers, to the number in all two thousand and more." Very likely King Henry had many a sleepless night, racking his poor brain about the ceremonies he was to perform, and the dresses he was going to wear. A plume more or less, or a button in the wrong place, might make all the difference between the sublime and the ridiculous in upholstery. The royal anxieties were increased by the fact of the French court not entering with equal energy into the grand preparations, but attempting to do the thing modestly. There came a weighty message from the English ambassador at Paris, dated April 18, 1520—just a month after the arrival of the two thousand tailors, who landed March 19—saying, "the king here would gladly know whether the king, his brother, would be content to forbear the making of rich tents and pavilions, which thing he could be well contented to forbear on his part." But Henry had not the least inclination to "forbear," and kept sending fresh detachments of workmen, ready to convert all France into one big stage. Francis I. had spent two millions in the attempt of getting an empire, and Henry VIII. resolved to spend no less in getting up a show.

While preparing to meet Francis, Cardinal Wolsey continued in active correspondence with his high rival, Charles. The latter felt somewhat alarmed at the news of the great interview, foreboding an intimate alliance between England and France, and he did his best to counteract it by liberal bribes and more liberal promises to the cardinal. Wolsey had a large pension, in the shape of revenues from some cloudy Spanish bishoprics, settled upon him, and these and other gifts so much excited his cupidity that he repented almost having gone too far with the French king. To make amends, his fertile mind conceived the scheme of arranging a meeting between the emperor and Henry previous to that fixed upon with Francis, and another, if necessary, afterwards, so as to neutralize any possible influence of the grand Calais interview. The idea found ready favour with Charles, and it was resolved that to please Henry, and tickle his vanity, the emperor should make his appearance at the English Court without notice, in a sudden and altogether unexpected manner. The comedy was carried out as arranged, to the high credit of the lord cardinal's diplomatic and dramatic skill. Setting out from Greenwich with an immense retinue, begilded and bejewelled to such an extent as absolutely to dazzle the starving peasants on the road, Henry reached, on the 25th of May, the ancient city of Canterbury. Here the king was startled by the news that the Emperor Charles, just travelling by sea from Spain to the Netherlands, was in the Channel, and intended to pay a visit to him, and his aunt, the queen. Henry was in ecstasies; and Wolsey was hurried off to Dover to receive the great Kaiser. He found the Spanish fleet in the roadstead, and in a gilded state barge—part of minute theatricals well arranged—was rowed on board the vessel bearing Caesar and his fortunes. Having held a long secret conference, Kaiser and cardinal were landed in Dover harbour, where Henry, high on horseback, was awaiting them impatiently. The three rode on together to Canterbury: the lord of Spain and the Indies in a woollen jerkin and little black cap, and King Henry and his cardinal apparelled in gorgeous costume, moving heaps of gold and jewels. Anxious as he was to do his business and be off again, Charles was forced through the inevitable series of splendours, until, on the fifth day, he could stand it no longer, and hurried away from Canterbury, not resting till he set foot again on board his ship, at Sandwich. Henry and Wolsey now likewise continued their journey, and starting from Dover on the 1st of June, 1520, arrived at Calais the same day, ready to open the grand show of the "Field of Cloth of Gold."

Unearthly almost were the magnificences of this Field of Cloth of Gold—enough, in their fulness, to madden the souls of all tailors and upholsterers for generations to come. Henry's contemporaries themselves grew crazy under the sight; and both the French and English historiographers, who were ordered to follow in the wake of the kings, and to describe the wonders which their eyes were to behold, fairly broke down in the task, overcome by the depth of their own feelings. "He were wise," wrote Master Hall, recorder of London, and historian on the English side; "he were wise that could have told or showed of the riches of apparel that was amongst the lords and gentlemen of England: cloth of gold, cloth of silver, velvet, tinsins, satins embroidered and crimson; of the marvellous treasure of gold that was worn in chains and baldrics so great, so weighty, some so manifold, some in collars, that the gold was innumerable, to my deeming, to be summed, of all noblemen, gentlemen, squires, and knights; each honest officer of the king was richly apparelled, and had chains of gold, great and marvellous weighty." Bewildered and confused—dazzled, above all things, like a true city-man, by the "gold so weighty," "marvellous weighty"—the recorder of London felt his heart swelling with pride and exultation at sight of the "riches of apparel," though he could scarcely comprehend where they all came from. This was lucidly explained by Hall's brother historiographer, M. de Bellay. Many of the French nobles in the suite of King Francis, he informed his readers, "carried on their shoulders their mills, their forests, and their meadows." Probably this held good also as regarded the knights and nobles in Henry's train, and as such furnished a delightful glimpse behind the scenes of the Cloth of Gold stage.

The performances commenced with the meeting of the two kings. Both had taken up their residence in wooden castles, inselld all over; Henry at the village of Guisnes, on the English side, and Francis at the little town of Ardres, on French territory, then a fortified camp, but converted, at the present day, into a useful railway station. On the 7th of June, each king issued from his painted dwelling, in accordance with a ceremonial minutely settled by my lord cardinal, which left the high sovereigns about as much volition as the dolls in a pantomime. Riding towards each other, under the sound of a host of trumpets, sackbuts, and clarions, with their people ranged behind in a sort of battle order, the kings met in the valley of Ardres, embraced each other on horseback, and, descending, embraced each other once more. They then entered a tent prepared for their reception, and, while banqueting together, the English knights ran over into the French camp with wine and other refreshments—a happy idea, highly creditable to the stage manager. The next day, Sunday, Henry and Francis went praying together, and the day after, Monday, the 9th of June, they broke lances together. The latter was one of the grand events of the show, the two queens appearing for the first time in public. A field had been prepared in the midst of the valley of Ardres, nine hundred feet long and three hundred feet broad, with benches all around for the nobility, and with broad and deep ditches behind, to keep out the vile multitude. The centre of the field was distinguished by a wonderful creation of art—nothing less than two trees, nearly twelve yards high, entirely made by tailors: the trunks and branches of cloth of gold, the leaves of green damask, and the flowers and fruits of embroidered silk. There never before were two such gorgeous trees in the world, and all the knights and ladies in the Field of Cloth of Gold got delirious for joy at sight of them. On the eventful Monday, the 9th of June, the king of France and the king of England met under these trees, and, hanging their shields against the damask leaves, began to joust, the queens looking on from a tapestried platform. The jousting being over, the prizes were distributed by the fair judges on the platform, who declared that both kings had won, each having been victorious over the other, and not one having been conquered. Thereupon the multitude behind the ditch began to marvel, thinking the battle more wonderful than the wonderful trees in whose shade it was fought.

For full three weeks the kings kept on jousting, banqueting, and complimenting each other, the official programme being changed, now and then, in favour of impromptu scenes and diversions. One of the prettiest was the clandestine visit of Francis to Henry—place, hour, and dresses, accurately arranged by Wolsey. Early one morning, the French king, accompanied by only a few pages, made his appearance at the gate of Henry's wooden castle. The officer of the guards pretended not to know him: yet let him in all the same, and even showed him the way to his master's bedroom. Here Henry was sitting, as if fresh from the couch, in splendid negligence of silks and satins. A great loving scene ensued; the king of France, by official account, "warmed Henry's chemise," for which he got a chain of gold, quite English, "marvellous weighty." The clandestine visit was returned next morning by Henry, when there was more loving and caressing, with interchange of golden rings and chains. All these by-plays, duly recorded by the royal historiographers, turned out most effectively, except on one occasion when, the cardinal's programme being discarded, there ensued a little scene. At the end of a banquet, Henry, full of wine, suddenly jumped from his seat, and, running towards Francis, exclaimed, "Brother, I will have a wrestle with you." The French king, thoroughly versed in the game, though much inferior in physical strength to his royal brother, at once accepted the challenge, and, after a few rounds, gave Henry a neat twist, bringing him to the ground at full length. There was undisguised fury in Henry's eyes when he arose; but, luckily, my lord cardinal, always watchful, had kept his eyes on the scene. On a wink from him, there was a flutter among the ladies, and a minute after the poor wrestler found himself again on his seat, under the incantation of soft voices. But all the evening long Henry was sullen, and it is doubtful whether he ever forgave his royal brother that neat little twist.

The great show finally came to an end on the 23rd of June with a pontifical mass by Wolsey. My lord cardinal on this occasion outdid himself. To show his capabilities, he produced, in the course of one night, a wooden cathedral, splendidly begilt and be-painted, in which he himself sung the high mass before the two kings, queens, and the whole army of knights and nobles, finishing by pronouncing a full indulgence for all their sins. Immediately after, the kings took farewell of each other, Francis to return to Paris, and Henry to Calais. The French king was delighted with the success of the interview, which, he fancied, had brought over his brother of England entirely to his side; but the delight was not to last long. At the very height of brotherly love, when Francis was warming Henry's chemise, my lord cardinal had been busy to counteract the effects thus produced by a close correspondence with Francis's great antagonist, the Emperor Charles. Wolsey had to play his game warily; he valued the French pension, and he valued the Spanish allowance, and his tastes being expensive, could not afford to lose either. However, more than all pensions to him was the one great object of his life, the Romish tiara, which, if not entirely through, could scarcely be got without the Kaiser. All through the time of the golden meeting, therefore, he kept in intercourse with Charles, informing him of what passed, and scheming as to the future; and, the splendours having come to an end, it was arranged that the emperor should proceed to the boundary of his Flemish dominions, near Calais, where Henry was to meet him. The plan was carried out with the cardinal's usual tact. Having taken Henry to Calais, he let him remain there for a week, as a rest from his fatigues, and on the 11th of July went with him to the little seaport of Gravelines, where the emperor had established his quarters. Henry was much displeased with the aspect of the lowly abode in the old fishing village serving as temporary residence of the Kaiser, and the latter gratified his vanity by returning with him to Calais. Here, the great emperor remained four days, in constant communication with Wolsey and the king; but to the infinite jealousy and distrust of Francis, who now perceived that he had spent his time and treasure in mere childish displays. The Kaiser, on his part, was firm in declining all festivities; however, to please Henry, who felt sincerely sorry to see the greatest monarch of Europe in a short woollen coat, with not so much as a bit of lace on his cap, he accepted from him a splendid mantle, and a horse covered with cloth of gold and jewels, on which he rode back to Gravelines—and there left it. The king and Wolsey now hastened back to England, arriving at Dover on the 18th of July, "all safe," according to Recorder Hall, "in body, but empty in purse."

Wolsey was now at the zenith of his power. A deputation from the Netherlands greeted him with Salve rex regis tui atque regni sui—"Hail! king of thy king, and of his kingdom!" and, high as the compliment sounded, it spoke no more than the truth. Wolsey, indeed, was king of the king, maintaining his power with irresistible strength, though by the simplest means. The secret of Wolsey's lead and influence over Henry was, that while easing him of the real burthen of government, he increased its outward glory, and left no means untouched which might add to the gratification of all his whims and passions. Whatever pleasures fancy could devise and money purchase were spread out before the king, and his very dreams anticipated in dreamlike reality. Splendid banquets, with masks and mummeries so gorgeous and so costly that "it was a heaven to behold," the richest wines in golden goblets, and the sweetest music, streaming forth from unseen fountains; and, with it and around it, a paradise of Mahomet, filled with lovely forms, ready to welcome the elect of the prophet—such was the world prepared by the king of the king for the king. The voluptuous, Asiatic nature of Henry—inheritance on the maternal side—was never inclined to real labour, mental or physical; and feeling instinctively the vast superiority of his minister, he was but too glad to leave him all the work, as long as he could retain the show and pomp of absolute power. Wolsey, on his part, well knew the tiger majesty he had to deal with, and never slept in fancied security. An army of spies surrounded the king, the queen, and every influential person at court, and not a word could be said, nor an act done, without the knowledge of it coming to his ears. Henry himself was chiefly kept under watch by his confessor, the bishop of Lincoln, an absolute tool of my lord cardinal, and entirely under his control; and whenever there was the slightest chance of a new candidate in the royal favour, the fact was reported to him at once, and as quickly counteracted. "He flattered," wrote Tyndale, the contemporary of Wolsey, "and persuaded, and corrupted, some with gifts, and sent some ambassadors, and some made captains, at Calais, Hannes, Guynes, Jersey, and Guernsey, or sent them to Ireland, and into the north, and so occupied them till the king had forgotten them, and others were in their room." Queen Catherine was watched no less strictly, according to the old historian. "In like manner," says Tyndale, "he played with the ladies and gentlewomen; whoever was great with the queen was he familiar to, and to her gave his gifts. If any were subtle witted, and meet for his purpose, he made her betray the queen, and tell him what she said or did." The result was, "by these spies is aught were done, or spoken in the court, or against the cardinal, of that he had word within an hour or two, and then came to court with all his magic to persuade the contrary." But my lord cardinal knew how to strike as well as to persuade, and apt to establish, when it suited his purpose, a reign of terror. This he showed soon after his return from the Field of the Cloth of Gold.

One of the most zealous performers at this grand masquerade was Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, son of that unfortunate noble who died on the scaffold by order of Richard III., for being a lineal descendant of King Edward III. The duke, being very wealthy, fond of good cheer, and still more fond of fine dresses, had become one of the king's favourites, and at the Cloth of Gold show obtained the high honour of being appointed one of the judges at the royal jousts, and partaker of the more intimate of the royal amusements. These and other marks of affection shown by Henry raised Wolsey's jealousy, and he at once made efforts to get Buckingham away from court. But this was not easily done; to send a proud Plantagenet as captain to Calais or Guernsey was clearly impracticable, and to propitiate him by bribes was still more out of the question. Seeing other means fail, the cardinal decided upon ridding himself of his presumed rival in the old grim fashion. The duke of Buckingham suddenly found himself accused of high treason. Among the failings of the gay and warm-hearted, but, like all libertines, somewhat superstitious nobleman, was that he believed in necromancy. He even indulged in the luxury of keeping an astrologer, in the person of one friar Hopkins, a sleek Carthusian, who carefully and intently watched the glittering stars high above the ducal mansion, not neglecting, at the same time, the glittering flasks of Burgundy in the deep cellar below. Friar Hopkins altogether was a shrewd man, and, whether inspired by the stars or the Burgundy wine, made the most remarkable predictions. He foretold the duke, his employer, that King Henry would come back from invading France without a scratch; but that King James would get to harm in invading England. There were sceptics in astrology who thought this prediction natural enough, seeing that Henry was exorbitantly inclined to take care of himself, while his royal brother-in-law showed himself utterly neglectful of the same golden rule; however, the duke was not among these sceptics, and the prophecies having been verified, his trust in friar Hopkins grew boundless. Long conferences and consultations of the stars followed, and the Carthusian found out at last that there was a high destiny in store for his master, and a higher still for his little son. This came to the ears of Wolsey, who had his spies everywhere, and probably was not entirely unacquainted even with brother Hopkins. A hint was enough to rouse the king's ever suspicious nature, and henceforth the fate of the poor Plantagenet duke was sealed. In the spring of 1521, Buckingham, who was quietly living at his residence at Thornbury, Gloucestershire, received a friendly message from Wolsey to appear at court. He obeyed, without the least suspicion, and rode on to London, accompanied by only a few servants. But a dawn of the treachery to be practised came across his mind when, on calling at York House, my lord cardinal's residence, he was refused admittance, under the pretext of illness. He had scarcely left the palace, by the water side, when his barge was boarded by a detachment of the king's body guard, who, without further ceremony, carried him as prisoner to the Tower. Here the duke was kept from the 16th of April till the 13th of May, and then put upon his trial. Friar Hopkins and other creatures who had been in his pay were brought forward as witnesses to substantiate the charge of treason against him, and though all their evidence amounted to the merest gossip, the duke was declared guilty by the mock tribunal, and sentenced to death. Three days after his head fell on the block, amidst the groans of the people, who seemed to feel instinctively that the sharp claws of their ruler were creeping forth from under the velvet glove.

While the terror of his name was spreading in England, Wolsey intently looked towards Italy, feeling nearer his grand aim than ever before. Towards the end of 1520, the bishop of Worcester reported to him from Rome that Pope Leo X. was dangerously ill, and that the cardinals were discussing the merits of the cardinals for the new election. It was generally held to be an election more important than any that had taken place for a long time, for on the character of the new pontiff depended, to a great extent, the future position of the church, in relation to the mighty schism that was taking place in central Europe. A poor Saxon monk, called Martin Luther, had visited Rome ten years before, and disgusted with the wickedness and irreligion of the heads of the church, had set himself to study the Word of God, so as to separate the true faith of Christ from the superstition of centuries. Having found the truth, and full of its spirit, the poor monk had dared to throw the gauntlet to the pope, calling him the Antichrist, and exhorting the nations of Europe to throw off the sinful burthen of this dominion, and to purify themselves in a new and better faith. At first, there was but slight attention paid, among the purple hierarchy at Rome, to the preachings of the monk in far-off Saxony: others had preached before him, quite as zealous and as earnest, and their voice had perished in the flames of the stake, or under the axe of the executioner. But when the Saxon monk had been excommunicated by Leo X., and all the terrors of the Church had been let loose against him, and he yet kept on preaching, with multitudes of devout listeners, knights and nobles, and even princes, around him, then the alarm began to spread at Rome, and it was felt that something more was needed than bulls of excommunication to check the restless spreading fire—the old-world devouring fire of the Reformation. The pope and his council now began discussing the great question as to the best mode of annihilating Luther and his doctrines; and the pontiff's earthly career drawing to an end, it became a matter of the highest importance to find the man, able and wise and energetic enough to restore the threatened power and unity of the Church. Wolsey was kept intimately informed of all that was going on at Rome, and to show his zeal for the Church and thereby advance his interest in the college of cardinals, resolved upon a career of persecution. Not being able, to his infinite regret, to lay hands upon Luther himself, he wreaked his vengeance upon the books of the reformer, a few copies of which were believed to have been brought over to England by foreign merchants. On the 14th of May, 1521, a month before Luther was cited before the Diet of Worms, to answer the accusations made against him before the civil authorities, Wolsey issued an edict forbidding the study of all works against the pope, and those of the Saxon reformer especially, under severe penalties; and, to give effect to the denunciation, the bishops were ordered to affix at the doors of their cathedrals a complete list of all the heresies propagated by the daring enemy of Rome. This extraordinary measure had the effect of making the doctrines of the Reformation generally known in England, bringing to Cardinal Wolsey the unconscious merit of becoming one of the most active agents of Martin Luther.

No sooner was the cardinal's edict issued when the news arrived that Leo X., after recovering a little, had suffered a new relapse, and was not expected to live many weeks, or, perhaps, many days longer. Thereupon Wolsey redoubled his zeal, and not content with his own efforts for extirpating heresy, enlisted the king in his service. On the 20th of May, a few days after Buckingham's head had fallen under the axe of the executioner, Henry was made to write a fierce epistle to the duke of Bavaria, arch-enemy of the Reformation, exhorting him to send Luther to the stake. The letter met with immense ridicule in Germany, inasmuch as the poor duke was but too willing to burn Luther—if he could only have caught him, in the first instance. But the reformer being under the special protection of the elector of Saxony and a powerful party of the most enlightened princes and nobles of Germany, it was not only far beyond the might of the little duke appealed to by Henry, but of the Kaiser himself, to extinguish the new doctrine in the blood of the bold enemy of Rome. Still more absurd, in view of the real ends to be attained, was Wolsey's next effort to carry favour with the college of cardinals. He instigated Henry to set his name to a pamphlet against Luther, in defence of Romish authority, and as a reply to the reformer's tracts entitled "Popedom," and "the Babylonish captivity." A really able work of this kind, coming forth under all the prestige of royal authorship, might have had some influence in directing public opinion; but the style of Henry's pamphlet was bad, the theology worse, and the reasoning worst of all, so that Luther had an easy task in keeping his ground against the new antagonist. The reply of the reformer, written with extraordinary vehemence, was given to the world together with Henry's feeble book, and had a great effect in gaining new converts to Protestantism, so that Wolsey's efforts even, in this direction went directly in favour of Luther. However, the king's vanity was satisfied by the applause awarded to his pamphlet by Pope Leo X., who, in reward for this literary service rendered to the Romish Church, bestowed upon him the title of "Defender of the Faith." By a strange anomaly, this title given to orthodox Henry VIII., and meant to be purely personal, has been retained by his Protestant successors to the present day; and the Popish fidei defensor keeps figuring on English coin now that England professes to ignore the very existence of the pope of Rome.

The conferment of the title "Defender of the Faith" was one of the last acts of Pope Leo X. His nephew, the Cardinal de Medici, on the 24th December, 1521, sent Wolsey the news of his death, together with the fidei defensor bull, signed by the trembling hand of the dying pontiff. The long-expected event had come at last, and Wolsey without delay put forth all his strength to grasp the coveted prize. Kaiser Charles had formally given his promise to support Wolsey's elevation to the papacy with all the influence at his command, and my lord cardinal had some reason to believe that a number of other voters, purchased at far above the ordinary market price, would not fail to secure his election. The cardinals, thirty-eight in number, assembled in conclave on the 27th of December, three days after the death of Leo X., to go through one of the most heated contests that had ever taken place for the papal chair. The struggle lasted full fourteen days, the greater part of the time being spent in the most disgraceful scenes of riot and disorder. On the first day, the cardinals having been locked up in their little cells, sixteen feet long and ten feet broad, the name of Giulio de Medici came out of the scrutiny; but as he had only eighteen votes, and twenty-six were necessary for the required majority of two-thirds, there was no result. Other names were brought forward on the second, third, and fourth days, among them that of Wolsey; but all obtaining fewer votes than even Cardinal de Medici. Beyond the few individuals gained over by his gold, Wolsey found no supporters, and it became clear at once that the Imperial party had not received the instructions which were promised by the Kaiser to my lord cardinal. This party was bent upon seating Adrian, cardinal of Tortosa, and early tutor of Charles V., upon the pontifical throne; but not being sufficiently numerous to gain their object at once, the zealous Imperialists had to spend many days in preliminary sham-fights, to the no slight distress of the aged members of the conclave. On the fifth day of the contest, in accordance with ancient custom, the cardinals were deprived of a portion of their allotted food, which made them more fierce than ever, leading to all but hand to hand fight. Wolsey's friends now succeeded in bringing him forward once more; but as the first scrutiny gave him only nine, and the second—three hungry men coming over into the camp—only twelve votes, further exertion was deemed hopeless. At the end of a week, with victuals constantly diminishing, according to rule, the caged ecclesiastics went into fury, ready to tear each other to pieces. The Imperialist party alone stood firm, like a rock, ready to undergo martyrdom for Kaiser Charles and his tutor. It was in vain the weaker members of the conclave asked the small favour of having their cells cleaned of the filth accumulated therein, and which was beginning to give out a horrible smell; even this was denied, and they were told that they must suffer either or vote for Adrian. Thus passed the first week of the new year, and the second commenced: the hunger of the cardinals becoming more fierce every day, and more fierce the stench. But every day brought a couple of new names for Adrian into the golden chalice representing the ballot-box, till at last, on the morning of the 9th of January, 1522, there arose the cry of twenty-six voices, Papam habemus—“we have a pope.”

The news of the election of Adrian was received with assumed indifference by Wolsey, though he could scarcely help seeing that he had been deceived by the emperor. But my lord cardinal, astute as he was, had not one half the craft of that young man of twenty, on whose head lay the crowns of Germany, of Spain, and of the Netherlands, and whose heart was stirred by mightier ambition than that of any living man. There was in Wolsey somewhat of the supercilious vanity which so greatly distinguished his master. Successful as he had been in his career, he held himself a match for all the world, and his mind was unable to conceive the idea that that young Charles, in his simple woollen jerkin, so devoid of pomp, so unaffected in speech, and apparently so trustful, should be leading him as a child leads an elephant. Therefore, greatly annoyed as he was by the result of the papal election, Wolsey allowed himself to be easily pacified by new promises, couched in soft language. At an audience given to the English ambassador, Sir Richard Wingfield, on the 11th of February, a month after the election, Kaiser Charles was particularly mollified in tone. He informed Sir Richard that he considered the new pope to be both so old and sickly as to make it probable that he would hold the office but for a very short time. “Wherefore,” reported the ambassador, “his majesty prayeth you, in most hearty manner, that ye will cherish yourself, and have his causes and necessities as surerities for being recommended, as he intendeth verily, when the case shall require, to do his best for your advancement in the matter.” It was the old bait all over; but Wolsey was once more duped, and resolved to spend English blood and treasure for the “causes and necessities” of Kaiser Charles.

The trouble taken by Charles to propitiate my lord cardinal was not at all unnecessary, for his majesty was more than ever in want of English help. The great struggle for empire between him and his French rival had already commenced, but as yet not spread very far; and to fan the smouldering fire into the immense flame of European war, the active assistance of liberal England—liberal with her gold as with the life-blood of her sons—was urgently required. Some months previous, in October, 1521, Charles had succeeded in getting from Wolsey a treaty of alliance, binding Henry to invade France with a large army, under the frivolous pretence of having refused the arbitration of England in the contentions with the Kaiser. It was an important point of this treaty that the marriage contract between the French and English babies, the daughter of Henry and the son of

Francis, should be broken “for the common good of Christendom,” and that the English baby should be united to Kaiser Charles—stephew of baby’s mother. The arrangement seemed a monstrous one, and not likely to be fulfilled, and King Francis, therefore, had not given up all hopes that the peace with England which he so much desired might yet be secured. He was well aware of the bribe by which Charles had secured his own ends; and seeing the treachery of his rival in carrying out the promises made to Wolsey, he sent fresh ambassadors to England as soon as the election of Adrian had become known. The ambassadors did their best to prove to both Wolsey and Henry that they were being duped by the Kaiser; but their words were not listened to, and they got nothing but fine compliments in return for their offers. So great was the cardinal’s vanity as to his diplomatic skill, that he thought himself able to hide from the French government the treaty made with Charles a few months before, and which had become known at Paris at the very moment; and while treating, now once more, with the ambassadors of Francis, he made it a point to assure them of his peaceful intentions, and of the great love he bore for the king, their master. The affection was justified in so far as Wolsey continued to draw his French pensions, and was most unwilling to give them up; and to carry on deception as long as possible, he did not put a stop to commercial intercourse with France, and allowed even a number of vessels, in which the king was largely interested, to go to Bordeaux and other French ports. But the crooked policy of my lord cardinal failed entirely this time, besides proving, as usual, extremely expensive to England.

While still treating with the ambassadors of Francis, under endless protestations of friendship, Wolsey was making secret preparations for a descent upon the French coast. Of all this, notwithstanding the cardinal’s honeyed hypocrisy, Francis was thoroughly well informed, and kept watching the course of affairs from a distance; till at last, utterly disgusted with the deceit practised upon him, he resolved to be the first to strike. Early in May, 1522, he suddenly laid an embargo upon all English ships in French ports, proclaiming at the same time, for his justification, the treaty made between England and the Kaiser for the invasion of France, and the double-dealing of Henry and his cardinal-minister. The cause was certainly more than sufficient to justify the measure: this, however, did not prevent Henry from flying into a great rage at the news of it. That English ships should have been confiscated, he might have borne; but that his own ships, freighted with costly wines and other luxuries for the royal table, should be seized, was more than he could stand. In his violent passion, he ordered the imprisonment of the French ambassador and of all other Frenchmen in London, and the instant despatch of a challenge to the king of France. With an eye for display even in the height of his royal rage, Henry commanded further that Clarendoux king-at-arms, noblest of heralds and best dressed, should bear the letter of defiance, got up for the occasion in a style befitting his dignity. Francis received the gorgeous messenger with quiet dignity, not unmixed with a shade of sadness. The king had just before given a parting audience to Sir Thomas Cheyney, the English ambassador, to whom he was able to speak more freely than to the embroidered herald. "In Henry," he said, "he had been more mistaken than in any man he ever met; he had believed him a staunch friend, and was sorry to find him now a disguised foe, insincere even in his animosity; but," he added, "as he lost him once, he made a vow that he would never win him again as long as there was breath in his body." After a few more words, expressing contempt for Wolsey, the king bade farewell to Sir Thomas; and having despatched, with very little ceremony, the handsome herald on his return journey, he took his horse and galloped away westward. There was a rumour that the invading force from England was about to land in Normandy, and Francis felt anxious to be first in the field—this time not a Field of Cloth of Gold.

The swift movements of the French king had taken Wolsey somewhat by surprise, for his own calculations were that the actual war should not begin till at the end of another few months, after certain important money matters had been settled with the emperor. To lose a few thousand men in battle, through imperfect preparations, would not have signified much; but to lose the French pensions, without an equivalent in Spanish revenue, was a question of a very different and far more important kind. To solve the difficulty, Wolsey wrote urgent letters to Charles to come on a visit to England, hinting that the contest of arms could not begin before a personal interview had taken place. The Kaiser was too anxious for the success of his great schemes not to comply at once, and on the 26th of May—three days before Clarenceux king-at-arms made his appearance at the French court—the imperial fleet threw anchor at Dover. My lord cardinal, this time, did not go out in a barge to receive the Kaiser, as he had done a few years before, but awaited his coming, in great state, at the landing place, and from thence walked with him arm in arm to the castle, where a long interview took place. The result was a treaty, formally signed and sealed, by which an annuity of nine thousand crowns of gold was settled upon Wolsey, expressly as an indemnity for the loss of his French pensions, and exclusive of two other allowances, of five thousand and of three thousand ducats respectively, granted two years before, upon the nominal holding of some Spanish bishoprics. These matters having been arranged, King Henry was called upon the scene to fulfil his functions of entertaining the august visitor during the month he was to stay in England. The entertainments were, as usual, regardless of expense, in the style which twelve years' experience had made more and more familiar to Henry. A liberal grant from parliament, for war purposes, had fortunately filled the otherwise empty royal exchequer, just in time for the fêtes; and Wolsey employed whatever leisure he had in extorting more money from rich merchants, particularly of the city of London, casting into prison such of them as were unpatriotic enough to refuse their cash. Thus the progress of his imperial majesty through England turned out such a marvel of splendour as had not been seen in the world since the famous Cloth of Gold affair. Henry's expressions of friendship and of brotherly love towards Charles were more numerous even than those exchanged with Francis a few years before; and the two went so far as to receive the sacraments together, and swear faith to each other at the foot of the altar. After that, Wolsey blessed the sovereigns at Windsor, pronouncing benediction as sweetly as he had done on a similar occasion in the wooden cathedral at Ardres. With the cardinal's blessing upon them, the royal friends parted, Henry for Greenwich, and Kaiser Charles for Southampton, where the sails of a hundred English vessels were fluttering in the breeze to carry him to Spain.

The king of France had not to wait long for the coming invasion, which, as expected, took place in Normandy. Immediately after Wolsey had arranged his little treaty with the Kaiser, orders were given to the earl of Surrey to put to sea; not, however, to land an army, but to ravage the coast of France. It was an ungracious task for the victor of Flodden Field, but, dumb soldier that he was, he had to obey it. On the 13th of June, while Henry and Charles were feasting at Hampton Court, an English force was landed near Cherbourg, which burned and devastated the country for miles around, and then took ship again. The invaders next descended upon Morlaix, a prosperous town of Brittany, which was entirely sacked and given up to pillage. Filled with booty, the fleet now returned to Southampton, to embark Kaiser Charles, and see him safely to Spain. Large as was the escort, it was not by any means too numerous, for the French galleys kept hovering round about, anxious to pounce upon the pale young man whose ambition was setting the world in flames, and whose capture to them was worth more than that of the whole English fleet. But the earl of Surrey took good care of his illustrious passenger, landing him at the port of St. Andero on the 16th of July. He then returned to Calais to take the command of the army of invasion, consisting of about ten thousand English troops, besides five thousand Flemings and Spaniards under Count Buren. But the invasion even now was a mere marauding expedition, disgraceful alike to the English government and to Kaiser Charles. Representative of the latter was his aunt, the duchess of Savoy—buxom widow once sought after by Henry VII.—who harboured an old grudge against King Francis, and who now sought feminine revenge in the ruin of his poor subjects. However, the lady, with all her hatred, did not forget her personal interests; and there being in these northern parts of France some private property belonging to her family, she gave careful instructions to Surrey to keep his hands off the estates thus distinguished. "We have thrown down and burnt a goodly castle," the earl of Surrey wrote to Wolsey in August, "and have burnt divers other small holds; and I have in our hands another goodly castle called Torfyn, which to-morrow shall likewise be thrown down and burnt. It is said to be a marvellously good house. Some towns and villages of this country, which is Artois, do pay rent to the emperor; wherefore my lady of Savoy has written to me in no wise to burn them." When hearing of these exploits, Francis exclaimed, in sorrowful tone, "the English were soldiers once, but now they are robbers."

The inglorious invasion of France ended as it began. After sitting down before Hedin, "the weakest place on the frontiers," for full six weeks without taking it, the earl of Surrey had to turn back to Calais. Demoralized by plunder, his host had become a mere rabble, unfit for anything else but the burning and sacking of defenceless villages. But revenge followed closely on the heels of the marauders, and they were punished for their own crimes. The fertile country had been laid waste to such an extent, that Surrey, on his retreat, found himself without provisions; and, heavy rains coming on, and the roads getting impassable, many thousands sank down exhausted in the bare fields which they had helped to turn into a wilderness. They might have been cut down to a man, the population all around being bitterly hostile, but that there was no pursuit by regular troops, the whole of the French army finding itself engaged in the south, whither Francis had turned immediately after leaving Normandy, not expecting the English to do more than attack a few places on the coast. Francis at this moment was assailed not only by a crowd of external enemies, but betrayed by his own friends, including the first subject in the kingdom. Prince Charles, duke of Bourbon, a member of the royal family, and who held the high post of constable of France, had been dissatisfied for some time with the treatment received at the hands of the king; and, to vent his anger, entered into secret correspondence with the Kaiser, as well as with Wolsey, promising to stir up a civil war in his own country. Francis early received information of this correspondence; but loyal as was his own mind, and abhorrent of all deceit, he refused to entertain the belief that the duke, young and chivalric like himself, could harbour such base schemes. But on the information being repeated, the king, with right royal frankness, if somewhat imprudent, resolved to investigate the matter personally, and to this end paid a visit to Bourbon, at the moment when the Anglo-Flemish invading army started from Calais on their course of devastation. The constable was staying at Moulins, in the Bourbonnais, when Francis came to see him, and, feigning illness, immediately took to his bed. With the utmost generosity and kindness, Francis went to the couch, took his relative by both hands, and looking him straight in the face, told him that he had been accused of being a traitor, and that papers bearing his signature had been seized, revealing treasonable correspondence both with the cardinal-minister of England and the Emperor Charles. Bourbon, master in hypocrisy, did not shrink under the gaze of the king, but denying on oath all accusations made against him, spoke with so much earnestness bearing the semblance of truth, that Francis felt almost ashamed of ever entertaining mistrust against his friend. An hour afterwards, Francis having left to place himself at the head of the army in the south of France, the constable received Wolsey's envoys, urging him to betray his confiding master at once, and offering money to entice the troops to desertion. Bourbon hesitated, overcome with scruples about the career of infamy he was entering upon; but, urged more and more, with his old feelings of disappointed ambition fanned into the flame of hatred, he at last declared himself ready to enter the list of the enemies of France. At the hour of midnight he left his house in disguise, accompanied by only one confidential servant, and after many adventures, being more than once on the point of falling into the hands of the troops sent in pursuit after him, he succeeded in reaching the Swiss mountains. From here he wrote to King Henry, offering him, most liberally, the crown of France.

Bourbon's schemes for the invasion and ultimate division of his country—of which he intended to hold a large part, under the suzerainty of the king of England—were to the effect that France should be attacked, at the same time, from three sides:—by an English army from the north-west, a German force from the east, and a Spanish army from the south. To carry out his part of the compact, Wolsey despatched to Calais, at the beginning of September, a fresh body of troops, under the command of the duke of Suffolk, Henry's brother-in-law. The devastation of the country during the expedition of the previous month seeming to forbid another march inland, it was resolved to keep near the coast, and to besiege Boulogne in the first instance. But this plan, settled by Henry, was not at all agreeable to the Flemings under Count Buren, who again formed part of the English army of invasion, and, as before, showed a decided predilection for loot. To besiege a strongly fortified city, according to all the rules of war, was not in the least to their taste; and, thinking the sack of open towns and villages the only interesting part of warfare, they openly remonstrated against the attack upon Boulogne, and their protest had to be sent to England. My lord cardinal's reply was characteristic. "As to sparing the country from burning and spoil," he wrote to the commander-in-chief, "the king thinks, that since his army shall march in hard weather, with many sore and grievous incommodities, it would not be good that they should also forbear the profit of the spoil, the bare hope whereof was great encouraging to them." Thus encouraged to plunder, fortified Boulogne was left aside, and the duke of Suffolk was dragged on by Count Buren and his Flemings, towards Paris. Meeting with little resistance by the way, and burning and pillaging towns and villages to right and left, the marauding host got within twenty miles of the French capital, where further advance was stopped by a small force under General Tremouille, who had come up in haste from the south. The inhabitants now rose in all directions to assail the invaders, and Suffolk had to wend his way back to the coast in the most inclement season of the year, with enemies hovering all around, and his allies, the Flemings, deserting him in whole companies. At the beginning of September, fifteen thousand men, in full health and vigour, had left Calais, and towards the end of December, less than three thousand pale, emaciated figures, broken by hunger and disease, staggered back into the English stronghold. Henry, who had begun to give himself airs as king of France, talked of cutting off Suffolk's head, but finally mitigated the punishment to exclusion from court—even from the court masquerades.

The failure of the second French invasion little affected Wolsey, for his whole mind was once more bent towards Rome. While Suffolk's army was marching upon Paris, there came news that Adrian's short career as pope had come to an end, and that the cardinals had once more taken to their little cells to elect a new tenant of St. Peter's chair. The news did not arrive entirely by surprise, for, in expectation of it, a couple of English envoys had been despatched to Rome some months previous. By Wolsey's instructions, given in his own handwriting, they were enjoined upon "not sparing any reasonable offers, which is a thing that amongst so many needy persons is more regarded than, per case, the qualities of the person." "Ye be wise," my lord cardinal added, "and ye wot what I mean. Trust yourself best, and be not seduced by fair words, and specially of those which say what they will, desire more their own preferment than mine. Howbeit, great dexterity is to be used. The king thinketh that all the imperials shall be clearly with you if faith be in the emperor. The young men, for the most part being needy, will give good ears to fair offers. The king willeth you neither to spare his authority, or his good money, or substance." There was no reluctance on the part of the English envoys to spare "the king's good money," and there was no reluctance on the part of the Romish cardinals to take it. As shrewdly foreseen by the head of the Church in England, the "young men" showed themselves the neediest and the greediest, and there kept flowing into their pockets such a stream of gold as had seldom ever before been seen at Rome. Thirty-nine cardinals assembled in conclave, and all having taken solemn oaths against simony, condemning their souls to eternal perdition if selling their votes for money, they went praying into the cells. The contest, meek at first, waxed gradually more fierce, extending altogether over more than seven weeks, and ending in open battle between the factions indoors and out of doors. Cardinal de Medici, head of the Ultramontane party, and determined opponent of all measures of reform, came out of the first scrutiny with seventeen votes, and eighteen out of the second; but here he stopped, although his partisans declared at once their firm determination to elect him and nobody else. For the next four days, the names of cardinals Colonna and Jacobatius alternately found many friends, but each remained far from the requisite majority. The sufferings entailed by reduction of food after the fifth day had no perceptible influence on the heat of the struggle; and the orthodox faction, including the imperialists, kept as stoutly in favour of de Medici, as the rest, composed chiefly of cardinals under French influence, opposed it. As to Wolsey, his name was barely mentioned in the conclave, he being evidently regarded with equal aversion both by the French and the imperialist cardinals. The trusty envoys from England described his failure to him in soothing terms. "It is true," they wrote, "that during the discord and dissension among them, your grace's friends did attempt and made at sundry times motions effectually for your preferment, sed semper parum feliciter, for the multitude of them would never incline thereunto, nor hear of it." For more than a month the golden chalice went round among the cardinals, and all voting being found resultless, there commenced an actual struggle among them. Meanwhile, the populace of Rome, excited to the highest pitch, kept battering at the doors, and the electors were told that unless they did bring out de Medici as pope they would be torn to pieces. Still the French cardinals stood out resolute, declaring on their part that they durst not support an imperial prelate even if their lives were at stake; and de Medici himself declared that "he would rather die in that prison than condescend to his capital enemies the French." However, these professions of martyrdom remained unfulfilled; life still retained its sweetness, even at a modicum of victuals, and with smells which sickened all but the strongest. On the forty-ninth day of the conclave the cardinals made up their minds not to die, but to get out of their prison, to eat, and to live. There was a tremendous shout of all Rome, when on the 19th of November, 1523, proclamation was made from the windows of the Quirinal that Cardinal de Medici had been elected pope, and declared his intention to reign as Clement VII. It was a great hour for England, a great hour for religious emancipation all over the world, that in which Clement VII. ascended the papal throne.

The influence of the papal election was felt before long through the whole of Europe, but first of all in the relationship between England and Kaiser Charles. Blinded as Wolsey was by his monstrous vanity, he could not help perceiving now that he was being befooled by the emperor, and that the latter had no more intention of helping him to the Roman tiara than of offering him his own diadem. This conviction once acquired, the cardinal's policy took a sudden turn, and, with the view of abandoning Charles, he began looking kindly towards Francis. The latter was but too anxious to accept the proffered hand of friendship, being overwhelmed by misfortune on all sides. While the adherents of Bourbon were working hard to stir up insurrection, and the constable himself was standing at the western frontiers at the head of a considerable force in the pay of the emperor, a large Spanish army, under the Marquis Pescara, came marching along the shore of the Mediterranean, laying siege to the city of Marseilles. The siege lasted from November, 1523, to August, 1524, and notwithstanding many fierce assaults, the citizens bravely held their own. In the meanwhile, encouraged by the friendly disposition of Wolsey, and ceasing to fear another English invasion, Francis was enabled to withdraw his troops from the north-west, and to direct them upon the south. Having collected a numerous army at Avignon, he easily drove the besiegers from Marseilles into Italy, and, in the flush of victory, followed them beyond the Alps. His old dreams of conquest once more enticed the royal knight into the fatal land—tomb of so many of his soldiers. The troops of Charles fled before him, and he sat down with the main body of his army to besiege the strong fortress of Pavia. Here he lost some precious months, and the coming winter brought hunger and disease into his camp. Suddenly, in February, 1525, Bourbon appeared in the field at the head of twenty thousand troops, and on the twenty-fourth of the month offered battle to Francis before Pavia. A fierce conflict ensued, one of the most sanguinary battles ever fought on the red soil of Italy, and the result was the utter destruction of the French army and the capture of the king. From his prison, an hour after the battle, Francis wrote to the regent of France, his mother Louise, one short line: Tout est perdu, sauf l'honneur—All is lost, save honour.

The news of the battle of Pavia and the capture of Francis caused great joy to Henry, but great consternation to Wolsey. For several months past, the cardinal had been in secret negotiations with the French court, carried on through the instrumentality of one Joachimo, a shrewd Italian, high in favour with Francis's mother. Of these negotiations, however, Henry knew nothing, and Joachimo, who passed as a foreign merchant, lodging at a humble dwelling in Blackfriars, held intercourse with no one but Wolsey himself. This gave rise to an extraordinary divergence in the actions of king and cardinal, which went to show once more the real ruler of England. All the vanity of Henry was roused by the sudden prospect that the crown of France, so liberally offered to him by the duke of Bourbon, might be easily obtained through the imprisonment of the French king; and a royal ambassador was despatched at once to concert measures with Kaiser Charles for a speedy invasion of the kingdom. Wolsey put no obstacles to the departure of Henry's ambassador, but he neither ceased his own secret negotiations with the mother of Francis, and the result was that the royal mission proved utterly futile. Charles, through his spies, was well informed of Wolsey's movements, and no man knew better than the Kaiser in whose hands the power of England was resting. Consequently he received Henry's envoy in a very cold and almost haughty manner, declining the proposed joint undertaking. It now was the king's turn to be offended, which was just what Wolsey wanted. Stirring up the royal conceit to the desired pitch, he easily persuaded Henry that it was the extraordinary and quite unexpected success of the Kaiser which had given rise to his haughtiness, and that, having exploited the goodwill of the sovereign of England as long as necessary, he was now beginning to scorn it, as of little further use. Arguments such as these could not fail to have a great effect upon Henry, who, like all little minds, measured other men's motives after the standard of his own. Thus things went on quietly, Henry's ambassador still residing in full grandeur at the court of Madrid, and Wolsey's secret envoys busily engaged in undermining the alliance with Madrid at the court of Paris, presided over by the anxious mother of Francis. There was no doubt as to the ultimate result of my lord cardinal's mining operations; however, the most intense astonishment was created all over Europe when the sudden news spread forth that an offensive and defensive alliance had been concluded between the deeply humiliated French government and the king of England, supposed to be on the point of invading France. It was an alliance utterly inexplicable to most men, except on the supposition of its being a grand effort of diplomatic skill to re-establish the Balance of Power, made unbroken at the battle of Pavia. Wolsey was not at all displeased with this supposition, some of the honour of which he allowed to reflect upon his poor master. For a time, Henry was intensely proud of holding the Balance of Power, little doubting but that the scales were kept fixed by the fascination of his royal eyes.

The treaty with France, signed on the 30th of August, 1525, completely changed the political aspect of Europe. To the Kaiser, whom the battle of Pavia had made master of half the civilized world, it was a great calamity; but as great an advantage to France, although the terms were somewhat costly. Wolsey, happening to be in great want of cash, his own and Henry's amusements getting more and more expensive, had stipulated for the payment of the enormous sum of 2,000,000 crowns of gold, in six monthly instalments, and a subsequent annual pension of 100,000 crowns. In return for these immense sums, Wolsey engaged not only to assist France whenever attacked, but to use all his efforts to obtain the release of Francis from captivity. The latter was the most urgent object to the motherly heart of Regent Louise, and she left no means untouched, and spared no bribes, to induce the cardinal in setting earnestly to work to gain this point. It was no easy matter, however, for Charles guarded his prisoner with great jealousy, expecting for ransom little short of a kingdom. After keeping Francis for three months at the strong castle of Pizzighitona, near Pavia, he ceased to believe him safe even there, seeing that a strong Italian party, headed by the new pope, were claiming the king as their prisoner as much as his own. To secure his prize, the Kaiser ordered that Francis should be secretly taken to Spain; and, complying with the instructions, the prisoner was conveyed by his keepers, through lonely lanes and byways, to Genoa, from whence a ship of war brought him to Barcelona. The indignation of the army under Bourbon, composed chiefly of Germans and Italians, at this act, which they looked upon as treachery, was so great, that they broke out in open mutiny, to quench which the constable promised to go to Spain in person, to remonstrate with the Kaiser. Meanwhile, Francis had been taken from Barcelona to Madrid, where he was kept in the most rigorous confinement. All offers from France to pay large sums of money for his release having failed, Regent Louise next hit upon a singular plan for obtaining her object.

Her daughter Margaret—known to literature as Margaret de Valois, authoress of some charming volumes of tales in the Boccaccio style—had just become a widow, and being much beloved by her brother, the captive king, it was resolved that she should pay him a visit, interceding at the same time in his favour with Kaiser Charles. It was a rather unusual embassy; but the hopes set on it by maternal Louise were not at all unusual. Margaret was highly accomplished, and, by universal consent, one of the greatest beauties of the age; and there were fond hopes that her sweet eyes would have power enough to bewitch the proud Kaiser, greatest monarch of the world, twenty-five years old, and still a bachelor. The fair ambassadress, accompanied by a boy of beautiful attachés, among them a certain Anne Boleyn, native of England, embarked at the little port of Aiguemorte, in September, and, travelling overland from Barcelona, reached the imperial court at Toledo early in October. Her application to see her royal brother was refused by the Spanish Government; but Kaiser Charles, against the advice of his ministers, consented to give her an audience. They met, the two, the greatest monarch, and the fairest princess of Europe. Margaret, flushed with anxiety, was surpassingly handsome; but the Kaiser looked at her with his cold grey eyes, till the very blood seemed to freeze in her veins. Her passionate eloquence, pleading for the life and liberty of a brother, found no other answer but a few measured words of politeness. Accustomed to adulation, Margaret at length rushed away, frightened almost at the icy tone of the young monarch. The next day she left the imperial court, without taking farewell, deeply humiliated at having come so far and gained so little. On the road, Margaret met the imperial train, going on a hunting expedition, with Charles in the distance caressing his dogs. Then she blushed and she sighed—the poor little French princess.

Wolsey's efforts to obtain the release of Francis had not much direct result, but proved successful in an indirect manner. Gold opened the gates of the king's prison to a couple of French priests, who came with a special message from the cardinal, to tell Francis how to get again into the open air. It was simply to consent to all the conditions laid down by Kaiser Charles, and not to fulfil a single one when once out of prison. A little perjury, the king was told, would easily be forgiven by the Holy Father at Rome, who already was deeply incensed at the independent manner in which the Kaiser carried on his Italian affairs. Francis eagerly listened to the words of the priests, though feeling some repugnance to follow their advice. It was probably not the crime of perjury itself which made him hesitate, for the age was rife with it, and there scarce lived a king or minister who had not committed it a hundred times over in his lifetime; but Francis feared the opinion of the world about his own false oath. He knew that he was looked upon as the model knight of France, successor of the "fearless and blameless" Bayard, and to lose this character seemed worse than death. However, life-long imprisonment appeared still worse; and, seeing no other means, Francis at last offered all the oaths demanded of him. Accordingly, on the 14th of January, 1526, three months after the unsuccessful embassy of his beautiful sister, and eleven months after his capture on the field of Pavia, Francis swore that he would surrender the rich province of Burgundy to the emperor; that he would give up his suzerainty over Flanders; that he would reinstate the duke of Bourbon in his former position; and that he would for ever abandon all attempts of conquering Italy. These were the principal conditions of the treaty, called of Madrid. Some minor clauses, likewise sworn to by Francis, bound him to marry the Kaiser's sister, Eleanor; to pay a considerable sum as war indemnity; and, finally, to deliver himself up again at Madrid if not able to fulfil the whole of these promises. Not trusting entirely to the oath of his royal prisoner, pink of French chivalry, Charles moreover stipulated that the two children of the king, boys of tender age—the mother having recently died—should be given to him as hostages, to be kept till the complete execution of the treaty. All being settled, with a profusion of solemn affirmations on both sides, Francis was led to the Pyrenees, and having witnessed, at the frontier bridge between Fontarabia and St. John de Luce, the delivery of his two little children into the hands of the Spanish commander, he himself was allowed to get across into his own territory. Joy at his liberty for the moment overcame his paternal feelings of regret, and, bestriding his Arab horse, he galloped away, crying: "Once more I am a king."

The release of Francis, after all, proved but a fortunate escape. At the last moment Charles was made acquainted with the machinations of the French priests, and sent an express to the frontier to detain the king. But the latter had passed across the bridge into France an hour before the arrival of the courier, and was speeding away like lightning towards Bayonne. Almost the first person he met here was Dr. Taylor, a learned jurist, envoy of Cardinal Wolsey. His special mission was to persuade the king not to hesitate to break the treaty made with the Kaiser, as it had been entered into under compulsion. There was not much persuasion needed, for Francis at once declared freely that he had no intention to carry out any part of the agreement relating to a cession of French territory. As to the rest, he was willing to take the advice of his ministers, not forgetting, however, that his children remained as hostages in Spain. Following his instructions, Dr. Taylor remained in the suite of the king, making interminable speeches in bad Latin, until arrived at Paris, where the embassy was strengthened by Sir Thos. Cheyney, specially deputed to offer congratulations, and, what was more important, to propel the French government into war with the emperor. Charles of late had been imprudent enough to give vent to his opinions about Wolsey in bitter speeches, which, on being duly reported to England, had the effect of raising against him the deadly animosity of the cardinal. To bring about a league of all the European powers against the Kaiser now became his great object, for which he worked with restless energy. Meeting with some reluctance in the French king to engage in immediate war, Wolsey addressed himself to the pope, who listened more readily to his propositions.

Clement VII., though as cardinal a zealous imperial partizan, had ever since his accession to the pontifical throne shown himself the determined enemy of the ambitious projects of Charles, and when the battle of Pavia threatened to lay all Italy at his feet, had been bold enough to make open stand against the Kaiser. Italian by birth, and intensely national in all his aspirations, the great policy of the new pope was to allow no foreign power to get too much influence on the soil of the peninsula, and to insure this end as much as possible by the mutual opposition of conquerors. But now Charles alone was to be feared. Possessor in his own right of the realms of Naples and Sicily in the south, and of Milan, Genoa, and the country of Este in the north, with his armies overrunning the rest of Italy, he had reduced the influence of the remaining nominally independent states to a mere shadow, and the temporal power of the Church into nothingness. To enfranchise himself from this thralldom, Clement was ready to risk everything, even to his own life. He thus eagerly listened to Wolsey's proposals, requiting the zeal of the cardinal by a renewal of his legatine dignity, with greatly increased powers, such as to constitute him the absolute and irresponsible head of the Church within the English dominions. But the eagerness of the pontiff drove him into imprudent rashness; for before the king of France had declared himself, and even before Wolsey had openly given his adhesion, Clement formed a league with the republics of Venice and Florence, for the express purpose of crushing the power of Charles on Italian soil. It was again a "Holy League;" and the king of England had the presidency offered to him, with a speculative share in Neapolitan spoil, on the sole stipulation of assisting with money. To induce Francis to enter the confederacy, the pope solemnly absolved him from fulfilling the conditions of the treaty of Madrid, granting to him, likewise, certain provinces in the north of Italy, in the temporary possession of the emperor. Francis, constantly thinking of his two little sons, was not in haste to cross the Alps, but kept temporizing; and seeing this, Kaiser Charles determined to show the Holy Father his iron hand. In the autumn of 1526, a few months after the formation of the Holy League, a Spanish army, commanded by the viceroy of Naples, and in secret league with the powerful Roman family of Colonna, old enemies of the papal house of de Medici, came marching suddenly upon Rome, surprised the gates, and took possession of the city, scarcely allowing time to the pontiff to take refuge in the castle of St. Angelo. Clement would have been safe here, but that, unfortunately, the castle was only provisioned for three days; and trembling to be a martyr for lack of victuals, the pope surrendered, submitting to all the conditions laid before him. These were that he should dissolve the Holy League, should withdraw his troops from the north, and should enter into no farther hostilities against the emperor. Clement swore to all—with a mental reservation. As soon as the Spanish troops had left the city, his holiness, in an interview with the English ambassador, told the latter, "that the imperials had broken so many times their bonds with him, that he might, when he should see his time, break and not observe his with them." The example of this high morality of the head of the Church was not lost upon Christian sovereigns.

But the old weapon of perfidy, successful as it had been in the hands of many of his predecessors, was destined to be fatal to Pope Clement VII., bringing on results which sent a thrill of horror through the whole of Europe. Breaking through all the engagements entered into with the viceroy of Naples, as soon as he had recovered his liberty of action, the pontiff soon gave new grounds of complaint to Kaiser Charles; and the latter thereupon no longer hesitated to visit him with fierce punishment. The duke of Bourbon, greatest of war-captains of the age, made savage by exile and misfortune, received orders to direct his army upon Rome; to take it, and not to spare it. Under his own command at the time, there were but few troops, the imperial exchequer having fallen low; but making known the work on which he was engaged, the duke soon received reinforcements from all sides, and in the spring of 1527 he commenced his march from the plains of Lombardy, southward. The bulk of Bourbon's army consisted of German and Swiss lances, to the number of sixteen thousand, under the immediate orders of George Frondsberg, a zealous adherent of the doctrines of Martin Luther. To him it was heavenly work to march upon Rome, and to attack, to destroy, and, if possible, annihilate the great Babylon, against which the Reformer was preaching—the City of Sins, the Seat of the Antichrist. Willingly, George Frondsberg had spent the whole of his fortune to carry out this godly task; he had converted all his earthly goods into money, which was just sufficient to give a single ducat to every one of his sixteen thousand followers; and when they growled at the smallness of the pay, and wanted more, he pointed to Rome. At Milan, the men of Frondsberg united with the Spaniards under Bourbon, some ten thousand in number, and from thence the terrible host swept onward with the force of a hurricane through Tuscany, scattering the troops of the Holy League to right and left, like chaff in the wind. Hungering after loot, the Swiss wanted to turn aside upon Florence, but Frondsberg refused the demand, and the mercenaries were compelled to follow the stern leader whose eyes could see nothing but the Antichrist in front, the detestable Antichrist whom he was going to strangle. Onward he tramped with his daring band, Germans and Swiss in front, Spaniards behind, over hills and mountains, through streams swollen with rain, and over roads turned into morasses, linked together, in files of thirty and fifty, with locked hands and surrounding arms, stemming torrents in fierce embrace, with the water up to their necks, heeding neither hunger nor thirst, and cheering each other with warlike songs, till at last, on the evening of Saturday, the 4th of May, the wild brigade looked down upon the city of the Seven Hills. Encamping for the night under the walls of Rome, Bourbon wished to attack the city the next morning; but Frondsberg refused. It was Whit-Sunday, he argued, a day ordained for prayer, and on which he could not destroy aught even in Babylon. But the scaling-ladders were ready early on Monday morning; and as soon as the stars began to fade in the sky, Bourbon got his army ready for the storm, addressing them in fiery harangue. "My captains, all valorous and brave," he cried; "and you, my soldiers, whom I love: our destiny has led us here, and here we must conquer, or here we must perish. Look upon the city before you, and behold the glory of the world: grasp it, and realize all the world can offer. Not a nation but that will tremble before the waving swords of the conquerors of Rome. Conquer, and gain eternal glory; or fail, and gain eternal shame!" "Amen!" cried Frondsberg. Then the storm began.

A thick mist enveloped, like a shroud, the city of the Seven Hills on the dawn of Whit-Monday, 1527. Within the city all was noise and wild confusion: terrified priests trying to hide their treasures; women praying at the doors of churches and chapels; and excited crowds of all classes listening to the screeches of a savage figure, red-haired, naked and thin, running through the streets, and predicting that the end of the world had come. Without the walls all was silent as the grave. Bourbon's men had no artillery, and no weapons whatever to attack a fortified place; but to attack it they were not the less determined, for death was in the rear, even more than in front. Silently they crept along the walls surrounding the western suburb of Rome, till, arrived near the Vatican hill, the signal of attack was given. Bourbon himself, with lofty courage, seized the first scaling ladder, to climb the high wall, throwing a white mantle over his shoulders as a guide for his army. Already his foot was near the summit, when a priest above lowered his arquebus, and, pulling the trigger, sent him down to the ground, a corpse. The wavering mist hid the sight from the assailants; but the news of the great loss instantly flew through their ranks, creating boundless fury in every man. Wildly they rushed up the ladders, heeding neither the hail of lead from the troops in front, nor the fire of the big cannon from the castle of St. Angelo. But the guns within were stronger than the brawny arms without, and the besiegers began to feel weary and faint, their corpses thickly strewn the ground, when an unexpected event turned the scale. A small party of Spaniards, not liking the look of the scaling ladders, had crept along the walls further towards the river, till they came to a port-hole covered with dung. This they removed, and silently crawled through the opening, while a growing stream followed in their wake. All on a sudden there sprang up a fierce shout of "Spain! Spain!" in the streets of Rome, and the garrison, seized by a panic, rushed away from the walls, Renzo, the commander, in front of the flying men. Awestruck, the immense crowd, priests, population, and soldiers, fled towards the castle of St. Angelo, not a soul thinking to break the bridges over the Tiber, which would have confined the invaders to the small suburb on the western bank—the Southwark of Rome—leaving the great body of the city as defensible as ever. But on they rushed, the trembling mass, and close at their heels the soldiers of Bourbon, made frantic by the loss of their leader and four thousand of their comrades. Now the mist dispersed, the sun stood high in heaven, and Rome had a new master. The sack of the city was resolved upon, and an unexampled scene of horrors commenced. With the infuriated soldiers there came to be mingled the lowest mob of the streets, the refuse of dens of debauchery, and the liberated robbers and assassins of the prisons, all eager for theft, and more eager for murder. These and the Spaniards were the demons of atrocity which flew through the God-forsaken city. They dashed the brains of infants against the walls in sight of the mothers; they violated matrons and virgins at the foot of the altar; and extorted the secrets of hidden treasures from aged men under unspeakable cruelties and tortures. The German and Swiss lances behaved with far more humanity than the Spaniards. With the Swiss, the main object was to lay hold of as much ready cash as they could secure in their fathomless pockets; while the religious fanaticism of the Germans found vent in the milder display of ridicule against the priesthood. The rough unshaven troopers went strutting about in the state dresses of cardinals and bishops, singing profane songs, highly uncomplimentary to the Romish hierarchy. Much that they sang was true; for, according to the statement of the great historian of Italy, Luigi Guicciardini, the Rome of Pope Clement VII. was "a corrupt city, full of abominable vices." Yet before the unutterable cruelties of the invaders, even the abominable vices of the conquered were thrown into the shade. For more than a century after, Roman mothers hushed their children with the cry of "Spain"—the watchword of Bourbon's soldiery.

The news of the sack of Rome caused immense excitement and sympathy with the pope all over Catholic Europe; but was received with very remarkable indifference in England among all classes of the laity. Wolsey made some show of zeal in getting succour for the pontiff, but with not the slightest effect. According to Hall, faithful recorder of the city of London and of the signs of the times, "the king was sorry, and so were many prelates; but the commonalty little mourned for it." The common people were rude enough to say that "the pope was a ruffian," and that "he began the mischief, and was well served." The sorrow of Henry itself, Defender of the Faith, was neither deep nor lasting; and whatever there was of it was drowned in the sunshine of a fresh pair of blue eyes which had fallen upon his amorous heart. In the spring of 1527, while Bourbon's host was marching upon Rome, there arrived at the royal court at Greenwich a sweet damsel of twenty, called Anne Boleyn, daughter of a diplomatic gentleman in the English service, and great-granddaughter of a lord mayor of London who had been knighted for his virtues. Anne Boleyn, come to fill the post of lady of honour to Queen Catherine, was not without experience in the line, having been accustomed to courtly society from the age of seven, when following Henry's sister Mary into France to become the wife of Louis XII. On Mary becoming an unhappy widow, and, two months after, happy wife of a duke of Suffolk, pretty little Anne transferred her services to Queen Claude, consort of France, with whom she remained for nearly ten years. When Claude died in 1524, Mistress Anne, now seventeen years old, entered the court of Margaret of Valois, sister of King Francis, a lady alike distinguished for her beauty as for her literary accomplishments, and her Protestant tendencies in religious matters. It was in the company of Lady Margaret that Anne Boleyn went to Spain, to bewail the unfeeling nature of a bachelor Caesar, and the diplomatic failure of rosy lips and sparkling eyes. To console herself for this misfortune, the sister of Francis soon after resolved to give her hand to the landless king of Navarre, and it was this event which brought Mistress Boleyn to the court of Henry, her father having solicited and obtained for her the post of lady of honour to Queen Catherine. Anne's exquisite beauty at once attracted the king's eyes, always on the look-out for new charms, and accustomed to pleasant change in the pleasures of love. At this moment the king was particularly open to fresh impressions, Wolsey's vast political schemes preventing the necessary attention being bestowed on palace intrigues and the superintendence of the royal amusements. From his queen Henry had separated some time before, growing age, coupled with disease, making her society undesirable, and the cardinal doing his best to widen this breach for political reasons. Bent as he was now on the most intimate alliance with France, and, if possible, a war with the hated Kaiser, he found the influence of Catherine, who never forgot that she was the aunt of Charles, directly opposed to his plans; and his object, therefore, became to estrange Henry to the utmost from his wife, destroying whatever power she might still possess over him. The task was not very difficult, inasmuch as the king, besides his now personal distaste, had a great complaint against her for not having given him any male heirs, all the children she had borne, with the exception of the one daughter Mary, having died in early infancy. Henry did not cease fretting at this supposed calamity; and fretted more and more when his separation from Catherine had destroyed the last hope of a fulfilment of his wishes. Wolsey skilfully fanned the flame, and at last skilfully threw out an idea, probably long slumbering in the king's mind—divorce. The word, once spoken, took root—another wild desire in the king's voluptuous nature, and another mighty lever in the cardinal's political machine.

It was before the king had seen Anne Boleyn that the question of a divorce was discussed between him and Wolsey, and the necessary resolutions taken. The matter at first was kept profoundly secret; nevertheless it came to be bruited about in the spring of 1527, and in June following the subject was talked of in the city of London more than the sack of Rome. Henry professed to be very angry at this, and sent for the lord mayor to stop these flying rumours—means not indicated, but necessarily aerial—on pain of his high displeasure. However, the rumours grew into certainty a few weeks after, when it was announced that Cardinal Wolsey was going on a grand embassy to France, to concert measures for an intimate alliance of the two countries, which was generally understood to comprise the king's marriage with one of the French princesses. Wolsey set out from London with immense pomp on the 3rd of July, fully impressed with the importance of his mission, and utterly ignorant as yet of the existence of a little lady of honour at Greenwich who had found favour in the eyes of him for whom he was seeking a wife. The train of the cardinal consisted of no less than twelve hundred lords and gentlemen on horseback, who passed through the streets of the city three abreast, dressed in black velvet coats, most of them with large gold chains round their necks. An army of servants, in yellow livery, kept marching with this immense train, which was preceded by twenty sumpter mules, carrying the cardinal's cash and personal effects, and guarded by a great number of archers and men in armour. Wolsey himself rode in the centre, in gorgeous attire, on a mule belung with gold, his mace being borne by a nobleman, and his scarlet cloak-bag by another, both walking bare-headed at his side. In front marched two tall priests bearing silver crosses; and behind him two others, the one carrying his seals of office, and the other his cardinal's hat. Lord mayor and aldermen bowed to the ground, and the populace looked on in mute astonishment; but there were voices in the background whispering words of mingled hatred and contempt of the "butcher's son of Ipswich." It was felt instinctively by the people that the conceit of this low-born man was carrying him beyond all bounds of prudence and good sense.

Wolsey landed at Calais on the 11th of July, in more than regal state, having taken eight days in his progress from London to the coast. He left Calais with a train of knights, nobles, and pages, which filled the road for more than a mile in length, and the king of France having granted him letters patent to pardon crimes, and to open the prisons in all the places he should pass through, his slow march onward resembled a triumphant procession. At stated times he knelt down in the road, on gold embroidered cushions, to say his prayers, after which the priests swung incense on him, and besprinkled him with holy water, while he gave the people his benediction and full remission of their sins. Borne along solemnly, like a pagan god, Wolsey at last reached Amiens, at the gates of which he was met by the French king. The latter arrived unexpectedly, and seeing him approach, and his own finery as yet disarranged, Wolsey rushed into a chapel at the roadside to get into proper costume. Thence he issued in dazzling splendour, covered all over with gold and jewels; and astriding a new mule, superbly trappd in scarlet velvet, with pearls and deep golden fringes, he slowly rode forward to meet the king, who held his stirrups while he dismounted. The next day there was grand service at the cathedral of Amiens, when Wolsey had his own arm-chair, or throne, placed three steps higher than that of the king, allowing the latter—who acted throughout with all the politeness and humility of a true-bred cavalier—to wait upon him as an attendant. Thus far the cardinal carried everything before him with a high hand; but in the practical negotiations which followed on the ceremonies, he not only gained nothing, but covered himself with ridicule, in a manner visible to everybody but himself.

Wolsey's great object in this journey, undertaken with such unheard-of pomp, was twofold: to connect England and France by a double matrimonial alliance, and to forward his own views on the papacy. His plan, regarding the first, was to get Francis to consent to a definite settlement of his proposed marriage with Princess Mary, now eleven years old, and to obtain the hand of the French princess Renée, a young and very handsome lady of eighteen, sister of the deceased wife of Francis, for Henry. In both he signally failed, though exerting all his eloquence for the purpose, praising Mary as "the pearl of the world, the jewel that her father esteemed more than anything on earth;" and speaking of Henry's passionate love for Renée in terms which made the tears come into his own eyes. King Francis, too, professed to be immensely touched, and offered his word as a gentleman that he would marry the pearl of the world some day or other; only he refused to fix a day, the pearl being still so young. To Renée's marriage with Henry, also, the king had no objections whatever, provided the princess herself would consent. But the young lady, it was well known, felt not the least inclination to marry a middle-aged gentleman already provided with a wife, and rumoured to be anything but a good husband. Fair Renée, besides, was over head and ears in love with a certain young Italian, son of the duke of Ferrara, to whom she had pledged her troth, and whom she actually married a few months after. Of all this, however, Wolsey was utterly ignorant; and, while despatching long letters to Henry, descriptive of the great progress his "secret affair" was making, his pomp and his negotiations were the laughing-stock of the French court. Henry came to learn this in time, and the failure of the marriage project, coupled with the ridicule thus produced, and in which he thought himself involved, had not a little to do with the ultimate fall of the cardinal. Wolsey's grand journey into France was both the most splendid and the most fatal journey of his life.

In one respect, indeed, there were strong expectations that Wolsey's interview with Francis would lead to great results; but these also were shattered by his extreme conceit. Moved partly by political considerations, in seeing the pope a prisoner and mere tool in the hands of Charles, and partly by the doctrines of Luther, imbibed from his favourite sister, Margaret, the French king had conceived the grand idea of making his realm independent of the see of Rome, by instituting a high-archbishop, as spiritual head of a new Gallican Church. The plan was hinted to Wolsey, with implied promises that he should be appointed the first high-archbishop, with liberty to unite this dignity with a similar one in England. But the cardinal refused, almost with scorn, deeming himself already of more elevated rank than a possible high-archbishop, and not doubting that the tiara of Rome was more than ever within his reach, as soon as the power of Charles could be overthrown in Italy, and that of united France and England substituted. The cardinal's private ambition so far coincided with that of Francis as to make him seek this great result, and the war upon the emperor, therefore, was decided upon. Towards the end of September, Wolsey, after a sojourn of two months, bid farewell to the French king, and, almost at the same moment, General Lautrec crossed Mont Cenis with an army of sixty thousand men, to conquer Italy, or, as it was stated, "to deliver the pope from the hands of his enemies."

unpleasant news received from his agents. Henry's growing partiality for Anne Boleyn had become such as to attract all eyes, and Wolsey was deeply grieved to learn that his lengthened absence had contributed to complete the ascendancy of the unknown beauty over the king's mind. Some held that she was extremely virtuous, others, that she was extremely clever; but all agreed in the fact that she had refused certain offers made to her by the king, and, for once, baffled his grace in his career of easy victories over courtly charms. In virtue, my lord cardinal had not much faith, but in cleverness, male or female, he had no reason to doubt; and, considering the matter from this point of view, he felt some ground for alarm, though not sufficient to warrant extreme measures. With less than his usual circumspection, however, he contented himself with slighting the new favourite, and refusing to acknowledge her physical and mental attractions, at the same time making use of every opportunity to praise, before the king, the excessive beauty and grace of Princess Renée, whom he represented as ready to come to England as soon as the divorce had been pronounced. Henry was pleased enough. As yet, the idea of a marriage with a subject, humble attendant at the court, had scarcely entered his mind; and being incapable of real love, and impelled by little else but vanity and voluptuous passion, the possession of the high-born, beautiful bride promised by Wolsey was sufficient for all his desires. With immense impatience, the king now kept watching for further news from the beautiful princess whom he was to marry; and when, in the middle of October, three weeks after Wolsey's return, the report was made that a great French embassy had landed at Dover, all was stir and excitement at the royal court. The embassy, headed by the Marshal de Montmorency, and comprising some of the most illustrious nobles of France, duly made their appearance, and—solemnly invested the king with the order of St. Michael. At the same time Henry was informed that the fair Princess Renée had been naughty enough to give her hand and heart to a poor Italian gentleman, instead of obeying the wish of her royal brother-in-law to marry the great king now decorated with the order of St. Michael. Henry, master of dissimulation, hid his mortification under a smile, and soon after sent for Wolsey, telling him that he was determined to espouse Anne Boleyn as soon as freed from his tie of wedlock. The cardinal fell on his knees, but to no purpose: he seemed to feel the blow was coming, but could not yet see that it would be fatal.

Queen Catherine as yet had never been openly told that her husband was seeking a divorce from her. The intercourse of the royal couple, to all appearance, was as friendly as ever, and Henry, with accustomed duplicity, even increased in outward affection, and made it a point, while plotting her destruction, to greet her in loving strains, and to seat her at his side in all fêtes and entertainments. However, it was impossible that the rumour of the events in preparation should not come to the ears of the queen; and well acquainted as she was with the character of her consort and that of his chief adviser, she could not be long under a doubt as to the truth of these proceedings. But of the details she was unaware, and it was not till the summer of 1527, Wolsey being in France, that she was informed, to her intense astonishment, that the divorce against her was to be procured on the ground of the illegality of her marriage, she having previously being the wife of her husband's brother. There was something so utterly monstrous in this pretence—and the notion appeared so incredible that a man having been married eighteen years, should at the end of all this time reduce his married life to a concubinage, and its offspring as a bastard, on the pretext of a legal or theological quibble—that Catherine refused to believe it, and expressed her unbelief to the Spanish ambassador, who brought the report. But the proofs came in fast, until at last the unhappy woman could shut her eyes no longer to the fact that her husband really meant to desert her and to marry another, branding her and her daughter with infamy. Catherine was a woman somewhat narrow-minded, a bigoted Roman Catholic, and devout pupil of priestly authority. Nevertheless, she had in her all the undaunted pride of her Spanish mother, and when she learnt that her husband was applying to the pope to have his marriage annulled as incestuous, she resolved not to bend even before the head of the Church on this ground, should he decide against her. But to prevent this, if possible, she at once despatched a trusty messenger to her nephew, the Kaiser, entreating him to assist her in this distress, and to use all his influence at Rome to oppose the divorce demanded by her husband. Kaiser Charles, attached with cordial love to his aunt, and as cordially hating Wolsey, at once fulfilled the queen's desire, by simply ordering the head of the Church not to do anything whatever in the matter of the divorce without the imperial sanction. The poor pontiff, still in the grasp of the fierce legions of Spain and Germany, and with but small chances of freeing himself from their embrace, willingly consented to everything demanded by Charles. It was the first great consequence springing from Bourbon's eventful sack of Rome.

The first applications of Henry to the pontiff for a divorce met with vague and undecided replies. Clement VII. had one eye upon Madrid and the other upon the Alps, over which a French army under General Lautrec was breaking its way; and being in utter uncertainty whether Charles or Francis was likely to be beaten in the great game about to be played in Italy, he, like a prudent man, tried to keep his peace with both parties. Personally, he had not the least disinclination to divorce the monarch of England from his wife, or, if necessary, from ten wives. Far worse cases than that of this amatory King Henry had been brought for centuries past to Rome; and there was really no precedent showing why a sovereign, treating the Church with due respect, should not have his domestic affairs favourably settled at the pontifical divorce court. But, though willing enough to favour Henry to the utmost of his power, Clement was not inclined to suffer martyrdom for his sake, and, with that iron hand of Kaiser Charles upon his throat, to incur certain destruction out of sheer affability. In vain Wolsey sent envoy after envoy to urge haste in the expedition of the divorce affair. Clement promised everything and did nothing, and so skilfully kept his persecutors at bay with ever new questions, preliminaries, and preliminaries of preliminaries, that they themselves at last got utterly confused in their own minds. One morning, the two principal agents, Dr. Stephen Gardiner and Dr. Fox, who had long tried to come to a definite understanding respecting the divorce, and were now meditating their return to England, broke in upon the pope on a sudden, to get something like a clear reply from him. They were surprised to find the pontiff sitting upon a little wooden bench before the fire, with an old coverlet over his shoulders, "not worth twenty pence." On the bench there was no room for the English ambassadors, nor was there any other accommodation, so the intruders had to promise to call again the next day, with which his holiness seemed well pleased. The next day, on presenting themselves in compliance with the formal appointment made, the two stately envoys were ushered into the pope's sleeping apartment, where they found four cardinals. They all marched together into a very small bed-closet, and Clement, sitting down on the couch, with his back to the wall, quietly motioned his visitors to make themselves comfortable on little stools, placed around the bed in a circle. Here they kept talking for nearly five hours, the two envoys constantly full of their great subject, and the four cardinals as constantly driving them off at a tangent into the wide realm of politics and divinity. Sitting on their little stools, the eyes of the learned men of England began to open to the fact that they were no match for the learned men of Rome.

Like many other great questions, before and since, that of King Henry's divorce was doomed to be decided on the field of arms. The pontiff having sunk to be a mere mouthpiece of contending sovereigns, the decision lay between Charles and Francis, and the hows of fighting men which they were hurling against each other on the fair fields of Italy. At first, the impetuous onset of the French proved victorious, as in many preceding campaigns. Having passed Mont

Cenis in the summer of 1527 without much difficulty. General Lautrec began by driving the imperialist troops before him, taking Alessandria and other strong fortresses, and even that Pavia which had been so fatal to his master. Flushed with victory, the French now moved southward, along the Adriatic coast, towards the Neapolitan states, leaving Rome—still in the hands of the German and Spanish lances, under the able command of the prince of Orange, Bourbon's successor—to the west. After recruiting his strength in the fertile plains of Romagna and the Marches, Lautrec took to the siege of Naples, opening his guns upon the city on the 1st of May, 1528, about the same time when Gardiner and Fox were sitting on their little stools in the papal bedchamber. They might well have pardoned the poor cardinals, their stool neighbours, for talking politics instead of ecclesiastical law, for the fate of Rome and of the English divorce bill was depending at that moment very much more upon the proper direction of Lautrec's big guns than upon any arguments, divine or profane, bearing upon King Henry's case. The big guns did their work well at first, to such a degree that Clement despatched in haste a courier to England, declaring his readiness to accede at once to all the demands of Henry. But before a month had elapsed, a fearful pestilence broke out in the French camp, mowing down twenty thousand men in the lapse of a few weeks, among them their great leader, General Lautrec. The command now devolved upon the marquis of Saluzzi, who at once raised the siege and retired to Avorsa. His small force, still suffering from disease, was attacked here at the end of August, and had to surrender to the prince of Orange. Of the sixty thousand men led across the Alps by General Lautrec, not sixty returned to tell the tale of woe. Italy once more was lying at the feet of that silent young Caesar, insensible to French princesses, with naught but the dream of universal empire in his lustreless eyes.

While the pope was yet trying to steer the bark of St. Peter clear of the rocks of both Spain and France, and to temporize with the fearfully importunate sovereign of the western islands, there occurred events which bore the appearance that he would be relieved at least of the latter part of his trouble. In June, 1528, a dire pestilence broke out in England, simultaneously with that which ravaged in the French camp before Naples, and in many other parts of the continent. The "sweating sickness" was the name given by the English people to this fatal disease, the outward symptoms of which were described as follows by the French ambassador at London. "We have," informed the diplomatic gentleman, amiable unto death towards his government; "we have a little pain in the head and heart. We suddenly begin to sweat, and need no physician; for if we uncover ourselves the least in the world, or cover ourselves too much, we are dead in four hours, and sometimes in two or three. It is the easiest disease in the world to die of." Cheerful as was this French aspect of the "sweating sickness," its appearance created intense terror among many, and among the most alarmed was the king. On the disease breaking out at Greenwich, he fled away in great haste to Waltham, in Essex, and, not deeming himself quite safe here, to Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire. From Hunsdon he wrote to Anne Boleyn, "entirely beloved," telling her not "to let his absence displease;" adding, "for wherever I may be, I am yours;" but enjoining her at the same time not to come near him, one of her servants having died of the sickness. The king next made his will, took the sacrament, confessed his sins, and called in his physician, Dr. Potts, with whom he set to making pills, ointments, decoctions, and lotions of all sorts, offering them also to the public as "the king's own plaister." But in spite of plaisters, the pestilence got more and more fatal, and several of his servants dying, Henry was seized with a true fit of compunction. Seeking again the society of his pious queen, he commenced sharing in her devout exercises, confessed every twelve hours, and every other day made his last will and testament—thirty-nine wills altogether. Henry was fast becoming a saint, when, unfortunately, the "sweating sickness" began to abate. No sooner was all danger gone, when he packed up his pill-boxes, discharged his confessor, huffed away his wife, and began writing fresh love-letters to Anne Boleyn, his "darling joy for ever."—The respite was short, and the real troubles were yet to come for the Roman pontiff.

Notwithstanding the raising of the siege of Naples and the utter defeat of the French troops in Italy, the irrepressible English envoys did not cease way-laying Clement, till at last, fairly worn out, kept at bay in the smallest of his small bed-closets, he promised to do something for King Henry. It was the institution of a court of inquiry to examine into the validity of the royal marriage, with power to call witnesses and to deliver judgment, subject to the approval of the court of Rome. The poor pope had made this concession with tears in his eyes, bitterly lamenting, as well he might, his unhappy lot; and seeing that they could wring little more from him, Henry's ambassadors, Gardiner and Fox, accepted it. As presidents of the court of inquiry, Clement nominated Wolsey and Cardinal Campeggio, the latter an old and infirm man, suffering badly of the gout. Not to lose his prize, Gardiner himself took charge of the old cardinal, trying to hoist him along the road with the greatest possible speed. But Campeggio, shrewd Roman, with aching limbs but a clear brain, was not to be propelled in this manner; and, pleading the enemy gout as an excuse, he took his own time, full two months, to creep along from the Tiber to the Thames. In this, as in other things, the cardinal both followed his instructions, which were of a two-fold kind, open and secret. His written orders enjoined the prelate to accelerate the royal divorce as much as possible, and to do everything in his power to favour the wishes of the beloved son of the Church, King Henry, Defender of the Faith. But his private instructions, taking due priority, commanded the cardinal to keep very quiet, to travel very slowly, and to do as little as possible, and, above all, to give no offence to Queen Catherine, aunt of Caesar, commander of the legions. Thus well prepared for all eventualities, Campeggio crossed the Channel, and made his entry into London on the 9th of October, 1528, about a month after King Henry had got rid of his pills, his wife, and his confessor.

Wolsey's position became very critical with the arrival of the pontifical legate. Though the original instigator of the divorce, he had long come to repent of his scheme, seeing its partial failure, and the dire ends to which it would lead. Well laid as the plan was to make Henry break, for ever, with the Kaiser, and bring about the desired French alliance, it crumbled to pieces the moment the great bait, in the shape of the beautiful princess, began to fail; and its ruin became complete when Anne Boleyn appeared upon the scene. Wolsey now stood aghast at the plot he had been preparing, the grave he had been digging for himself. He was filling the place of a quiet elderly lady, with little influence over the king, very pious, and devoted to him as a high luminary of the Church, with a young rival, strong in the king's affections, of pronounced heretic opinions, and of cordial and undisguised hatred to himself. Queen Catherine's maid of honour instinctively hated Wolsey, and he returned the sentiment completely, feeling that he was face to face with a rival equal to, if not surpassing him in craft. Many attempts have been made, in old and modern times, to whitewash the memory of Anne Boleyn, and even to raise her on a pedestal of immaculate fame as a sufferer and a saint; but it seems impossible, looking dispassionately and without prejudice at all the facts of her short eventful career, to come to any other conclusion than that she was a woman of great cunning and of certainly low morality. Whether, as asserted by contemporaries, she got early debauched at the French court—a court famous, even at that time, for its gross profligacy—or whether she merely learnt there all the finer arts of intrigue, certain it is that the rôle she played after her arrival in Queen Catherine's household was such that the most consummate actress could not have performed it better. Her refusal to become Henry's mistress was necessarily made under one of two conditions: either she was perfectly virtuous, or she was thoroughly artful, intimately acquainted with the character of men in general, and of such men as Henry in particular. To accept the former alternative seems very difficult, inasmuch as it is inconsistent with the whole subsequent career of Anne Boleyn. She did not withdraw from the court, like a shameful maiden, after the dishonest proposals had been made, but remained in, and even sought the king's society, exchanging constant love-letters with him, exhibiting all her charms, and exerting all her power to supplant his faithful wife, and to grope her way to the throne over the ruin and misery of others. If nothing else were known of the life of Anne Boleyn, this alone would be sufficient to stamp her memory with disgrace. But the white veil of innocence has been flung over it for no other reason but that Anne Boleyn was a reformer, and weak eyes fancy to see that her taper fingers contributed to mould the new world of Protestant England. It is a narrow faith to trace the tides of the ocean into such shallow creeks—to forget a nation over a king's sweetheart. Wolsey would have gladly forgiven Anne Boleyn her Protestant heresies, if not accompanied by that worldly ambition which made her so like him, but the absence of which alone constitutes true religion.

The great drama, or melodrama, of the royal divorce court was commenced on the 28th of October, the poor Roman cardinal having been prostrate for three weeks from the gout, and unable to stand on his legs. Even now he could not keep himself well upright; but the king's amorous flame being daily fanned by his new mistress, delay was no longer possible, and the unhappy prelate was stuck into a chair of crimson velvet, and placed at Wolsey's side, on the right hand of the throne. Having made a decorous and safe speech, full of praise of royal wisdom, but leaving out the matters under discussion, Cardinal Campeggio was transported back to his lodgings, and the proceedings were adjourned to Sunday, the 8th of November. On this day the king sat in state in the great hall of Bridewell palace, and addressing a crowd of nobles, judges, and eminent citizens of London, began pleading his own case. His speech—carefully noted by Recorder Hall, who, poor soul, wrote down immediately after “as much as his wit would bear away”—was more than usually full of hypocrisy. After assuring his hearers, every one of whom knew his passion for Anne Boleyn as well as himself, that religious scruples alone had brought him to investigate the question of the validity of his marriage, with the ultimate view of a divorce, he summed up and concluded his oration as follows: “If it be adjudged,” he cried, with tearful eyes, “that the queen is my lawful wife, nothing will be more pleasant or more acceptable to me, both for the clearing of my conscience, and also for the good qualities and conditions I know to be in her. For I assure you all, that besides her noble parentage, she is a woman of most gentleness, humility, and buxomness; yea, and of all good qualities pertaining to nobility she is without comparison. So that if I were to marry again I would choose her above all women. But if it is determined in judgment that our marriage is against God's law, then shall I sorrow, parting from so good a lady and loving companion. These be the sores that vex my mind; these be the pangs that trouble my conscience; for the declaration of which I have assembled you together. And now you may depart.” What Englishmen thought of their king telling such miserable falsehoods, with not even the courage pertaining to open wickedness, it is impossible to say; but it evidently upset the “wit” of others besides Recorder Hall. Wolsey and his colleague, Campeggio, played a poor part when proceeding straightway from the meeting at Bridewell palace to the residence of Catherine, to announce to her, for the first time, that the pope had appointed a commission to inquire into the validity of her marriage. “Alas, my lords!” was the dignified reply of the queen, “can it be now a question whether I be the king's lawful wife or not, when I have been married to him almost twenty years, and no objection made before? Divers prelates and lords, privy councillors of the king, are yet alive who then adjudged our marriage good and lawful; and now to say it is detestable, is a great marvel to me; especially when I consider what a wise prince the king's father was, and also the natural love and affection my father, King Ferdinand, bare unto me. I think that neither of our fathers were so unwise and weak in judgment, but they foresaw what would follow our marriage. The king, my father, sent to the court of Rome, and there obtained a dispensation, that I, being the one brother's wife, might without scruple of conscience marry the other brother lawfully—[which license under lead under leaden seal] I have yet to show, which makes me say and surely believe, as my first marriage was not completed, that my second is good and lawful." "But of this trouble," she continued, turning to Cardinal Wolsey, "I may only thank you, my lord of York, because, I ever wondered at your pride and vain glory, and abhorred your voluptuous life, and little cared for your presumption and tyranny, therefore of malice have you kindled this fire; especially, for the great grudge you bear to my nephew the emperor, whom you hate worse than a scorpion, because he would not gratify your ambition by making you pope by force; and therefore have you said, more than once, you would trouble him and his friends—and you have kept him true promise; for of all his wars and vexations, he may only thank you. As for me, his poor aunt and kinswoman, what trouble you put me to by this new-found doubt, God knoweth, to whom I commit my cause."

Catherine's bold speech tore to pieces the whole network of flimsy argument brought forward by the king; but even on his own ground, leaving aside all questions of religion, honour, and morality, Henry had really no case for a divorce, nor as much as for an inquiry into the validity of his marriage. The king's lawyers, in their protracted quibblings and pleadings, first put the Bible into court, alleging that the marriage of a brother's wife being forbidden by God, the pope could grant no dispensation therefrom, his authority not extending over the Divine Law, but only the laws of the Church. The reply to this was that such marriage was not forbidden by God, but, on the contrary, ordained in certain cases, as in Deuteronomy, the twenty-fifth chapter and fifth verse, which commands, "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without, unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to wife." Henry's advocates, not too well read in the Bible, on hearing the Mosaic law expounded to them, dropped the theological part of their case, taking refuge in a very mean quibble about the papal dispensation. They argued that this dispensation had been obtained under false pretences, as the bull embodying it stated that the marriage of Henry and Catherine was sought for the sake of peace between England and Spain, this being untrue, as there existed actual peace. The argument was so very weak that even a king's counsel might have been ashamed to take his stand upon it, however, there was more than one in this case ready to do the royal behest. The clever French ambassador, who dilated so pleasantly on the "sweating sickness," explained to his own court the simple means at Henry's command for raising good lawyers. "The king," he said, "pays all his servants well, but is terrible in his anger, and no head so fine but he has it knocked off"—il n'y a pas de si belle tête qu'il ne ferait voter. The gay Frenchmen, envoys of Francis at the royal court, watched Henry keenly during the whole of these divorce proceedings, and did not fail to observe that in the course of the drama the king's tiger nature was fast creeping out, his chief keeper having had the taming process interrupted. The decline of Wolsey's influence was sincerely lamented by the French king, although he had a little private grudge against the cardinal for trying to negotiate the "pearl of the world," at the very moment when the pearl was to be turned into a bastard.

Wolsey, seeing his fall approaching, was well aware that to France alone he could look for help and sympathy, as, indeed, it was owing to his extreme eagerness for a French alliance that he had lost his footing on the dizzy height to which he had risen. His sole chance now of regaining his position was a great European war, the defeat of the Kaiser, and the occupation of Rome by French troops. Though Henry was blind enough to be duped by the comedy of cardinal legates in England, Wolsey knew but too well that as long as the Kaiser kept his hold upon Rome there was not the slightest chance of the pope giving his consent to the divorce; and this failing, he could not but foresee would bring him into irredeemable disgrace. Besides, his power at home depended greatly upon his high ecclesiastical dignity, and that of being the representative of the supreme pontiff; and as long as the glory of the latter was not dimmed in the eyes of the world, Wolsey might fairly hope to maintain his own grandeur, barding even such enemies as a puissant king's wife or mistress. Having thus nearly as much interest as Clement himself to free Rome from the imperial sway, Wolsey did not cease his efforts to gain this great object, and late in the year 1528, when there was a temporary lull in the divorce proceedings, he despatched two fresh envoys to the court of Francis, to urge him to another Italian war. But the king was not in the mood for fighting, his whole mind being occupied by thoughts of his two little sons, delivered up as hostages to Charles to effect his own liberation. After remaining long in almost entire ignorance about their fate, Francis had just learnt from a priest, who managed to discover their prison and gain access to them, that they were kept in a dark chamber, scantily clothed and more scantily fed, and were fast sinking into the idiotic state, playing with little dogs and making pictures in wax. The thought of his poor little children, sacrificed for his sake, fairly overcame the king. To please his English ally, and gain glory for himself, he would have gladly hurled another fifty or hundred thousand men against the walls of Naples, but to let his two little sons perish in prison was more than his heart could bear. So he sent his mother, shrewd Louise, to negotiate for peace and the delivery of his children; and she having been met at Cambray by an elderly archduchess, near relative of the Kaiser, the two diplomatic ladies arraigned the matter in a very few days. Francis, on payment of 2,000,000 crowns, got back his children; but at the same time received a wife, in the person of Eleanor, elder sister of Charles, who brought him back half the money. Thus all ended as merry as marriage bells—except for Wolsey. The peace of Cambray dashed his last hopes to the ground.

The negotiations between Francis and the Kaiser had an immediate effect upon the sittings of the pontifical Court of Inquiry. Cardinal Campeggio got another dreadful attack of gout, and reported his utter incapacity to attend to any business whatever. It was in vain that Henry offered to have him carried, as before, in a very comfortable armchair to Bridewell palace, or even to give him apartments within the precincts of the royal residence; he was deaf to all entreaties, and solemnly declared that he could move neither hand nor foot. The king got very angry, and Anne Boleyn still more; but there was no help for the matter, and legal happiness being postponed against their will, they resolved to employ the time in amusing themselves. The festive Christmas season of 1528 was spent at Greenwich with more splendour than had been exhibited for many years past; balls, banquets, jousts, and masquerades followed each other in rapid succession, and at every time and everywhere Anne Boleyn was the presiding goddess. Poor Catherine was forced to be present at most of these spectacles, enduring the mortification of seeing her servant placed in front of her, honoured with the smiles and obsequious attentions of her husband and the whole tribe of courtiers. Anne Boleyn, with shameless insolence, had commenced to give herself, even in the presence of Catherine, the airs of a real queen, holding courts of her own, and distributing patronage in Church and State, appointing ministers, bishops, and ambassadors. Her ascendancy over Henry was such, that even when he found that she paraded his love-letters in public, and was boasting of the passion she had inspired and was skilfully nursing, with proper regard for her own interests, he had nothing but the most gentle rebuke for her. To keep the royal tiger, full of vanity and conceit and thoroughly conscious of the strength of his claws, thus dancing before her, was certainly a grand feat on the part of Anne Boleyn, though a feat less resembling the work of an innocent maiden than that of a highly accomplished courtesan.

Cardinal Campeggio's gout continued into the year 1529, seemingly incurable, and threatening to become a national calamity. Henry alternately stormed and coaxed, offering the cardinal the see of Durham if he would only get better; but all to no effect, for the ugly enemy kept pinching and griping, in opposition to all divorce proceedings. The mentioning of the Durham bishopric, indeed, seemed to produce a momentary alleviation of pain; yet it lasted but a very short time, the attention of the suffering prelate being directed to the fact that his chief at Rome was able to unmake as well as to make cardinals, and that he was quite as willing as he was able. Thus passed the months of January, February, March, and April, the king's impatience passing all bounds, and venting itself in threats upon both Wolsey and Campeggio, and the despatch of envoy after envoy to Rome. The last course proved effective, to some extent, for the Roman cardinal received in May a message from the pontiff, and thereupon announced that his gout was rather better, and that he would resume the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry. The first sitting took place on the 28th of May, in the great hall of Blackfriars, the two cardinal legates presiding in great state, with their crosses and pillars. Henry appeared only by proxy; Catherine, however, came forward in person, and with queenly dignity handed in a protest against the competency of the court, appealing from its decision to that of the pontiff. The protest was passed over, and the sittings continued, with intervals, till the 21st of June, when both Henry and Catherine appeared in person, the king taking his seat to the right, and the queen to the left of the cardinals. On the crier calling, "Henry, king of England, come into court;" he answered by a loud "Here!" and then proceeded to make another speech, similar to that delivered at Bridewell, dwelling upon his deep moral and religious sentiments, and the joy with which he would welcome any decision of the court which should declare his marriage with Catherine valid, and restore her to his fond embrace. Thus pathetic harangue done, the court crier shouted, "Catherine, queen of England, come into court." The queen slowly rose from her seat, and, without looking at the cardinals, or any other person in the vast assembly, silently and trembling walked up to the king, at whose feet she threw herself. There was deep silence in the hall.

"Sir, I beseech you," began the queen, in broken English, raising her head to Henry, the tears streaming down her pallid cheeks; "I beseech you, for the sake of the love that has been between us, and for the love of God, let me have some right and justice. Take of me some pity and compassion, for I am a poor stranger born out of your dominions. I have here no unprejudiced counsellor, and I flee to you, as to the head of justice within your realm. Alas! alas! wherein have I offended you? I take God and all the world to witness, that I have been to you a true, humble, and obedient wife, even conformable to your will and pleasure. I have been pleased and contented with all things wherein you had delight or dalliance; I loved all those you loved, only for your sake, whether they were my friends or mine enemies. This twenty years have I been your true wife, and by me ye have had divers children, although it hath pleased God to call them out of the world, which has been no fault of mine. I put it to your conscience, whether I came not to you a maid? If you have since found any dishonour in my conduct, then am I content to depart, albeit to my great shame and disparagement; but if none there be, then I beseech you, thus lowly, to let me remain in my proper state. The king, your father, was accounted in his day as a second Solomon for wisdom; and my father, Ferdinand, was esteemed one of the wisest kings that had ever reigned in Spain; both, indeed, were excellent princes, full of wisdom and royal behaviour. Also, as we-seemeth, they had in their days as learned and judicious counsellors as are at present in this realm, who then thought our marriage good and lawful: therefore, it is a wonder to me to hear what new inventions are brought up against me, who never meant aught but honestly. Ye cause me to stand to the judgment of this new court, wherein ye do me much wrong, if ye intend any kind of cruelty; for ye may condemn me for lack of sufficient answer, since your subjects cannot be impartial counsellors for me, as they dare not, for fear of you, disobey your will. Therefore, most humbly do I require you, in the way of charity, and for the love of God, who is the just Judge of all, to spare me the sentence of this new court, until I be advertised what way my friends in Spain may advise me to take."

and if ye will not extend to me this favour, your pleasure be fulfilled, and, to God do I commit my cause." Having pronounced these words, Catherine arose, and slowly left the court, without paying further attention to cardinals and judges, nor heeding the voice of the crier, who kept shouting, "Catherine, queen of England, come into court!" Henry, seeing the impression his consort's touching address had made upon the whole assembly—upon all present, except him to whom it was addressed—now made another speech, lamenting his bitter fate "that his conscience should urge the divorce of such a queen, who had ever been a devoted wife, full of all gentleness and virtue." Having wiped his eyes, the sorrowing monarch then left the court, seeking the lodgings of Anne Boleyn.

The Court of Inquiry continued their sittings through the month of June, but both Wolsey and Campeggio could not help seeing that their position was becoming precarious, if not dangerous. The shrewd Italian saw it far more clearly than his colleague, and strongly urged his recall; but Wolsey kept still flattering himself that he should be able to weather the storm, the more so as Anne Boleyn had written him some very soft and very deceitful letters, employing all sorts of endearing terms. While thus amusing the cardinal, the skilful maiden was busy in gathering a strong political party around her, consisting chiefly of declared enemies of Wolsey, ready to take his place, and to hurl him into destruction. The Roman cardinal, spite of his age, was not thus easily mystified; and, declining all honours offered by Anne Boleyn and the king, rested not importuning the pope to revoke his commission, which was done at last on the 15th of July. Clement VII., in a bull issued on this day, declared that the appeal of Queen Catherine to the court of Rome had been entertained, thereby dissolving the sittings of the legatine Commission of Inquiry; and Campeggio had no sooner received this order than he bent a precipitate retreat. Announcing to the king that he had been recalled on urgent business to Rome, he took his farewell audience on the 20th of September, and immediately after hurried off to Dover, the gout, fortunately, opposing no obstacle to his rapid progress. His haste was so great that he even forgot to tie up his luggage in an orderly manner, which brought him much distress and humiliation. No sooner had the mule, which carried all the worldly fortune of Cardinal Campeggio, been started from his lodgings, when it broke down, right in the midst of one of the busiest streets of London; and all the strings having burst, there came out into the light of day such an odd collection of ecclesiastical property as had never been before seen in the city. There were bundles of old shoes, patched top and bottom; ancient garments, marvellously repaired, having done service apparently for five generations of cardinals; and strange and wonderful hats of all colours, lined with leather, and filled with roasted eggs, slices of meat, and crumbs of bread. All this the comfortable citizens beheld with amazement, knowing little of the sack of Rome and the poor pay of Roman cardinals. It was with some trouble Campeggio's servant succeeded in picking his master's property out of the London mud and bringing it to Dover, where the cardinal had the mortification of seeing his bundle unstrung once more, this time by order of the king. Anne Boleyn, having lost the royal love epistles which she had been so fond of showing to her admirers, suspected Campeggio as the thief; and Henry, at her desire, did not hesitate to order a close search of the prelate's luggage. Nothing was found however, except the goods already exhibited in London, and Anne Boleyn's quickness resulted only in making her one more inveterate enemy. Mistress Anne, though crafty enough, was but a poor match for a Roman cardinal mending his own boots and boiling his own eggs. Her love letters safely got to Rome, better cared for than the cardinal's specific bundle of clothes and provisions; and at Rome the letters securely remain up to the present day. Curious travellers may still inspect at the Vatican the little sheets on which amorous King Henry VIII. expressed his passion for fair Anne Boleyn.

Cardinal Campeggio's departure and the dissolution of the Court of Inquiry was the final signal for the downfall of Wolsey. Immediately after, Henry received him very coldly, and seeing this, the whole tribe of courtiers, old and new enemies, fell upon him like a pack of hounds. Foremost in the rank of these enemies were the dukes of Norfolk and of Suffolk—the victor of Flodden Field, and the husband of Henry's sister Mary—who both had private grudges against the cardinal, and felt strong now as the open agents of Anne Boleyn. They at once set upon Wolsey, insulting him to his face, and treating him in a manner entirely unbecoming their rank and position. Now was the time for Wolsey to show whatever real greatness there was in him, and whatever worth he possessed stripped of the royal favours. Thousands of keen eyes were fixed upon him, watching every one of his movements—a very few staunch friends to cling to his side, and a great many foes to throw him down; but all alike, in their eager interest in his fate, testifying to his importance, and as such ministering to the pride of a proud soul. Wolsey lamentably failed under this trial, sinking, not as a man overwhelmed by calamity, but like a child which has lost its toys. When, towards the middle of October, three weeks after Campeggio's departure, the two dukes came, by order of the king, to take the great seal from him, he at first peevishly refused, and afterwards complied with abject humility. With still more abjectness he made all his property, valued at nearly 1,000,000 crowns, over to the king, and, leaving his splendid mansion, York house—subsequently famous as Whitehall—sought the retreat of a mean dwelling at Esher. That it was not true humility of spirit which prompted all these acts, but base submission, springing from fear, was proved by a singular exhibition of servility on the journey from York house to Esher. Henry, in a sudden fit of generosity, sent one of his chamberlains, Sir John Norris, after the cardinal, to present him with a diamond ring, in exchange for the magnificent palace and million of property; and Wolsey was so overcome by this slight token of royal kindness, as to break out into ecstasy of joy. Jumping from his mule, he knelt down in the mud, tore off his velvet cap, which he could not untie fast enough, and with trembling lips thanked God for the mighty grace vouchsafed to him by his beloved sovereign. Lower than this, his most violent enemies could not wish him to sink—him who ruled England for half a generation, and who, more than once, held the fate of Europe in his hands.

The hounds which pursued the abject man, now sixty years old, might have well left him alone after his flight from London; but they wanted their prey, knowing no more. A bill of indictment, charging Wolsey with the breach of some old statute, of which even the lawyers were ignorant, was brought against him in the court of Star Chamber, and he was sentenced to prison. Thereupon Wolsey, quite forgetting that he was still a cardinal of Rome, and losing every atom of dignity he might be expected to possess, wrote the most abject letters to his "most gracious and merciful, and most pious sovereign lord," representing himself as a miserable, poor beggar, crawling in the dust. Henry sent a pardon to the wretched man, his bosom friend for twenty years; nevertheless, he had him arrested soon after, when travelling towards York, where he intended remaining for the future, devoting himself to his ecclesiastical functions. Wolsey had gone as far as Cawood castle, near Leeds, when the earl of Northumberland, one of the lovers of Anne Boleyn, suddenly broke in upon him with a number of armed men, exclaiming, "I arrest you for high treason." He stood motionless for a moment, as if bereft of sense and reason, and then sank to the ground under a flood of tears. The stroke was fatal. Carried along a prisoner, he reached Leicester Abbey on the evening of the 10th of November, and found a file of monks, with flaming torches, at the gate. "Father," whispered Wolsey to the superior, "I am come to lay my bones among you." Within the abbey, Kyngston, lieutenant of the Tower, was waiting to carry the prisoner to the great gael, tomb, and palace of English kings. But he was spared the trouble of carrying Wolsey. The cardinal gradually sank, and as the clock was striking eight, on the morning of the 29th of November, 1530, he closed his eyes for ever. His last words, addressed to the lieutenant of the Tower, were "Had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, He would not have given me over in my grey hairs." It was the truest speech Wolsey uttered in his life.

The government of England was now in the hands of Anne Boleyn and her friends, for the king kept amusing himself as much as ever, with time for little else but hunting, feasting, dancing, gambling, and masquerading. Wolsey's fall had brought him into possession of a splendid fortune, which he sadly wanted, but which he managed to spend in the shortest possible time. When Wolsey's chamberlain and faithful friend, Cavendish, brought him the news of his master's death, the king was hunting in Hampton Court park, a domain which had been given to him by the cardinal, and where, of all places in the world, he might have been expected to evince some regard for his memory. However, Henry, to whose heart pity and sympathy were utter strangers, evinced no feeling at the news received, but eagerly questioned the messenger respecting some money, about fifteen hundred pounds, which he fancied

Wolsey had put aside. Having got full information of all he wanted to know, the king continued his hunting, discharging the mournful servant with a smile. Money was the thing now most required by Henry, and to obtain the means for continuing his career of vice and extravagance, he left his ministers to do what they liked. The duke of Norfolk was the chief of the new cabinet, sharing his power with the duke of Suffolk and the father of Anne Boleyn, who in a short time had risen from plain Sir Thomas to Viscount Rochford and earl of Wiltshire. These three noblemen managed to grasp the actual power as it fell from Wolsey's hands, and carried the government on for a while, though with a faint and growing consciousness of not being entirely fitted to superintend the administration of a kingdom. Willing to retain the honours and to transmit the duties, they kept looking out for able men, and were fortunate enough to discover several, the first being Sir Thomas More, the greatest literary genius, and, in many respects, one of the most remarkable men of the age. Sir Thomas, born in 1480, in Milk Street, Cheapside—"the brightest star," as the old historian, Fuller, quaintly says, "that ever shone in that Via Lactea"—was the son of one of the judges of the court of King's Bench, and at a very early age entered as a page the household of Cardinal Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, and prime minister of Henry VII. The cardinal was the first to recognize the genius of the city boy, condemned, as was the custom of the time, to some rough apprenticeship, and one day, pointing to his little footman, he exclaimed "This child here, waiting at the table, whosoever shall live to see it, will prove a marvellous rare man." Having relinquished his service at table, he went to Oxford, where he made the acquaintance, and became the intimate friend of Erasmus of Rotterdam, greatest of living philosophers. Under his guidance, he studied law, theology, philosophy, and "all the sciences" as then understood, which, while greatly enriching his mind, yet made him for a time rather unsettled in his movements. Leaving the university, he first became a barrister, then a city preacher, and finally a monk of the Carthusian order, strictest and most ascetic of religious communities. But from monkhood and fasting he was withdrawn before long by a pair of uncommonly bright eyes, owned by a Miss Colt, the daughter of an English gentleman; and marrying this lady, More returned to life and law. A fluent speaker, and gifted with much natural eloquence, he made a very large income at the bar, and rapidly rose to distinction, and in 1514 he was made a master of the requests, knighted, and sworn a member of the privy council. Wolsey, who always kept his eye upon rising talents, had already employed Sir Thomas More in frequent diplomatic missions, chiefly to Germany and the Netherlands; and it was in the comparative leisure of his pursuits abroad that he wrote his great work, 'Utopia,' one of the most notable books in the English language. In the 'Utopia,' More laid down his own views of perfect society: crime to be banished by education; greediness and pride by the absence of all private property; and religious persecution by perfect freedom of conscience. The king read the book, and was delighted with it, perhaps for the very reason of his character being anything but Utopian. He cultivated the acquaintance of the writer with much assiduity, visited him at his house at Chelsea, and at times "walked with him by the space of an hour, holding his arm about his neck." But Sir Thomas was too much an observer of mankind to be deceived by these marks of royal favour; and he showed his thorough appreciation of Henry in the words already quoted, that he believed the king was as fond of him as of any subject within his realm; but that, nevertheless, if the sacrifice of his head "could win him a castle in France, it would not fail to go." It was this shrewd man whom the duke of Norfolk persuaded to accept the office of lord chancellor; and the great seal, torn from Wolsey, was pressed, after much delay, into his unwilling hands. With the full knowledge of his master, Sir Thomas More seemed to foresee that the time was approaching, when, his brains having been used, he would be required to give his head.

The proceedings in the king's divorce were stopped for a while after the fall of Wolsey, the new advisers suggestion to consult the learned doctors of the principal universities of Europe on the great question agitating the royal mind. The voice which threw out this hint was that of the family tutor, by name Thomas Cranmer. Both Doctor Gardiner and his colleague were overjoyed at the proposal the execution of which promised to give them some more work, prospectively highly profitable. They, therefore, hurried home at once, and the next day laid the plan before the council of ministers. All the royal councillors agreed in the opinion of its being a capital idea—seeing that it was eminently fitted to take the responsibility of a more and more dangerous subject off their own shoulders, to place it on other more or less irresponsible bodies, with no heads to risk. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, as well as Sir Thomas More, strongly recommended the new scheme to the king, who also was so well pleased with it that he adopted it at once, sent for the lucky tutor appointed him royal chaplain, and ordered that he should be one of the chief agents in carrying out his idea of consulting the great universities on the greatest question of the age. Henry himself had become persuaded by this time that the subject nearest to his heart, of getting rid of an old wife, so as to marry a young damsel, was one of uncommon profundity, the solution of which required the utmost tension of brain on the part of all the learned men of Europe.

Thomas Cranmer's idea was by no means new, for no less a person than Cardinal Wolsey had entertained it before him, and even gone so far as to make the necessary investigations into its possible results. These not proving satisfactory, the cardinal quietly dropped proceedings, and no more was heard on the subject. But several years had passed since that time, and the pontifical Court of Inquiry having failed, the anxiety to obtain the divorce had become much greater, and with of Henry being irresolute what to do next. Sir Thomas More, not wishing to lose his head a day sooner than absolutely necessary, pleaded his own incapacity as a reason for not meddling at all with so grave a subject; his argument being that it was a question which could be decided only by the theologians, and which was beyond the jurisdiction of mere lawyers, such as himself. In this perplexity—theology being as unwilling as law to incur martyrdom for truth's sake—there came help from an obscure quarter, in the shape of fresh advice most pleasing to all parties. One evening, the diplomatic gentlemen, Drs Gardiner and Fox, old tormentors of the pontiff, were supping at the house of a friend, a Mr. Cressy, residing at Waltham Abbey, when the discussion turned, as usual at the time, upon the great subject of the royal divorce. The two diplomatists having lamented the dead lock into which they had been driven, there came a voice from the bottom of the table, in humble but cheering accents, with the

it the probabilities of ultimate success. As far as the poor tutor of Waltham Abbey was concerned, there was no want of energy and perseverance to obtain this much desired success. Thomas Cranmer, born at the little village of Aslaeton, Nottinghamshire, in 1489, had studied theology at Cambridge, and, at the age of twenty-one, obtained a fellowship at Jesus College, which, however, he forfeited two years after by taking a wife. He subsequently became lecturer on theology, and next tutor in the family of Mr. Cressy, at Waltham Abbey, where he was discovered by the diplomatic gentlemen: thus having reached the mature age of forty without raising himself much above the lowest sphere open to men of good education. It was not the tutor's fault that he had not risen higher, for he had ambition enough; and no sooner had the first rays of the royal sunshine fallen upon him, than he put forth all his strength to climb upward in the world. For probationary service, Cranmer was first sent into the family of the earl of Wiltshire, father of Anne Boleyn; and, being duly prepared to do all that was wanted, he set out on his mission of gathering continental theology to upset the king's marriage. But, notwithstanding all his energy, he was entirely unsuccessful, as far as this great object was concerned; the whole of the universities and learned doctors of Germany, where he kept chiefly exerting himself, declaring themselves steadfastly against the divorce. The great leaders of the Protestant party, Martin Luther and Philip Melancthon, went so far as to declare that it might be legitimate for the king to have two wives, but that the divorce from his faithful spouse, after a union of twenty years, would be an offence against all the laws of God and man. It was somewhat singular that almost at the same time that Luther threw out this hint to commit polygamy, the pope made a distinct proposition of the same kind to Henry. Under date of September the 18th, 1530, Cassalis, English minister at Rome, wrote to the king: "Lately, the pope, secretly, as a thing of which he thought highly, proposed to me a condition of this sort: that he might grant to your majesty to have two wives." Henry did not entertain the offer, although he had before him the example of another sovereign, exactly in his own position, who was enjoying the luxury of two wives under the full sanction of civil and ecclesiastical law. In the same year that Henry made his first application for a divorce, the landgrave of Hesse, one of the most powerful of German princes, discovered that his wife was getting old; and, having a fair Anne Boleyn, called Margaret von der Saal, at his court, he made up his mind to marry her, without separating from his first consort. Some of the early reformers of Germany applauded the act, on the ground that Scripture did not forbid polygamy, and that, this being the case, it was far more honest for a man to place, even in the teeth of public opinion, a young wife at the side of an older one, than to repudiate the latter under a frivolous pretext, making religious scruples a cloak for sin. The latter part of the argument being clearly aimed against himself, Henry found no pleasure in the discussion, and indignantly spurned both Luther's and the pope's advice. As to Craumer, he heard so much about marriages and marrying in Germany, that he resolved to take unto himself a second wife, his first having died before he became tutor at Waltham Abbey. Without divining that in the course of a short twelve months he would be called upon to become archbishop of Canterbury, the ex-tutor and fellow of Jesus College, at the beginning of the year 1532, married a young girl of Nuremberg, niece of pastor Osiander, otherwise Hosemann, the son of a blacksmith, and one of the most daring advocates of the doctrines of Luther. Soon after his marriage Thomas Cranmer returned to England, full of the new light of the Reformation.

While Cranmer was canvassing Germany in favour of the king's divorce, other agents were busy in France, in Italy, and at home. The university of Oxford was first called upon to pronounce itself respecting the great question, and its decision was held so important that Henry's confessor, the bishop of Lincoln, went personally to superintend the debates.

The result was unfavourable to the king, against all expectation. Only a few of the seniors, "in hopes of reward, or out of fear, gave their opinions concerning the matter such as they thought would please the king;" but all the rest, according to Anthony à Wood, chronicler of the university, strongly opposed the biased judgment of the elders, "and could not be drawn to their minds." The consultation of Cambridge gave little better result, and notwithstanding the most extensive use of threats and bribes, only a small number of professors and scholars could be brought to declare for the divorce. Far more successful than the canvass of the great English universities was that of the French high schools of learning, the management of the matter there being in the most skilful hands. On the first application to consult his own learned subjects, King Francis made some difficulties, pleading his new alliance with the Kaiser, but the present of half a million of golden crowns made him alter his opinion to the extent of promising to assist with his own influence the extraction of pure theology. He did his work so well, as to be able to report that five of the high schools of his kingdom, Angers, Bourges, Orleans, Paris, and Toulouse, had declared in favour of the divorce. As to the vote of a dozen others, likewise consulted, his majesty was prudently silent. To gather the valuable returns collected by Francis, the duke of Norfolk himself went to Paris, but got into considerable trouble for sheer want of diplomatic tact. The official report was that fifty-six doctors of the university of Paris had declared in favour of Henry, and only seven against him, and, in order to show his own zeal, Norfolk procured the list of names, when he was horrified at discovering that the figures stood very differently, there being but twenty-two small doctors in favour, and forty-one, among them the greatest names, against the divorce. To add to his disgrace, the undiplomatic duke reported the dry facts home, eliciting a burst of passion from Henry, and a sharp reproof from Mistress Boleyn. However, the French reports were sent to Rome by a fresh envoy, instructed to tell Clement VII. that the patience of the king was nigh drawing to an end. Clement once more took refuge in procrastination, not doubting the strength of the chains binding the English islands to the rock of Rome.

The pontiff at any other time might have felt more inclined to give way, if not before the prayers, at least before the threats of the king of England, but he heeded them the less at this moment as his sole attention was turned towards Germany. At a diet of the empire, held at the ancient city of Spiers on the 15th of March, 1529, the Lutheran doctrines had been condemned by the majority of princes; but this momentary victory of papal influence only served to spread the cause of reform, for immediately after the people and princes of the whole north of Germany, headed by the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, declared against the verdict of Spiers, laying in a protest for freedom of conscience. Thus arose Protestantism, not an intellectual movement alone, but a vast political power. Its appearance startled the pope, and, still more, the pope's great master, Charles, who felt his dream of world dominion shaken by the new phalanx opposing his authority, the sword in one hand and the Bible in the other. Charles was not a bigoted prince by any means, and had shown no scruples to employ Frondsberg's lances in getting a firm gripe of the holy head of the Church; but having secured his grasp, and made the papal power part of his own, he wanted no more interference, resolved to subdue the nations withstanding him at the point of the sword. England's silent Reformation, much older than that of Germany, was nothing to him: he knew little of it, and cared less, his personal pride only being at stake in the matter of the divorce. While commanding the pontiff not to divorce his aunt, he bid him turn his whole attention to the great schism in the north, ready to fulminate excommunication upon the new sect of Protestants at the first signal from the imperial armies in the field. Thus Clement stood in trembling anxiety, with his eyes fixed upon Germany, and little noticing the crowd of English divorce agents which had kept flocking in and out of the Vatican for years past. The last, most solemn, and most brilliant portion of the crowd of English ambassadors was least attended to, as it made its appearance at the moment when the Kaiser entered the city of Bologna to meet the pontiff. Charles came to be crowned king of Lombardy and of Rome, entering upon the scene in military state befitting the occasion. He had changed his family's ancient costume of long hair by cutting off his own, while the pontiff and all the cardinals met him with beards of great length. Clement received his illustrious visitor on a high throne, with the triple crown on his head; but places were changed a few days after, when Charles took the throne for his seat, leaving the pontiff at the foot. The iron crown of Lombardy having been brought from Milan, the Kaiser placed it on his own head, after which he allowed the pope to hand him his sword and to invest him with the golden crown of Rome. "The pope," reported the French ambassador, the bishop of Tarbes, "tried to show the most joyous animation in giving him the sword, and putting the crown on his head; but it is certain he never performed a ceremony which so cut him to the heart."

While Charles was sojourning at Bologna, a final deputation arrived from England, earnestly urging the divorce. At the head of the mission was the earl of Wiltshire, father of Anne Boleyn, appointed by the king in utter disregard of good manners, and even of common decency. The Kaiser, not unnaturally, looked upon his ambassadorial dignity as an insult to Queen Catherine; and being present when the deputation made their appearance, the earl as the speaker, Charles sternly cried, "Stop, sir; let your colleagues speak: you are a party in this cause." Chafed by the rebuke, the ambassador broke forth, somewhat haughtily, that he was standing there as the representative of the king of England and not of his own daughter; but, this not mending matters, the audience came to an end. As might have been foreseen the embassy proved entirely resultless, the poor pope having no more power to grant the divorce than to command the imperial troops to leave Rome. However, the hard words of Charles to Anne Boleyn's father had some effect in driving the king into bolder measures than any he had hitherto attempted. On the advice of his mistress, Henry sent a message to Catherine, informing her that many of the most learned men of Europe had declared in favour of the divorce, and that, therefore, it would be wise on her part to leave the matter to the judgment of a court of arbitration. Thus the queen declined, replying, "God grant my husband a quiet conscience: I mean to abide by no decision excepting that of Rome." Up to this time Henry had resided with his consort, behaving respectfully towards her; but now he suddenly changed, and on the 13th of July, 1531, he left Windsor Castle, with imperious orders that Catherine should quit the royal residence before his return, and not come to it again. The poor woman, who had been hoping against hope for better days, sorrowfully left Windsor, and with her child retired to a small house in Hertfordshire. "I am the king's true wife," were her last words; "and if all doctors were dead, or law and learning far out of men's minds at the time of our marriage, yet I cannot think that the court of Rome and the whole Church of England would have consented to a thing unlawful and detestable, as the king now calls it. Still, I say, I am his wife, and for him I will pray." Catherine saw her husband no more.

The enforced departure of the queen removed the last restraint upon the intercourse between Henry and his favourite, who now lived together, to all appearance, like man and wife. Under these circumstances the tongue of scandal could not fail to be busy about Anne Boleyn; so much so that the Venetian ambassador, Carlo Capello, wrote home officially "that it was generally reported that she had borne a son to the king, that had died soon after its birth." What partly gave rise to this rumour was the great change which came to be visible in the appearance of the king's fair mistress, as minutely described by the unflattering diplomatist. "Her form," wrote Carlo Capello, "is irregular and flat; her flesh has a swarthy tinge; she has a long neck, and a large mouth, yet very fine black eyes." But though decaying in beauty, Henry seemed to be as fond of Anne Boleyn as ever. They spent the greater part of the day together, outdoors and indoors; in the latter case chiefly engaged in gambling. The king was fond of cards and dice, and so was his companion; and Anne being generally lucky in her play, the amusement cost Henry very large sums. Mistress Anne proved otherwise a very expensive lady. Her court was much larger than that of any other member of the royal family, and the sums she spent on dresses, jewellery, and personal ornaments were enormous, her millinery bills alone amounting to thousands of pounds. The enamoured king paid all without grudging, and made her, besides, large allowances; notwithstanding which she was constantly in debt, to the extent of pawning her jewels with her sister Mary, a lady reputed to have formerly enjoyed the king's favour. To add to her revenues, Anne Boleyn was not above accepting presents from high personages who wished to gain the king's ear, as well as from foreign powers. The French ambassador, Cardinal du Bellay, an uncommonly shrewd diplomatic gentleman, paid her the most assiduous court, with the recompense of having everything his own way in political and financial negotiations. From this resulted the most intimate alliance between the French and English courts; and to give vent to the warmth of their brotherly feelings, the two kings resolved to meet each other near the old Field of Cloth of Gold, and to shake hands once more. The meeting was arranged to take place in the autumn of 1532; but before all the details were finally settled, the French envoy made one more suggestion to his government. "If our sovereign," wrote du Bellay, "wishes to gratify the king of England, he can do nothing better than invite Madame Anne with him to Calais, and entertain her there with great respect." But there was a postscript: "Nevertheless, it will be desirable that our sovereign should bring no ladies." This was anything but flattering to the reputation of "Madame," but Francis was too much of a courtier not to overlook such little matters. There came a most polite invitation from Paris, asking Henry to allow the star of beauty of his court to grace the forthcoming interview with her presence; and Anne Boleyn was overcome with joy on her royal lover communicating the intelligence. She felt she was getting nigher the dazzling light towards which she had been fluttering all along—poor moth.

The new meeting between the French and English monarchs was intended, in the first instance, to be strictly political; but Henry managed to turn it into another exhibition of fine clothes. His love of show and pomp, so far from decreasing, seemed to increase with age; and his infatuation for Anne Boleyn, likewise excessively fond of display, furnished a new incentive to high tailorings and gorgeous upholstery. Before starting with "Madame" for France, Henry made her a marchioness, conferring upon Anne the title of Pembroke, borne by his late uncle, Jasper Tudor, to which was attached an annuity of one thousand pounds per annum, and the gift of large estates in Wales, Essex, Herts, and Somerset. It was the first instance of the creation of a female peer in England, and the occasion was not allowed to pass without great fêtes at Windsor Castle, the king himself placing the coronet on the head of the new marchioness. Eleven days after, Henry and his mistress started from Dover, Anne Boleyn having performed her journey to the coast in great state, like a real queen, and being received as such at Calais. They met the French sovereign on the 21st of October, at the gates of Boulogne, Francis advancing bareheaded towards his royal brother, and shaking hands right cordially. Francis had made grand preparations for receiving and entertaining his guests; but Anne Boleyn felt intensely mortified on seeing that he had not brought with him a single lady of his family. It needed not the hints of the diplomatic French cardinal to bring about this result, inasmuch as the young queen of Francis, Eleanor, was the sister of Kaiser Charles, and could scarcely help feeling an intense dislike for the woman who had supplanted her royal aunt. But humiliating as was her position, the marchioness of Pembroke took care not to show it, and appeared the gayest of the gay at all the balls, jousts, and masquerades. Recorder Hall, faithfullest of scribes, was again present as historiographer, minutely setting down all the incidents of the royal meeting. Francis, with a fine eye for the inclination of his guests, had taken particular care to look to their feeding. "Great cheer," Master Hall recorded joyfully, "was made to all the Englishmen. The poultries, larders of meat, and cellars of wine were all open, and likewise hay and litter, and all other things: ask and have, and no man durst take any money, for the French king paid for all." To return these liberal hospitalities, and, if possible, outvie them, Henry, after staying five days at Boulogne, took his royal brother with him to Calais. Francis was soon brought to see that he was beaten in the art of doing things regardless of expense. The doings at Calais were inaugurated by a marvellous supper, which opened the eyes of even the royal historiographer, accustomed as he was to the magnificences. "The supper," we learn from the recorder, "was served in a chamber hanged with tissue, raised with silver, paneled with cloth of silver raised with gold. The seams of the same were covered with broad wreaths of goldsmith's work, full of stones and pearls. In this chamber was a cupboard seven stages high: all plate of gold, and no gilt plate. Besides that, there hung ten branches of silver-gilt, and ten branches all white silver, every branch hanging by a long chain of the same sort, bearing two lights of wax. The French king was served three courses, and his meat dressed after the French fashion, and the king of England had like courses after the English fashion. The first course of every kind was forty dishes, the second was sixty dishes, and the third was eighty dishes, all costly and pleasant." While the king of England was giving these very "costly and pleasant" entertainments, many of the common people of England were starving, and all the roads were crowded with beggars. To get rid of this common nuisance, it was ordered that every beggar, in the first instance, should be "whipped at the end of a cart;" when sinning again, be burned in the hand and "the upper part of the gristle of the right ear clean cut off;" and when once more impudent enough to ask for bread, then "he shall die for it." This law was promulgated while King Henry and his marchioness were feasting at Calais, with one hundred and eighty dishes each for supper, "all plate of gold and no gilt plate," and beyond dispute "costly and pleasant."

The Calais festivities ended with Henry's favourite pastime, a masquerade. "After supper on the Sunday evening, 28th of October," according to the minute historiographer, "came in the marchioness of Pembroke, with seven ladies, in masking apparel of strange fashion, made of cloth of gold, slashed with crimson tinsel satin, puffed with cloth of silver, and knit with laces of gold." The host made somewhat free with his "seven ladies," to the surprise of the more chivalric Francis, who was not a little astonished to see that "in dancing King Henry removed the ladies' visors, so that their beauties were shewn." After the dance the French monarch held a long private conversation with the marchioness, and the next morning he sent her a present of jewellery, "valued at 15,000 crowns." This bribe to Henry's fair favourite was very nearly the only practical result of the great meeting of the two sovereigns, which for a time created breathless interest throughout the whole of Europe. The Pro-

Protestants of Germany, above all, were hoping great things from the interview;—an anti-imperial alliance between Francis, a Reformer at heart, and Henry, now arch-enemy of the pope, being confidently expected. But Henry hated the Protestants even more than the pope, his petty vanity having been too deeply hurt by the pungent attack of Luther; and after entertaining Francis to repletion with his matrimonial grievances, all discussions other than of pleasure came to an end. On the 30th of October the kings “mounted their horses, took hands, and with princely countenance, loving behaviour, and hearty words, embraced each other, and so departed.” Both Henry and his marchioness were anxious now to return to England; but the wind was blowing rough, and the snow-crested waves of the Channel looked suspiciously indicative of mal de mer. The lovers, therefore, remained at Calais, waiting for the wind and waves to get smooth, passing the time at cards and dice; and it was not till the 14th of November that they mustered courage to cross the twenty miles of water separating Calais from Dover. To the sailors of the royal fleet, lying in the outer roads, it was quite a novelty to behold a king of England afraid of the sea.

Two months after his return from France, Henry had the marriage ceremony performed between himself and the marchioness of Pembroke. The ceremony took place on St. Paul's day, January 25th, 1533, and was of a grim sort of character, entirely devoid of the usual magnificences. “On the morning of that day,” according to a narrative compiled from contemporary accounts, “at a very early hour, Dr Rowland Lee, one of the royal chaplains, received the unwonted order to celebrate mass in an unfrequented attic in the west turret of Whitehall. There he found the king, attended by Norris and Heueage, two of the groomers of the chamber, and the marchioness of Pembroke, accompanied by her train-bearer, Ann Savage, afterwards Lady Berkeley. On being required to perform the nuptial rite between his sovereign and the marchioness, the chaplain hesitated; but Henry assured him that the pope had pronounced in favour of the divorce, and that he had the dispensation for a second marriage in his possession.” The fact was that more than two months previous, on the 15th of November, the pope had signed a document exhorting Henry to put away “one Anne,” and threatening him with excommunication in the event he should presume to marry her. However, the scruples of the royal chaplain were neither deep nor lasting, and for whatever mental sufferings he underwent, in joining the hands of the king and Mistress Boleyn, he was compensated by elevation to a bishopric. The ceremony in the attic of Whitehall was kept for a time a profound secret, so that even Thomas Cranmer, now high in the king's favour, did not hear of it till a fortnight afterwards. Though unsuccessful in his mission to the German universities, the ex-tutor of Waltham Abbey had attracted Henry's attention by his earnestness in the divorce proceedings, and his zealous advocacy of the new doctrine of the royal prerogative being paramount to that of the pope, so that when Cranmer returned to England, in November, 1532, the king had taken the extraordinary step of appointing him to the see of Canterbury, vacant by the death of Archbishop Warham. Cranmer accepted the high dignity, notwithstanding his being a Protestant and married; and, the papal confirmation of the appointment having been received from Rome, he swore to be “fidelis et obediens” to Clement VII. and his successors, and thereupon was consecrated with great pomp on the 30th of March, 1533. Before swearing obedience to the pontiff, the archbishop made a protest, before witnesses, that he did not intend his oath to prevent him doing his duty to God and the king. It was a mental reservation, which, however palliated by the force of circumstances, was yet looked upon by most men as a stain on the character of Thomas Cranmer.

It was absolutely necessary that the new archbishop should show his gratitude to the king, for lifting him from low condition to the pinnacle of honour and influence, by renewed zeal in the divorce matter; and Cranmer so well understood this, that little more than a week after his installation, he addressed a formal request to Henry for permission to take the case in hand. The demand was made, in the words of the archbishop, “for the exoneration of my conscience towards Almighty God, to licence me, according to mine office and duty, to proceed to the examination, final determination, and judgment of the said great cause.” Henry most graciously granted the licence, seemingly forgetful of the fact of having decided the “great cause” already in his own person by taking another wife. This oblivion was the more strange, as Henry, in his reply to Cranmer's lowly request, put forward the theory that he, as king, was standing above all law, civil as well as ecclesiastical, so that there was really no need whatever of the “examination, final determination, and judgment” demanded by the archbishop of Canterbury. “For we,” wrote Henry to the head of the English Church, “being your king and sovereign, do recognize no superior on earth, but only God, not being subject to the laws of any other earthly creature. Yet because ye be, under us, by God's calling and ours, the most principal minister of our spiritual jurisdiction, to which laws we, as a Christian king, have always heretofore and shall ever most obediently submit ourselves, we will not therefore refuse your humble request, offer, and towardness: that is, to make an end, according to the will and pleasure of Almighty God, in our said great cause of matrimony.” This most remarkable, though not altogether very logical letter, marking an epoch in the history of English kingship, was written under the inspiration of Thomas Cromwell, one of the strangest characters of the strange reign of Henry VIII.

Thomas Cromwell, born about 1490, and consequently a year older than Henry, was the son of a blacksmith established at Putney, near London. While still a boy his father died; and on his mother marrying again, he was thrown upon the wide world to shift for himself as best he might. After various adventures, wanting, not unfrequently, a crust of bread, little Thomas found his way to Antwerp, where he was fortunate enough to secure a clerkship in one of the English factories. But this was dry business for a talented young adventurer, so that, after a while, Thomas Cromwell threw up his clerkship and took to soldiering, there being a great demand for fighting men all over the continent, thanks to the rival ambition of the two crowned youths, Francis I. and Charles V. His stout arquebuse helped him across the Alps into the fair Italian peninsula; where, for a little change, and to enjoy the balmy air, he again fell into a clerkship, assisting a banker of Florence, during the year 1515, to keep his debit and credit accounts. Thus, alternately engaged in fighting and book-keeping, he explored most parts of the continent, imbibed Lutheran doctrines in Germany; and finally, about 1524, returned to England. After a short stay in the household of the marchioness of Dorset, Cardinal Wolsey, always on the look out for clever men, enrolled him among his confidential servants, and with him Cromwell remained till the time of his fall and retreat to Esher. This retreat, very naturally, was not at all to Cromwell's taste. One morning, Sir William Cavendish, Wolsey's chamberlain and subsequent biographer, found his fellow servant "leaning in the window with a primer in his hand, saying our Lady matins," with tears running down in abundance over his sun-burnt cheeks. Upon which kind-hearted Cavendish: "Why, Master Cromwell, what meanest thou all this your sorrow? Is my lord in any danger, for whom ye lament thus; or is it for any loss ye have sustained by misadventure?" Cromwell's reply was honest at least. "Nay, nay," he cried, still in tears; "it is my unhappy adventure which is like to make me lose all that I have travailed for all the days of my life, for doing my master true and diligent service." The chamberlain comforted his friend as best he could, telling him that Wolsey might yet rise again, and they with him, and thereupon Cromwell got more cheerful. All on a sudden he exclaimed, as if struck by a bright idea, "This afternoon, when my lord has dined, I will ride to London and so to the court, there to make or mar ere I come again." Thomas Cromwell meant what he said. That afternoon he rode to London, applied for and obtained an audience with Henry, and told him that there were sovereigns on the continent of Europe not dependent upon the pope, governing the Church as well as the state, and supreme judges within their realm even of such matters as divorce cases concerning themselves. How the burly despot stared at that bold brown face before him, one may imagine. Here was a blacksmith's son evidently fit to forge curious things. Henry saw it, and then and there made him a privy councillor, awaiting higher duties. With this Lutheran, Thomas Cromwell, came the first keen wedge of Protestantism into English government; and when, soon after, the other Lutheran, Thomas Cranmer, assumed the reins of ecclesiastical sway, the stubborn despot himself, popish though he was to the core of his heart, could not help being launched into the torrent of the Reformation.

Cranmer's proceedings in the divorce case, after the scheme laid down by Henry, were of the simplest. On the 8th of May the archbishop opened a court at St. Peter's priory, Dunstable, four miles from Ampthill, where the queen was residing, and before this court Catherine was cited to appear. The royal lady, as was expected, took no notice of the citation; whereupon she was declared "verily and manifestly contumacious;" and after some more formalities, Cranmer, on the 23rd of May, declared her marriage null and void. Five days after, the primate held another court at Lambeth, at which a judicial confirmation of the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn was issued in due form. Before this, on Easter eve, the 12th of April, Henry had gone through a second nuptial ceremony with the lady; quite as private and mysterious as the first; and, being that the tragic comedy of the divorce had not yet been played out, quite as needless from the legal point of view. As a compensation for this secrecy, so little to his own and Anne Boleyn's taste, Henry devised a splendid pageant for his new consort; and, while Cranmer's divorce court was yet sitting at Dunstable, a royal proclamation was issued, ordering that all who had claims to do customary service at the coronation of a queen of England should bring them before the High Steward, holding court in the Star Chamber. There was no want of great nobles to kneel before the new light, and all the preparations having been laboriously made, a grand triumphal spectacle, of even more than the usual splendour, came off on Whit-Sunday, the 1st of June. On the eve of the pageant Anne Boleyn was taken from the Tower, where she had been residing for some weeks with the king, to Westminster Hall, in a "litter covered with cloth of gold shot with white," the litter being borne by "two palfreys, clad in a garb of white damask, heads and all." The city people, under the guidance of the lord mayor, Peacock by name, habedasher by profession, shone grand on this eventful day. They had stuck up Apollo and Mars in Fish street; Jupiter in Cheapside; and Venus, Juno, and Minerva at the corner of Leather lane. A poet, alive and rather stout, sat on a scaffolding in Cornhill, surrounded by the three Graces, stuffed; and not far off stood the most worshipful lord mayor Peacock, in flaming yellow robes, with all the aldermen, stouter than the poet, around him, and the city recorder in front. The latter had the pleasing duty of landing to Anne Boleyn a purse containing one thousand marks of gold, which weighty gift "she very thankfully accepted, with many goodly words." Then the silk-clad palfreys trotted on with their litter, in the midst of a procession half a mile in length, making their way right into Westminster Hall. Here the heroine of the day was led to a platform under a canopy of state, "on the left side of which was a cupboard of ten stages, filled with cups and goblets of gold, marvellous to behold." Having been treated to a "void of spice," or, in modern language, sugar plums, Anne Boleyn withdrew to Wolsey's splendid residence, York house, or Whitehall, where she was joined by the king. It was very remarkable that neither on this day, nor the next, when the great coronation ceremony took place, Henry was seen anywhere near his chosen consort. The king, according to Cranmer's own account, "came always before her secretly in a barge, as well from Greenwich to the Tower as from the Tower to York place." Wise men thought it foreboded evil.

On Whit Sunday, 1533, Anne Boleyn, being, as stated by Cranmer, "somewhat big with child," was solemnly crowned queen of England, the archbishop of Canterbury placing the royal diadem on her head at the altar of Westminster Abbey. All the illustrious nobles of the realm, with scarcely one exception, were present at the ceremonial; and the king himself watched it, with gloating eyes, in a caged closet over the choir. Sceptre in hand and the crown on her head, Anne Boleyn then marched from the Abbey into Westminster Hall, her canopy of state being borne by proud earls and barons. A grand banquet stood ready prepared, and when the king's consort and all the company had taken their places, the duke of Suffolk and Lord William Howard rode into the hall, high on horseback, escorting a file of knights of the Bath, each bearing two dishes, besides "subtleties of ships made of coloured wax, marvellous and gorgeous to behold." Anne Boleyn was waited upon by noble lords, and at each side of her chair stood a countess, with the especial duty of holding "a fine cloth before the queen's face, whenever she listed to spit or do otherwise at her pleasure." Among the august company present at the banquet was Lord Mayor Peacock, in his burning yellow, who had the honour of offering another purse of gold in the name of the city of London. The banquet lasted from an hour before noon till six o'clock in the evening, and all the while the two noble masters of the ceremonies, Suffolk and Howard, kept riding up and down the hall on their prancing steeds, "cheering the lords and ladies and the lord mayor and his brethren." All the terrific feasting having come to an end at last, Anne Boleyn "went under her canopy, borne over her to the door of her chamber, where she turned about and gave the canopy, with the golden bells and all, to the barons of the Cinque Ports." The whole of the next week was spent in tilts, balls, tournaments, and other amusements, great reverence being paid to the new queen by all the nobles. "They could not have shown more," the Venetian ambassador wrote home, "if she had been of royal parentage." While these grand and costly exhibitions were going on, Anne Boleyn revelling in the sunshine of her glory, poor Queen Catherine was persecuted by her husband in the most odious manner. On her refusal to submit to Cranmer's judgment—refusal grounded on the very good plea of the case being unfairly tried "within the king's own realm, before a man of his own making"—it was attempted to force her into submission through a slow species of torture, by filling her house with spies, depriving her of her attendants, and even threatening the life of her child. The last menace threw her on a bed of sickness; nevertheless she refused to give way, and to relinquish even so much as the title of queen. When taunted with pride, Catherine made a noble reply. "As to any vain glory," she cried "it is not that I desire the name of queen, but only for the discharge of my conscience, to declare myself the king's true wife, and not his harlot, for the last twenty-four years." To this appeal of his wife, Henry responded by ordering her removal from the healthy air of Amptill to a place called Bugden, four miles from Huntingdon, on the border of the Fens. It proved a sentence of death.

Although having gone thus far in his matrimonial proceedings, and after loudly proclaiming that he acknowledged "no superior on earth, but only God," Henry yet was far from throwing off allegiance to the pope. He entreated his royal brother of France, almost in piteous terms, to use his influence for making Clement consent to the divorce; and, this failing, Henry sent, on the recommendation of Cromwell, one of his chaplains, Dr. Bonner, to Rome, to try once more the effect of eloquence backed by cash. The missionary was ill-chosen for the purpose, "being not only too energetic, but a Lutheran at heart, and more fit to annoy the pontiff than to gain him over to Henry's views. At the prompting of his master the Kaiser, Clement issued a Bull annulling Cranmer's judgment, as soon as the report of it had reached Rome; and, on the 11th of July, he went a step further by launching an excommunication against Henry, in the event of his not separating from his new wife before the month of September. But even this was not enough to induce Henry to act up to the "no superior on earth" theory dictated to him by Cromwell; and instead of simply leaving the pope alone, he kept on despatching petitions, protests, and messages to the angry head of the Catholic Church. However, worthy Dr. Bonner did his best to make these communications ineffectual by extreme insolence. At the beginning of November, the king forwarded to his chaplain and envoy a paper, drawn up by himself, containing an appeal from the decision of the pontiff to that of a general council, with which document Bonner went to the Vatican on the 8th of the month. The papal chamberlains would not let him pass, but the fierce envoy, muscular (Christian in every respect, successfully broke the ranks of gold and silver sticks in waiting, till he found himself in the presence of the astounded pontiff. Without further ceremony, he now began reading his paper, to which Clement listened patiently, "only pulling down his head to his shoulders, after the Italian fashion," as reported by the faithful envoy to his sovereign. But the paper was long, and the pontiff got tired, and, saying he had to attend a consistory, marched out of doors. Bonner replied it did not matter, he would come again in the afternoon; and duly made his appearance, driving all the chamberlains to the winds. The afternoon lecture contained the worst part of the long message, in which general councils were spoken of as standing above the head of the Church; and this passage having been read, Clement could not contain himself any longer. "He fell," Bonner wrote home, "in a marvellous great choler and rage, not only declaring the same by his gesture and manner, but also by words. He was continually folding up and unwinding his handkerchief, which he never doth but when he is tickled to the very heart with great choler." It would have been impossible for Cromwell to appoint a better man than this wonderful chaplain as Romish ambassador. Had he not "tickled" his holiness so well, Henry VIII. might have died a servant of the pope.

While Henry was still trying to secure the goodwill of the pontiff, another event occurred which made reconciliation, if not with him, at least with Clement's imperial master, all but impossible. On the 7th of September, 1533, little more than three months after her coronation, Anne Boleyn was delivered at Greenwich palace of a daughter, to whom was given the name Elizabeth. The birth of this child, though contributing greatly to strengthen the hands of Cromwell and the anti-papal party, was a severe disappointment to the king, who had confidently expected to have a son, and in his conceit had gone so far as to issue circulars ordering thanksgiving "for the good health, prosperity, and continual preservation of the said prince." Little Elizabeth, destined to be, in course of time, the Great Elizabeth, was, according to the report of the French ambassador, "a fine child of a lively colour, in some features resembling its father, but much more like its mother." Her birth gave rise to popular tumults in various parts of the country, showing that the great questions agitating the foreign and ecclesiastical policy of England were being filtered through the middle, and even the lower classes, of the population. Almost all the women, high and low, took part against "Nan Bullen," as the now queen was irreverently termed; but not a few of the men, though sympathising with Catherine, were able to perceive the great results likely to spring from the divorce, and accordingly ranged themselves in defence of the king's consort. Thus gradually, almost without her own knowledge, and certainly without any efforts of her own, Anne Boleyn found herself at the head of a great party, anxious to throw off the yoke of Rome and to secure the inestimable blessing of liberty of conscience. Possessed of intelligence of a high order, though corrupted by vanity, Anne Boleyn could not fail perceiving that to secure her position amidst personal unpopularity, with all the power of the Church against her, and no other protection but the passing fondness of a ferocious human animal of unbridled lust, the assistance of this party was absolutely necessary to her, even more than her influence to them. Without long hesitation, therefore, while still devoutly attending the mass, obeying her confessor, and imploring the Virgin in her prayers, Anne Boleyn became the protector of the Protestant party in England, and a powerful instrument in the hands of Cromwell and Cranmer. The first exercise of her influence was that of dragging, at Cromwell's instigation, Sir Thomas More from his high position as lord chancellor. Although having propagated ideas of singular liberality in his 'Utopia,' and argued principles of universal religious toleration, Sir Thomas More had no sooner risen to power than he showed himself a rather bigoted Roman Catholic, violently persecuting the adherents of the doctrines of Wycliffe and Luther. To get rid of such an opponent was an absolute necessity for Cromwell in his upward flight to power, and the occasion was easily found. In the summer of 1532, while the divorce proceedings were making very slow progress, Anne Boleyn hinted to the king that there was lack of zeal on the part of his chancellor; and on Henry upbraiding him, with wonted impetuosity, More at once resigned the great seal, having held it for two years and a half. His successor in office was Sir Thomas Audley, speaker of the House of Commons, a time-serving sycophant of the meanest order, willing to do the behest of any party that happened to be in power; and useful as such to Anne Boleyn's friends. The ex-chancellor cheerfully withdrew into domestic life, to his quiet cottage at Chelsea, congratulating himself on having escaped the storm which he felt gathering in the air.

Anne Boleyn's unpopularity, which, before her coronation, was due chiefly to the true instinct of English womanhood abhorring her conduct towards the unhappy queen, soon afterwards shaped itself into systematic opposition, skilfully guided by the partisans of Rome. The fall of Sir Thomas More too clearly indicated the direction of the new influence at work in the royal council, and the more shrewd among the conservative churchmen could not help seeing that there was no choice but to succumb or to offer resistance. But the latter was difficult, if not impossible. The constant growth of royal power for half a century had levelled all England before a throne supported by the monarchical instinct of the masses; the nobles had sunk to be courtiers, the prelates chaplains, and the Houses of Parliament mere offices for enrolling the king's decrees. To resist the incarnation of such power, vested in a tiger nature like Henry's, was clearly a hopeless task; yet was it attempted by the friends of Rome in a moment of despair. At the village of Aldington, in Kent, there lived a young servant girl called Elizabeth Barton, subject to fits and the talking of nonsense; and this poor tool was made use of by some cunning priests to try once more the effect of the grand old weapon—superstition. Under the tuition of one Richard Maister, rector of her parish, and a monk of Canterbury, of the name of Bocking, the servant girl advanced from foolish talk into rhapsody, and from rhapsody into prophecy; until, at last, by judicious management, the poor creature's fame spread far and wide, and the whole country was full of Elizabeth, the Holy Maid of Kent. Henry himself, not a little given to superstition, took great interest in the Holy Maid, and consulted, among others, Sir Thomas More about some of her prognostications. The great chancellor's opinion breathed scepticism. "For seeing," he said, "that some part fall in rhythm, and that, God wot, full rude also, for any reason that he saw therein a right simple woman might speak it of her own wit well enough." Notwithstanding this, Henry continued admiring the prophetess, until, all on a sudden, she commenced her oracular outpourings about "the sins of princes," and was taken at the same time under the avowed protection of the pope's agents, Darius and Pollioni. Getting bolder at every step, the curtain was soon after drawn up entirely, and the Maid of Kent stood forth denouncing the king, and prophesying his death on the scaffold unless he would take the oath of obedience to Rome, and, as ordered by the Bull of Clement, return to his wife, and put away "one Anne." Henry's anger now overruled his superstition; and Cromwell, who had long thought that the prophetess was far too clever for a servant girl, lost no time to shut her up securely, together with the principal of her friends and admirers. Included among the latter were the two most distinguished men known, to be opposed to the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and the ex-chancellor, Sir Thomas More. Together with many other fervent adherents of Rome, More and Fisher were placed, in November, 1533, before the high court of Star Chamber, presided over by the archbishop of Canterbury and Thomas Cromwell, now prime-minister all but in name. The trial was the first indication of the mighty struggle about to commence. The two new men stood there ready to destroy the leaders of the old faith, to grasp the helm of the vessel of state, and to drift away towards the rising sun of the Reformation.

Such grand events as the first three months of the year 1534 brought forth in England were never before compressed in similar space. On the first day of January, king, parliament, and people were still enclosed within the fold of Rome, and on the last day of March there remained not a single tie connecting the realm with the ancient head of the Catholic Church. What took thirty years of atrocious warfare—the most atrocious the world ever saw—to accomplish in Luther's own country, was done in England in as many weeks, with no perceptible effort. The greatest of all revolutions came creeping into the land as softly and as quietly as the balmy air of spring comes creeping over the earth. England's despot fell asleep for a season in Anne Boleyn's lap, and when he awoke the work was done, the vessel sailing in the open sea, and Rome fading in the distance. Thomas Cromwell, most daring of the two state pilots—noble blacksmith's son, whose full value his country has never yet acknowledged, forgetting him over his greater namesake to come—had the chief part of the work on his hands. He called a parliament together in the first days of the new year, and, in no other quality than that of chancellor of the exchequer, submitted to the representatives of the nation the full scheme of England's severance from Rome. In outward appearance the scheme was dry and prosaic and entirely devoid of the eloquent fervour distinguishing the propositions of continental reformers. Cromwell's parliamentary bill, business-like to an extreme degree, as becoming a man of his experience, was divided into some twenty and odd chapters, each of which cut one link of the great chain of spiritual dependence. Three strokes served to disjoin the stoutest portion of the bond. By 25 Henry VIII., cap. 19, the legislative authority of the convocation of the clergy was entirely destroyed; by cap. 20, of the same Act, all bishops were ordered to be elected and consecrated under the sole authority of the king, and by cap. 21, most important of all, the kingdom of England was declared "free from subjection to the laws of any foreign prince, potentate, or prelate," the powers previously vested in the pontiff being transferred to the king, as "the only supreme head, under God, of the Church and realm." Parliament, as in duty bound, passed the whole of Cromwell's bill, and the royal assent thereto having been given on the 30th of March, 1534, it was dissolved the same day. Thus quietly was the Reformation in England accomplished.

It was characteristic of Henry that he paid far less attention to those all important statutes securing the spiritual independence of the kingdom, than to another portion of the same Act settling the succession to the throne. By 25, Henry VIII., cap. 22, the king's marriage with Catherine was declared void, and that with Anne Boleyn valid, it being ordered at the same time that all who should "by writing, print, deed, or act, do, or cause to be procured or done, anything, to the slander, prejudice, disturbance, or derogation, of the said lawful matrimony, "or as to the peril, slander, or disherison of any of the issue" of it, should be declared guilty of high treason, and suffer death accordingly. This piece of outrageous despotism Henry tried to enforce with all his power, and on the last day of the session, the 30th of March, the members of both Houses of Parliament had to take an oath that they would "truly, firmly, and constantly observe, maintain, and keep, to their cunning, wit, and uttermost of their power, the whole effects and contents" of this law. To secure its efficiency still more, Henry appointed special commissioners to administer the oath in every part of the kingdom, to all persons of standing and influence, and particularly to the clergy. Very few had the courage to refuse, and those were cast at once into prison. To inspire the more terror, the accusation of treason against the Holy Maid of Kent, and her friends and abettors, was proceeded with at the same time, after having rested for awhile. The wretched girl had confessed her imposture publicly at St. Paul's Cross, in November, 1533, and, having done so, was sent back to the Tower, in hopes of being released. But while the special commissioners were administering oaths, she was taken out of prison, drawn to Tyburn, among a great concourse of people, and there hung, with six of her accomplices, including Maister, the rector of Aldington, Beoking, the Canterbury friar, and several other monks. The execution, which had the desired terror-creating effect, took place on the 21st of April, 1534. While under the gallows, the miserable servant girl kept shrieking that she was "a poor wench without learning," and that her treasonable prophecies had been taught to her by the priests. That was perfectly true, and Cromwell did not doubt it; but he saw his inability of hanging all the priests.

The most illustrious of all the prisoners accused of holding intercourse with the Maid of Kent, Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More, were not condemned with her, but liberated for the moment: yet only to be taken up on a new charge immediately after. The two great leaders of the papal party refused to take the whole oath of obedience to the law of succession demanded by the royal commissioners, and for this crime they were again sent to the Tower. Sir Thomas More made an attempt to save himself by offering to take the oath under certain conditions, acknowledging the succession as fixed by parliament, but leaving out the part relating to the divorce of Catherine, which, as lenied by special decree of the pontiff, had become to him not a mere question of law, but one of religious faith. Even this concession Bishop Fisher refused to make, preferring to suffer death rather than offend against his conscience. This sealed the doom of both, although they were not immediately executed, Cromwell fearing to compromise himself with the king by stretching his hand too high all at once. There was danger, too, of the Roman Catholic party attempting resistance, incited thereto both by oppression at home and the newly awakened zeal of its leaders abroad. Clement VII., to whose weakness and wavering indecision the Reformation owed so much, died on the 25th of September, 1534, scarcely six months after the destruction of the papal supremacy in England, and he was succeeded by Paul III., or Alexander Farnese, a fierce Italian, of ultra-catholic views. One of his first acts was to send a cardinal's hat to Bishop Fisher, lying in prison and awaiting his trial—a present as injudicious on the part of the giver as fatal for the receiver. "Ah!" brutally cried Henry, when he heard the news; "Paul may send him the hat; but I will take care he shall have no head to wear it."

To complete the great measure of England's severance from Rome in all its details, Cromwell summoned the parliament again on the 3rd of November, 1534, seven months after its prorogation. On his bidding, a number of fresh statutes were passed, stopping every crevice by which papal influence might attempt to creep again into the realm. The most important of these statutes ordered that "the king, his heirs, and successors, shall have full power and authority, from time to time, to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities whatsoever they be, which by any manner of spiritual jurisdiction or authority, ought, or may lawfully be reformed." Cromwell's intention in drawing up this Act evidently was to give the crown power of sweeping away every fragment of Roman Catholic superstition, and to introduce the purer tenets of Protestantism; but Henry soon proved to him that he understood the matter differently, his object being, not to make England Protestant, but to make himself a lay-pope. Seemingly unaware that his present keepers were adherents of the reformed religion, and that he himself was drifting, with full sails, in the same direction, the royal tiger, bloodthirsty as ever, laid his claws alike upon the friends of Rome and the partisans of Luther, killing them in turn, with beautiful impartiality. After executing the Maid of Kent, with her troop of attendant priests and friars, Henry sent a batch of Lollards to the stake; they were followed by another file of monks, and these again by a fresh lot of zealous Protestants. The latter were on the whole more severely dealt with than the believers in Rome. One John Frith, "a very learned young man, of an excellent and goodly wit," was burnt at Smithfield for no other crime than that of writing a book against the purgatory; and several others were cruelly tortured to death, at slow fires, for merely expressing disbelief in the favourite popish doctrine of transubstantiation. At the very same time that this persecution of the Protestants took place, Henry ordered that the word "pope" should be erased from all books employed in public worship, and that all clergymen and schoolmasters should teach that the king was the only true head of the Church, and the pope an impostor. To spur the zeal of the preachers and teachers, the sheriffs in each county were commanded to keep vigilant watch over them, and to see not only that they did their duty, but did it with the necessary zeal, "without coldness and indifference." The penalties of non-observance were, for Catholics to be hung, and for Protestants to be burnt. If Henry's theology was defective, it was made up in the perfection of his criminal code.

At the beginning of the year 1535, the king assumed, with great pomp, his new title of supreme head of the Church. Not having been able hitherto to make any sort of spectacle out of the new movement, he did so on this occasion, and on the 15th of January went through various exhibitions of the usual magnificence, with the addition of more than usual incense and worship. There was some outward reason for the latter, for not only were all his courtiers, ministers, and councillors, even to his consort, bowed in the dust before him, but parliament itself and half the nation lay crawling at the feet of the despot. The lords and commons of England no more voted subsidies, but on their knees kept begging that the king, their "most gracious sovereign lord, upon whom and in whom dependeth all their joy and wealth," would condescend to take any amount of the fortunes of his most humble subjects. Besides the ordinary taxes, increased from year to year, the first fruits of all spiritual dignities and promotions were given to the king in his new dignity, as well as an annual allowance of one-tenth part of the whole of the possessions of the Church. To protect the king's sacred majesty, it was enacted likewise that whosoever should utter a word against him, or his "dignity, title, or name," should be deemed guilty of treason; and that a denial of his authority, spiritual or temporal, should be punished likewise with instant death. A number of other statutes enacted the most severe penalties for all offences, however slight, against the despot upon the throne, giving him full power, if so inclined, to hang, burn, or decapitate three-fourths of the subjects under his sway. But Henry was mercifully inclined, on the whole, only taking heads when it suited his immediate purpose, or went to satisfy a passing whim. After his inauguration as lay-pope, in January, 1535, there passed nearly five weeks without any executions, and the next who suffered were some twenty Dutch Anabaptists, who had sought an asylum in England from persecutions in their own country. The imprudent people were duly burnt at Smithfield. The turn now was for the Roman Catholics, and in April, three priors of the Charterhouse, a Bridget monk of Sion, and some other priests were sent to the Tower, on account of speaking, or thinking, treasonably. Having lain in chains for a fortnight, they were taken to Tyburn on the 4th of May, and hung on the gallows in their priestly robes. It was a nice distinction shown by the Defender of the Faith, and proving his love for etiquette, that he invariably hung the Catholics and burnt the Protestants. The only exception made was in the case of persons of rank, who had the honour of being beheaded.

The two great chiefs of the Roman Catholic party, Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More, after having been in prison for more than a year, suffering the greatest indignities, were at last put upon their trial on the 7th of May, three days after the execution of the Carthusian priests at Tyburn. Their trial, even in the reign of terror which had now commenced, excited the greatest attention, and not only all England, but the whole of Europe was watching it with intense interest, the two accused being looked upon as among the foremost men of the age. Bishop Fisher, now past seventy, having held the see of Rochester for thirty-three years, was universally held one of the most learned theologians of the sixteenth century, being the intimate friend of the famous Erasmus of Rotterdam, and distinguished alike for a spotless life and the mild tolerance of his religious views. Upon Henry he had particular claims, as having been his teacher, friend, and adviser from earliest infancy, and being, moreover, the last survivor of all the councillors of his father, Henry VII. But the royal tiger upon the throne knew not, nor acknowledged any such claims. After exposing the aged prelate, whose days on earth were numbered, to the most cruel sufferings, chaining him down in a filthy hole, covered with rags only, and without any but the coarsest food, he had him brought to trial in a dying state, accused, together with More, of the sole crime of believing in the legality of the king's first marriage. Like all the judicial proceedings of Henry, the trial was a mere mockery of law as well as justice. Put before some special commissioners, presided over by the lawyer-hangman Audley, the aged bishop was found guilty without hesitation, and sent to the block at once. The execution took place on the 22nd of June, under circumstances of disgusting cruelty, the head of the venerable old prelate being stuck on London Bridge, and the body, stripped of its clothes, being left naked all day on the ground at the foot of the scaffold. It was a fit revenge of the new lay-pope against the man who had taught him the first principles of religion.

The trial of Sir Thomas More was protracted a little longer than that of his unfortunate fellow victim, partly out of malice and partly from fear. Even his enemies acknowledged his greatness; for years Henry had boasted that More was his most intimate friend, and all the learned men of the continent agreed that he was unsurpassed in literary genius. The ex-chancellor, too, was "the first Englishman who analyzed himself as an orator," and being a most accomplished as well as most eloquent lawyer, even Henry's judges found it difficult to get him within their grasp, and to preserve, at the same time, some faint show or resemblance, if not of justice, at least of law. The great lawyer fenced skilfully enough, evidently anxious, for the sake of many beloved children, to save his life. But his doom was sealed; there was no possible escape from the clutches of such a royal friend as Henry. All during the trial More seemed to feel oppressed; but the fatal sentence having been pronounced, he rose calmly, telling his mock judges that now there was no temptation on his part to conceal the full truth any longer, and that he felt bound, therefore, to declare openly that, after having studied the question for seven years, he had come to the conclusion that Catherine was the king's lawful wife, and his other union illegal. When he turned round to leave the court, his son threw himself on his knees, invoking a father's last blessing, and while walking back to the Tower, with the sharp edge of the executioner's axe turned towards him, his first-born child, Margaret, twice broke her way through the guards, clasping him in her arms, and bathing him with her tears. Even the rough soldiers, brute instruments of despot power, could not help crying at sight of the touching spectacle. But Henry cheerfully signed the death warrant of his old friend, and had his grey head, like his tutor's, stuck upon the spikes of London Bridge. More was executed on the 6th of July, 1535, and his death raised a cry of horror throughout Europe. "Rather than lose such a servant, we would have sacrificed the best city in our dominions," exclaimed Kaiser Charles when he heard the news. "More is dead, and a reign of terror has shrunk up the shuddering realm of England," wrote Erasmus of Rotterdam. He did not presage, the great scholar, that the terrors past were mild compared with the terrors to come.

When the report of the executions of Fisher and More reached Rome, there was immense excitement among pope and cardinals. Paul III., possessing still faith in spiritual lightning, at once launched his pontifical curses upon Henry, threatening him with the most severe penalties of the Church. The excommunications were embodied in a number of Bulls, some of which were despatched to England, while others were prudently kept for subsequent use. By one of the Bulls, the king and all his accomplices in the executions of Fisher and More were summoned to appear at Rome before the end of ninety days, to answer for their conduct; by others, Henry and all his ministers were excommunicated, his subjects were absolved from their oath of allegiance, and the kingdom was laid under an interdict. Cromwell took great care to publish the report of these proceedings, well knowing that if anything could reconcile the people of England to a reign of terror, the foolish threats of the foreign pope would be most likely to have this effect. Such was indeed the case, and the results were visible before long in bursts of animosity breaking out in many of the towns against the priesthood, still supposed to lean towards Rome. Cromwell thought this a favourable moment for commencing another important part of his great scheme of religious reform, the first notions of which he had received in Germany. He had there seen how nothing more effectually aided the spread of Protestantism than the destruction of the great priestly fortresses, called monasteries, within and around which papal Rome was keeping all the sources and engines of its world-overshadowing power and influence. There was not the least difficulty to obtain the royal consent to the measure contemplated by Cromwell; all that was necessary was to whisper in Henry's ear the tale of the riches hidden within convent walls. The shrewd blacksmith's son of Putney knew more about convents than most men in England, having had occasion to report a large number of them while in Wolsey's employment. In the latter years of his sway the cardinal had obtained a Bull from Rome, authorizing him to break up a number of the smaller monasteries, and to employ the proceeds for the erection of educational establishments; and the task of visitation, for destructive purposes, having been intrusted to Cromwell, he had gained a thorough insight into the condition of these priestly fortifications. Henry's eyes, very likely, gloated not less eagerly on the quivering lips of his bold servant when he told the story of the convent treasures, than when bringing his first news of the German princes who had made themselves popes. In the seven years that had elapsed since Cromwell had come to court, to "make or mar" his fortunes, he had risen from dignity to dignity, and been made the king's chief adviser and prime-minister; until now he was very nearly in the same position as his old master, except not having the red hat. But this was an advantage rather than an obstacle to his sweeping measures of ecclesiastical reform, and the destruction of the monasteries having been settled between him and Henry, he assumed the titles necessary for his new labours. By a royal decree, issued in the summer of 1535, Cromwell was nominated the king's "vice-regent, vicar-general, and principal commissary" in all matters relating to the clergy, with special powers for "the godly reformation and redress of all errors, heresies, and abuses in the Church." Archbishop Cranmer, far less bold than his fellow worker in the field of reform, had for some time past ceded a part of his functions to the lay vicar-general; and the latter found it easy, therefore, to enter upon his new task, which made him virtually primate of all England, with royal and papal power superadded. Cromwell set to work in thorough earnest, a very Luther with English arms and sinews, not preaching, but acting, and wielding his sledge-hammer like a true blacksmith's son. With a clear, keen view of the actual state of things, and the necessities of the "godly reformation," he commenced his gigantic labours by suspending the whole of the bishops from their functions, and not reinstating them until their affairs had been completely investigated, and they had sworn obedience to the king, and to himself, as vice-regent. While this was taking place under Cromwell's own superintendence, a detachment of special commissioners, mostly men of learning and all good Protestants, went travelling over the country, visiting every hive inhabited by monks or nuns, and making a strict inventory of all their property, with careful account of the spiritual and other doings. Seeing the still unbroken power of the priesthood, and their great influence over the lower classes of the population, the whole was an extremely dangerous task, yet it was accomplished with wonderful zeal, discretion, and energy by Cromwell's agents, all working in the spirit of the master mind, the most extraordinary vicar-general ever seen in England.

Thomas Cromwell's agents mostly travelled in pairs, for greater security; being well armed moreover, and accompanied by stout servants. At home in the saddle as well as the pulpit, they spurred along highways and byways, thoroughly aware that hard riding would be the only means of discovering stores full of honey, instead of empty beehives. From old experience, Cromwell knew that some of the richest hives were to be found in the south-eastern counties, ancient home of monks and nuns; and thither he despatched one of his best men, Dr. Layton, thoroughly up in Greek and the use of the broad-sword. With the commission of the king's vicar-general "in all his ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the realm" in his pocket, the worthy doctor set out on his tour in the early autumn of 1535, faithfully reporting the results of his labour. Some of those were exceedingly curious, well demonstrating the necessity of the powers obtained by Cromwell for the "redress of all errors, heresies, and abuses in the Church." At Langdon, near Dover, the zealous commissioner came unawares upon a beautiful little abbey, resembling, in its interior arrangements, a Turkish harem rather than a Christian house of prayer. The place having been secured by the commissioner's servants, with orders to guard "all back doors and starting-holes," Dr. Layton himself knocked for admission at the front gate, stating his official errand. Being refused entrance, the door, as usual, was broken open; "and," reported the valiant doctor, "about the house I go, with the pole-axe in my hand, for the abbot is a dangerous desperate knave, and a hardy." Out of one of the "starting holes," meanwhile, "rushed a tender demoiselle," who was safely caught and taken to Dover prison, while the abbot was conveyed to Canterbury. Such, and far worse scenes occurred all through England; the corruption of some of the religious houses, particularly the smaller establishments, being found perfectly revolting, and such as to surpass all belief. After the commissioners had finished their inspection, a general report was drawn up by Cromwell, and laid before parliament early in the year 1536, together with an Act for the suppression of all those monasteries which had been found to be corrupted, and beyond hope of reform. The lords and commons, without hesitation, passed the statute of the vicar-general, by which most of the smaller, and a few of the larger convents, colleges, and abbeys, amounting altogether to three hundred and seventy-six, were broken up, and their estates made over to the crown. The total revenues from the monasteries thus dissolved were estimated at 32,000 pounds sterling, besides which there was realised an immediate harvest, in cash, plate, and jewels, of the value of 100,000 pounds, or more than a million and a half of money of the present day. Henry pocketed this immense sum with great zest, more than ever pleased with his trusty servant Thomas Cromwell.

Wolsey's successor had hitherto devoted his whole attention to the interior administration of the kingdom, and the mighty reforms in the religious life of the nation, the superintendence and direction of which, indeed, was more than a full task for even the most hard working of men. But the labour connected with the dissolution of the monasteries having come, provisionally, to an end, Cromwell began directing himself to foreign politics, following in the road pursued by the cardinal, though with higher and altogether different ends in view. His great object was to bring about an intimate alliance between all the princes of Europe who had adopted the reformed religion, or, at least, renounced connection with Rome; and thus to form a strong barrier against the efforts of both pope and Kaiser to bring all the nations back, by force or cunning, within the fold of ancient superstition. It was a noble aim, and exceedingly well-timed. Kaiser Charles, after making several ineffectual attempts of crushing the Protestant power of northern Germany, had been compelled to desist from his attacks, and made a promise of religious tolerance in the peace of Nuremberg, signed on the 23rd July, 1532. But the Lutheran princes, headed by the elector of Saxony, were not at all inclined to place implicit faith in the emperor's promise, dictated as it was by temporary necessities; and seeking greater security in their own good cause and the strength of their arms, they knitted themselves together in the strictest bond of union, so as to gain peace through constant readiness for war. But their resources in men, and still more in money, were limited, and they could scarcely hope to withstand for any length of time the forces which Kaiser Charles might be able to send against them when released from his French and Italian difficulties. Under these circumstances Cromwell conceived the great idea of placing Henry at the head of the German Protestant league, thus serving the cause of true religion at the same time with England's best political interests. After some persuasion, and having had his vanity duly tickled, Henry consented to dispatch ambassadors into Germany, with propositions for an alliance. The negotiation lasted longer than Cromwell expected, the little princes of the north showing a far greater zeal for religion than for political power, and expressing doubts as to the real Protestantism of the English king. Finally, however, the basis of a treaty was settled, stipulating that all the princes should form themselves in a new Protestant league, under the direction of a Free Council, and that the king should become head of this Council and Protector of the League, on condition of subscribing to the Augsburg confession of faith, altered in a few particulars by common consent. Henry accepted these stipulations; whereupon it was arranged that the elector of Saxony should select two of the most famous doctors of theology of his university of Leipsic, to go to England and instruct the king in the Augsburg faith. The learned professors, Franz Buechhardt and Friedrich Myconius, obeyed the electoral summons, and were on the point of setting out on their mission, when they were stopped by the news of a frightful event, received everywhere with horror and execration, and shattering all hopes of the king of England ever becoming a true disciple of the gospel of Christ.

The infatuation shown by Henry for Anne Boleyn did, as was in the nature of things, not last long. As her beauty faded, so faded his love, or rather his passion; and when she had brought him a girl, instead of a male heir, as he expected, the last remnant of his affection faded, and his brutal nature entirely got the upper hand. The behaviour of the young queen, under these trying circumstances, was not distinguished by either wisdom or high morality. She created herself numerous enemies by her vain arrogance, making, among others, the duke of Norfolk her deadly foe; while at the same time she exhibited a revengeful feeling against the unfortunate woman whom she had helped to push from the throne, which irritated even the king. With marvellous hypocrisy, Henry continued to speak of his deposed wife as his sister-in-law, treating her as if she had never been anything else but the widow of his brother Arthur, and punctilious in assigning her rank as the dowager princess of Wales. Anne Boleyn was not actress enough to rise to this height of dissimulation, nor had she charity enough to bestow one atom of pity upon the unhappy being whom she had robbed of home and husband. As mean souls always hate those whom they have injured, so she hated Catherine, taking little care to hide her malignity. It was owing to her that the suffering queen was driven from the comparatively healthy residence at Amptstall to the damp air of Bugden; and not dying sufficiently soon here, was still further exiled, in 1535, to Kimbolton Castle, a place notorious for its fever atmosphere. This last removal had the desired effect, and on the 8th of January, 1536, Catherine breathed her last, dictating, in final agony, a farewell to her "dear husband." When the report of his wife's death reached Henry, he pretended to be greatly moved, and instantly resolved to give her a splendid funeral. "Forasmuch," ran his letter to the keeper of Kimbolton Castle, "as it hath pleased Almighty God to call to his mercy, out of this transitory life, the right excellent princess, our dearest sister the Lady Catherine, relict of our natural brother Prince Arthur, of famous memory, deceased, we intend to have her body interred according to her honour and estate." Following in this line of tragi-comedy which he had laid down for himself, Henry ordered the Court into mourning for his "dearest sister," and on the day of her funeral was in black from head to foot. Of such a husband Anne Boleyn was a poor mate. The news of the death of Catherine brought forth a wild exclamation of joy on her part. "Now I am, indeed, a queen!"

ANNE BOLEYN'S CHEST AND KEYS.

she screamed, handing a costly present to the bearer of the mournful tidings. Her exultation knew no bounds, and on the day of the funeral of her former mistress, she so far forgot herself as to disobey the strict orders of the king, by appearing, with all her ladies, in bright clothes, instead of mourning. Henry growled, deeply offended in his matchless vanity and conceit. In his eyes the offence of the woman whom he had raised from the dust was great indeed; for in not complying with his orders, she not only did what mortals never dared, but her disobedience involved the accusation of hypocrisy against himself. Anne Boleyn's bright garments said more than words, that she did not believe in the king's assertion of the "Lady Catherine" being the "relict of our natural brother Prince Arthur, of famous memory;" for, accepting this as the truth, she would have been compelled to mourn for her as a near and dear relation. It was enough to rouse the dormant tiger, suffering from palled appetite.

On the 29th of January, little more than a fortnight after the funeral of Catherine, which made her so gay, Anne Boleyn was delivered of a dead son. The confinement of the queen was premature, and due to the excitement and anger of having found the king in the arms of another woman, called Jane Seymour, one of her own attendants. Notwithstanding this, Henry got furious when he heard of his consort's miscarriage, and storming into her apartment, he bitterly upbraided her with the loss of "his boy." Stung to the quick, the poor suffering creature, forgetting every rule of prudence in her utter misery, told him that he alone was the cause of the loss. The reproach was too true to be ever forgiven, and the despot left the room, muttering she should have no more boys by him. Anne Boleyn's doom was now sealed, Henry's sole thought being to get rid of her in the best, or rather quickest, manner. In the meanwhile, false as ever, he kept his countenance, giving Anne her place as consort, and allowing her to share in his spectacular performances. On the first day of May there was a grand tournament, of more than usual splendour, in front of Greenwich palace, the king and queen looking on from the royal balcony. Henry was all smiles; but suddenly, in the midst of the pageant, his brow darkened, and he abruptly quitted his place. On this signal, Lord Rochford, the queen's brother, and several other knights who took part in the tournament, were arrested, and Anne Boleyn, returning to her room, was met by the lieutenant of the Tower, who led her away. The first wild burst of despair seemed to drive her mad; but after a while, in the solitude of the prison, she recovered her calmness, and having tried in vain to obtain an interview with the king, she addressed to him a piteous but dignified letter. "Your grace's displeasure," Anne Boleyn began, "and my imprisonment are things so strange unto me, as what to write or what to excuse I am altogether ignorant." Then, dwelling on possible accusations against her, and eloquently asserting that "never prince had wife more loyal in all duty and in all true affection," she continued: "try me, my lord, but let me have a lawful trial; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see either mine innocence cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already settled on that party for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto, your grace not being ignorant of my suspicion therein. But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander, must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness, then I desire of God that He will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof, and that He will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me at His general judgment-seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear, and in whose judgment I doubt not, whatsoever the world may think of me, mine innocence shall be openly known and sufficiently cleared. My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen who, as I understand, are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Anne Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request, and I will so leave to trouble your grace any farther, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in His good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this sixth of May. Your most loyal and ever faithful wife, ANNE BOLEYN."

There was no response to this touching appeal. The death of the poor woman, of whom the royal admirer had got tired, was settled; and her successor being chosen already, the eloquence of the heavens would have been lost upon a lecherous tyrant of unbridled power. Henry's proceedings to get rid of his second wife were not distinguished by much formality. Anne Boleyn was charged with adultery with her own brother and several other men, and under this indictment, which was called high treason by the forced interpretation of a statute of Edward III., she was tried on the 15th of May, in the Hall of the Tower, before twenty-six noblemen appointed by the king. With an excess of refined cruelty, Anne Boleyn's father, the earl of Wiltshire, was made to sit among the judges, as well as Henry's bastard son, the duke of Richmond—fruit of his amours with the wife of Sir Gilbert Talbot—who was married to Anne's cousin. The charges made against the unhappy creature, still, with mock formality, called queen of England, were of the most disgusting nature, and of all but unspeakable vileness; but there was not a tittle of real evidence brought forward to substantiate them. Anne Boleyn had no counsel, nor were any needed in the sham trial, and she contented herself with solemnly and earnestly denying all the ludicrous imputations brought forward. Her brother and the other accused likewise protested their innocence, but with no more effect—their death being arranged, as necessary for the grim murder contemplated. By the verdict of a majority of the noble peers Anne Boleyn was declared guilty of the crime of high treason, and condemned to be burnt or beheaded "at the king's pleasure." Anne Boleyn heard the sentence calm and unmoved, knowing the lustful beast who had clasped her in his arms so long, and who, as she was aware, was now on the look out for other prey, too intimately to have the slightest hope of mercy. After once more protesting her entire innocence, and the most solemn manner, calling upon God to be her witness that she had ever been a faithful wife to the king, she returned to her prison, of such calm and serene aspect as to cause surprise even to the lieutenant of the Tower. "I have seen," he exclaimed, "many brave men executed, and most of them have been in great sorrow; but to my knowledge this lady hath joy and pleasure in death."

But there was yet another farce to precede the final tragedy. Henry thought it would be fine to add a small dose of theology to the large measure of criminal law dispensed by his judges in the Tower; and before killing his dearly beloved wife, he had her brought up for a divorce, on the dainty plea that before marrying him she had made a promise of marrying somebody else, and that therefore the nuptials were not valid in conscience. On the 17th of May, the day selected for the execution of her brother and the other victims condemned with her, Anne Boleyn was carried by water from the Tower to a small crypt under Lambeth palace, where Archbishop Cranmer was sitting in solemn mockery, to declare "that the marriage between Henry, king of England, and Anne Boleyn was null and void, and always had been so." A tyrant less atrocious than this lustful brute filling the throne of England, or less blind in his atrocity, must have perceived that this last measure entirely defeated its own ends. If Anne Boleyn had never been the king's wife, it was impossible for her to wrong him by committing adultery, and consequently the whole accusation and judgment against her fell to the ground, the very basis of it having vanished in the air. Thus even the slender legal forms employed by the despot to rid himself of his consort were torn asunder and trampled upon, and her execution became sheer and undisguised assassination. The murder took place on the 19th of May, within the walls of the Tower, on a scaffold erected upon a grass plot known as the Green. Many good men and brave had lost their lives within these grim walls; but never before in the annals of England was there an instance of a woman having been dragged to the scaffold. Reckless as were the kings of the Middle Ages, and unmerciful in the heat of the contest and on the field of battle, they yet respected frail womanhood, allowing its sanctity even in their bitterest enemies. But the bloated tyrant now wearing the crown had no such scruples, and so far from hesitating to commit the foulest murder—and, more than this, the murder of a woman whom, but a few years before, he had declared to love above all earthly things—he aggravated even this most monstrous of crimes by a heartlessness entirely without parallel in the history of mankind. On the morning Anne Boleyn was invited for execution, Henry went to hunt in Epping forest, having made previous arrangements for marrying his paramour, the girl Jane Seymour, the next day. It was carefully settled by him, that while enjoying himself in the green wood, merrily galloping after the hounds, his wife should be killed, and the good news to be communicated to him instantly by sound of cannon. It was at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 19th of May, a Friday, that Anne Boleyn was led to the scaffold. She was carefully dressed, and the bright crimson which flushed her cheeks gave her a radiant, fearful, and more than terrestrial beauty. "Never before," wrote an eyewitness, "the queen looked so marvellously beautiful." Having said a short prayer, and with a last "O Lord God have pity upon my soul!" Anne Boleyn laid her head upon the block. Then there was the flash of a bright sword in the air, a heavy stroke and a deep groan, and all was over. Now the signal gun went booming forth, announcing to the merry hunter in Epping Forest that his second wife had been despatched, and he was free to take a third. And while the gory remains of the queen of England were being stuffed into an old chest, and put away among rubbish, the jovial king rode off in hot haste to Wolf Hall, in Wiltshire, where his pretty mistress was awaiting him with open arms. Never were lovers so happy as King Henry and his new mistress. They were duly married early the next morning at Wolf Hall, both he and she in spotless white, all smiles and unalloyed happiness. Immediately after the marriage ceremony had been performed, the happy husband and wife went to church together, praying to the Almighty, All-seeing God.

When the news of this astounding and unparalleled outrage upon humanity spread abroad, there was at first general incredulity as to its truth; but the facts having been confirmed beyond all doubt, there was a cry of universal horror. The pious Protestants of Germany especially—simple, unsophisticated men, with a strong sense of right and wrong, though, perhaps, narrow-minded in the eyes of super-refined politicians*—stood aghast at the atrocity of the foul crime, offspring of ravenous lust, committed by a king who pretended to be a religious reformer. Without regarding the great advantages which they were going to lose, the members of the Protestant League at once broke off all intercourse with Cromwell's agents, openly declaring that it was impossible now that King Henry should become their leader and Protector. The resolution was a grave one, causing unfeigned sorrow among the Protestant party; while on the other hand it gave ill-disguised satisfaction to the partisans of Rome. That a king who had thrown off the guidance of the sovereign pontiff, and was lying under excommunication, should have committed a heinous crime, was too plausible an argument against Church reformers to be lost sight of; and great accordingly were the taunts and menaces hurled by Roman Catholic writers upon their opponents in discussing the past career of the ruler of England. There were several highly distinguished persons among these writers, at the head of them a scion of the royal line of York, Reginald Pole, a man remarkable in many respects. Reginald Pole, born in the year 1501, was the fourth son of Margaret, countess of Salisbury, the daughter of George, duke of Clarence, and therefore first cousin of Henry's mother. His education was very carefully attended to from his earliest infancy, his excellent mother withdrawing him from the turmoil of high life, and placing him, first in a Carthusian cloister near London, and subsequently under the best tutors at the university of Oxford. At the age of nineteen, Reginald expressed a wish to go abroad, with a view to complete his education at Padua, then the most famous seat of learning in Europe. Through the influence of Queen Catherine, who was on intimate terms with the countess of Salisbury, the young student had a liberal pension granted to him by his royal relative; and making good use of his funds, he acquired a vast stock of knowledge at the Italian university, besides gaining the friendship of some of the most eminent men of the day. In 1525, Reginald Pole returned to England, famous already as a highly accomplished scholar, and as such, and on account of his illustrious birth, expected to rise to an important position. However, not relishing the atmosphere of the Court, he kept away from it, shutting himself up in his old Carthusian retreat near London. Here he remained quietly until the great question of the divorce came to be discussed, in which, quite against his will, he was made to take a part. Henry's brutal notion was, that having allowed his cousin a certain sum of money to prosecute his studies, the latter was bound to him hand and foot, and compelled to do his behest in everything that was required of him. Thus Pole was requested to stand forth as a champion of the divorce. But he absolutely refused to do so, repeating his denial even after the offer of an immense bribe, in the shape of the bishoprics of York and Winchester, vacant through the fall of Wolsey. But so anxious was Henry to gain the great scholar over to his cause, that even now he did not cease his efforts. Pole's two brothers, both attached to the royal court, were set to importune him to give way, offering higher and higher bribes, and telling him that his continued refusal would be the ruin of all the family. However, his answer was firmly persisted in, that he could not act against his own conscience by complying with the wishes of the king. This not sufficing to make an end of the demand, Pole at last took a bold step. He went personally to the king, to state his reasons against the divorce, and its impossibility on moral and religious grounds. Henry received his cousin in the most affable manner, but hearing what he had come to say, his hand fell upon the jewelled hilt of his dagger, and the royal countenance changed into that of the tiger. But Reginald Pole met the savage glance with a look of equally fierce determination—he, too, had York blood in his veins, and knew how to use dagger and sword. The tyrant was cowed, and dropped his arm, muttering that he would consider the advice given. Pole knew what it meant, and, taking care not to provoke the tiger a second time, went away to the Continent. There was now one man in Europe, who not only thoroughly understood King Henry, but who was thoroughly able to rise full length against him in opposition.

Pole retreated to Padua, shut up, as of old, amidst his books. The king, forgetting, in all his other doings, that little scene of the dagger, continued to send messages and books to his cousin, hoping yet, by bribes and compliments, to bring him back to England, so as to make him either useful or harmless. Pole's answer to all communications was that he would reply to Henry soon, in a long letter. The letter got long indeed, for it took him above a year to write it. To prevent mistakes, Pole finally had it printed, and in this form despatched it to Henry, into whose hands it was laid four days after the execution of Anne Boleyn, while he was yet enjoying the first week of his new honeymoon at Wolf Hall. The epistle did not add in any way to the sweets of the sweet season, as it was composed in a style such as had never yet rung in Henry's ears. Reginald Pole told his cousin, in the choicest Latin, that he was a profligate, adulterer, and murderer; that nameless crimes could be laid to his charge; and that he was a foul being who should be spurned from the society of men. The Christians, he said, were arming to repulse the inroad of the Turk, but they ought to attack first him, the crowned monster, worse than any Turkish despot that ever lived. And speaking of Anne Boleyn, he exclaimed, "Is she not the sister of her whom thou first violated, and a long time afterwards had with thee in the place of a concubine? For twenty-seven years," he continued, "nothing but lechery, murder, and rapine is known of thee. To replenish thy treasury, thou hast robbed every class of thy subjects; thou hast always made a mock of thy nobility; and thy people thou hast never loved. The learned and the clergy thou hast harassed in every way, and thou hast most cruelly torn to pieces some of the best and worthiest men of the realm: not as if thou wert a man, but like a rabid beast. To all men thou seemest more cruel than any pirate, and more audacious in thy cruelty than Satan himself." It was certainly strong language, not suffering in its vigour from being full of truth, and in Latin absolutely faultless. The letter was given to the world soon after Henry had received his first copy, and created a profound impression throughout the whole of Europe. With his usual admirable hypocrisy, the king professed to look upon the address of his cousin as a friendly joke, and, in the innocence of his heart, went so far as to invite Reginald Pole to come to England, "to explain some portions of his letter." In this little invitation, a week after the murder of his wife, Henry surpassed himself.

Reginald Pole's fierce onslaught upon the king did not remain without political consequences. The causes of dissatisfaction with Henry's despotic government were so numerous that nothing but a breath was required to fan them into flame, and this was given in an injunction from Rome. Almost simultaneously with the appearance of Pole's letter, which was offered to the public under the title Pro Ecclesiasticæ Unitatis Defensione, Pope Paul III. launched another Bull of excommunication against Henry, treating him as a doomed felon. By this decree, all the subjects of the king were absolved from their oath of allegiance, and commanded not to obey him; all priests and other ecclesiastical persons were ordered to read the excommunication in their churches; and, awaiting the obedience of the people to the dictate of the pope, the whole kingdom was placed under an interdict. The Bull of Paul was affixed to the walls of most of the cities of Scotland, France, and the Netherlands, and numerous copies of it found their way into England, sedulously distributed by the adherents of Rome. Under ordinary circumstances, the effect of such a document would have only been to rouse the people against the insolence of foreign domination; but at this moment the sufferings of the lower classes in many parts of England were so great and general as to destroy all patriotic feelings. The chief complaints of the people were arising from the dissolution of the monasteries. Wise as the measure was in itself, it had proved a source of almost unmitigated evil throughout the country by the manner in which it was carried out. All the immense wealth of the religious bodies, a great part of which was formerly spent in alms and charities, had gone into the royal exchequer, to be wasted in riot and dissipation; while the convent lands were distributed among a number of fawning courtiers, who, very unlike the lenient clerical landlords, had no other object in view than to squeeze money out of the suffering tenants. It was said that Henry had given the revenues of one large monastery to a cook who made him a new toothsome pudding, and the lands of another to a woman who set his armchair in a comfortable position before the fire. More than one splendid peal of church bells was cast on a pair of dice, and waggon-loads of precious manuscripts, the pride of learned churchmen, were sold to shopkeepers as mere waste paper. The consequences of this barbaric spoliation soon became visible in a vast amount of suffering spread all over the kingdom. There were no poor laws to supplant the charity of the monks; but they themselves, often old and venerable, were wandering through the lands which were once their own, crushed under the weight of their miseries, homeless and hopeless, a piteous spectacle to the people among whom they had once distributed alms with a liberal hand. The king's heartlessness was conspicuous here, as everywhere. He grasped wealth only to squander it; and his sole remedy against begging was to hang the beggars. But at last the beggars refused to be hung any longer. The starving peasants of Lincolnshire were the first to rise in insurrection, and some twenty thousand of them assembled together to march upon London. (Clever priests, armed with the papal Bull of excommunication, were quite ready to head the movement, and for about a week the revolt assumed threatening dimensions. But it was only for a week. No sooner had the first detachment of the royal troops touched the vanguard of the insurgents, than they fled in all directions, leaving not even a sufficient number behind for a good wholesale execution. It proved the one thing, that people were not quite ready for revolt in this part of King Henry's realm.

But the insurrection in Lincolnshire had no sooner been quenched, when a far more formidable outbreak took place in the northern counties. In the autumn of 1536, some forty thousand men assembled between the Humber and Tees, and choosing for leader a wealthy lawyer called Robert Aske, they organized themselves in military fashion, and boldly went to attack the great fortresses of the north. On the banners of the insurgents were painted the five wounds of Christ; in front of each battalion marched priests, carrying tall crosses; and their movement they themselves called the Pilgrimage of Grace. Wherever they appeared, they reinstalled the monks in their convents, compelling, at the same time, the people to join them, so that their numbers increased like the falling avalanche. They first laid siege to Pontefract, in which the archbishop of York and Lord Darcy had taken refuge, and after but a faint show of resistance the fortress opened its gates. Then came the turn of York and Hull, which were taken with very little trouble, and the victorious insurgents now found themselves masters of almost the whole of Yorkshire. There were no royal troops to oppose them, until the duke of Norfolk, in slow marches, advanced as far as Doncaster, at the head of not more than five thousand men. Unwilling to face the enemy with this handful of troops, the duke began to negotiate by sending a herald to the rebel commander-in-chief, Robert Aske. The latter received the messenger in a very stately manner, sitting on a sort of throne, with the archbishop of York on one side and Lord Darcy on the other, both having apparently joined the insurrection. After many interviews, and by alternate threats and promises, Norfolk succeeded in inducing the Pilgrims of Grace to lay down their arms, and Robert Aske himself was invited to Court, treated with some distinction, and desired to aid in the pacification of the people. Henry issued a general pardon, frightened by the report that Polo was coming over from Italy to place himself at the head of the insurrection, and to make a bold grasp at the crown of England. Although only true in part, the news was enough to blanch Henry's cheek. The despot was too coldly cruel not to be superstitious; and while assuming an outward indifference, he was trembling, in the depth of his heart, before the thunders of excommunication hurled at him by the gaunt high priest from the chair of St. Peter.

CASTLE OF HULL.

ANNE BOLEYN IN THE TOWER.

There was some reason, besides his superstition and popish sympathies, why the king should fear the arrival of Reginald Pole in England. He had some claims to the crown of England in his own right, and these claims became stronger through the overthrow of all regular claims of succession,—first consequence of Henry's lustful wickedness. After having bastardized the child of his first marriage to get a second wife, he repeated the same process in obtaining his third spouse. Anne Boleyn's corpse had no sooner been stuffed into the old chest at the Tower, when he declared her offspring, Princess Elizabeth, illegitimate, and a parliament, called together immediately after, had to legalize the Act, supplementing it by the extraordinary declaration that the king had full power to nominate his own successor. But the Lords and Commons of England, never more than royal servants in this reign, had sunk now into such utter nothingness, that it was doubtful whether their enactments would be accepted as valid by posterity; and Henry himself could scarcely help feeling contempt for men who pretended to be representatives of the nation, but crawled at his feet like mere lackeys. Under these circumstances, the succession to the throne was in the most doubtful state, and even without insurrections and Bulls of excommunication Reginald Pole and his brothers were likely to become at any moment dangerous pretenders to the crown. To the great relief of Henry, his third spouse showed signs of giving him a heir, little more than a year after the happy nuptials at Wolf Hall. Queen Jane Seymour, the eldest of eight children of Sir John Seymour, a country squire of Wiltshire, showed herself a strongly practical woman. She got the marriage cakes ready while her predecessor and former mistress was preparing for the block; and she never after inquired much about her angust husband's pursuits, nor showed herself jealous of any other woman who might possibly attract the royal eyes. Thus all looked hopeful for King Henry, though not to the extent of his neglecting any precaution which might lead to a similar accident to that which had happened to Anne Boleyn. In the summer of 1537, Henry announced to his prime-minister the pregnancy of his beloved wife, Jane Seymour, in somewhat significant words. "Albeit," he wrote, "she is in every condition of that loving inclination and reverend conformity that she can in all things well content, rest, and satisfy herself with anything which we shall think expedient and determine; yet, considering that, being but a woman, upon some sudden and displeasing rumours and bruits, that might by foolish or light persons be blown abroad in our absence, she might take to her stomach such impressions as might engender no little danger or displeasure to the infant with which she is now pregnant (which God forbid), it hath been thought by our council very necessary, that, for avoiding such perils, we should not extend our progress farther from her than sixty miles." This extreme act of royal kindness to one "but a woman" was requited by the happiest result.

On the 12th of October, 1537, Jane Seymour was delivered, after great suffering, of a boy. According to a contemporary account, it was doubtful for a time whether the mother or the infant would have to be sacrificed; and the alternative being placed before the king, he eagerly exclaimed, "Get the child by all means, for there are other wives." The command was strictly obeyed, great care being taken of the infant, and very little of the mother; and after enduring terrible pain, Jane Seymour expired on the 24th of October, twelve days after the birth of her child. The queen's delivery took place at Hampton Court on a Friday; and on the Monday following, at the hour of midnight, the infant was taken to the chapel of the palace, and baptized Edward, in the presence of a crowd of courtiers, including the earl of Wiltshire, father of Anne Boleyn, who had to figure in the procession with a taper in his hand and a towel around his neck. At the baptismal font the herald cried: "God, in His almighty and infinite grace, grant good life and long to the right high, right excellent, and noble Prince Edward, duke of Cornwall and earl of Chester, most dear and entirely beloved son of our most dread and gracious lord Henry VIII." After this, the "right high and right excellent" babe was carried back to his mother's chamber, preceded by half a score of trumpeters, who kept braying at the top of their lungs. The king was too fond of spectacle to forego his pleasure on this occasion, although the big trumpeters, marching around the pallet of a woman exhausted unto death, were ~~clearly~~ acting the part of executioners. But, if contributing to kill his beloved spouse, the king made up for it by giving her a splendid burial. Not since the death of Henry VII. had there been seen in England such a gorgeous funeral show as that which accompanied the mortal remains of Queen Jane Seymour from Hampton Court to Windsor. In the midst of an immense procession of priests, performing all the rites of the ancient Church, there was a car of state containing the coffin, and over it was placed the waxen figure of the dead queen, crowned with a magnificent diadem, a sceptre of gold in the right hand and a diamond cross in the left. Henry did not follow in the procession, but he ordered twelve hundred masses to be said for the repose of the soul of his queen. After which he gave minute instructions to Cromwell to search all over Europe for a fine handsome woman, fit to be his next wife.

It was a hard task for the viceroy and vicar-general, who had already heavy work enough on hand, far more important than that of looking after pretty women. The spirit of rebellion in the north was rather smothered than extinguished, and no sooner had the great Yorkshire insurrection been suppressed, than another broke out in Cumberland. In the spring of 1537, between eight and ten thousand men, headed by two landowners, Nicholas Musgrave and Thomas Tilby, assembled in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, and attempted to surprise the town. They failed in this instance; and an attack upon Hull, by another body of insurgents, having likewise met with no success, the crowds dispersed in all directions, many of them being slaughtered in their retreat by the royal troops under the duke of Norfolk. Robert Aske, the former captain-general of the northern rebels, who had fled from the Court as soon as he heard of the new rising, was taken prisoner and hung in chains on one of the towers of York, and a number of more or less distinguished individuals were executed at other places. Lord Darcy, a very old man, accused of being in secret correspondence with the insurgents, was beheaded on Tower Hill; and another great noble, Lord Hussey, met with the same fate at Lincoln. Six priors and a great number of priests were hung in various parts of the kingdom, the proof of their having taken share in the revolt being well substantiated. There was little doubt that this last insurrectionary movement had been originated by the partizans of the pope, and was due, to a considerable extent, to direct impulse from Rome. While the people were rising in Cumberland, Reginald Pole, who had been made a cardinal in the previous year, much against his will, came into Flanders as legate of Paul III., specially commissioned to stir up sedition against the excommunicated king. But the mission had no other effect than that of strengthening the hands of Cromwell, who, well aware that a main lever of the Protestant movement might be found in the national hatred of foreign dictation, lost no opportunity to disclose the intrigues of Rome. Cardinal Pole was proclaimed a traitor, and a price set upon his head; and while popular indignation was running high against him, Cromwell determined to finish his great work, commenced a few years before, that of razing to the ground the strongholds of popery, the monasteries.

The great measure was preceded by a general visitation of the whole of the convents which had survived destruction in the first instance. Again, the trusty agents of the vice gerent, learned doctors on horseback, versed in the use of the pole-axe, went trotting off in all directions, keeping a sharp look-out upon monastic messengers, with particular attention for "starting-holes," and the movement of plate, jewels, and "tender demoiselles." The king, at first, was rather opposed to this new crusade against Roman Catholicism; the more as he continued burning Lutheran heretics, and was more than usually zealous in his prayers for the Virgin and attendance at mass and confession. These tender religious scruples, however, were allayed by a simple act of the vicar general, consisting in the institution of a commission, under the earl of Sussex, called "The Court of Augmentation of the King's Revenue." It was settled that the entire confiscated property of the monasteries should be delivered up to this court, to be held at the sole disposition of the king. Under this satisfactory arrangement Henry became very zealous in the cause of ecclesiastical reform, giving strict orders for the most careful inspection of the monasteries, and imposing high penalties upon the hiding of treasure. However, the monks were not behindhand in their own zeal, proving quite a match for the king and his vicar-general. Anticipating the coming storm, they had time to hide and carry away the greater part of their moveable property; and when the doctors on horseback arrived, they found that the principal articles left for confiscation consisted in relics. Of these, an astounding number was forwarded to the "Court of Augmentation of the King's Revenue." Not less than eleven great monasteries were found to possess girdles of the Virgin Mary; eight had some of her milk, and thirteen had portions of her dress. The ear out by the sword of the apostle from the head of Malchus was discovered at five different places, and the teeth of St. Apollonia, famous for curing the toothache, were so numerous, that when collected they filled a whole tun. From Canterbury alone there came nearly a shipload of relics. Among them were the penknife and the boots of St. Thomas, warranted to procure a safe delivery to pregnant women; the skull of the saint, a mere look at which cured fever, rheumatics, and the gout; and the wooden image of a male angel with only one wing, who had flown into England with the spear-head that pierced Christ on the cross. The monks solemnly declared that these were the greatest treasures they possessed in their houses; but Henry, good Catholic that he was, refused to believe it, threatening them with the gallows unless they should find something better for the Court of Augmentation. This took effect, and the special commissioners had pointed out to them valuable hoardings in the most unexpected places. The king thereupon had the great liberality to present the city of London with his whole collection of relics, which were exhibited to the people at St. Paul's Cross. It was the first great exhibition that ever took place in the metropolis of England.

The visitation of the monasteries extended over two years, from 1537 to 1539, ending in a general measure of confiscation. Although at the beginning the moveable wealth of the religious houses did not appear to be great, the system of terror set at work by the king brought forth an immense amount of hidden treasure, so that the royal exchequer, for the first time since Henry's accession, was actually filled to overflowing. This, however, did not prevent him from applying to parliament soon afterwards, demanding compensation for the trouble and expense he had been brought to in dissolving the monasteries—a demand unsurpassed, even in this reign, for its cool impudence. The total number of conventual establishments suppressed in England and Wales amounted to six hundred and forty five, exclusive of ninety one colleges, one hundred and ten hospitals, and two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chantries and "fire chapels." After the calculation of John Speed, historian of the Reformation, the yearly value of the whole of these religious houses amounted to 161,000*l.*, but to nearly ten times as much according to another historian, Dr. Burnet. Henry appropriated to himself nearly the whole of this enormous sum, only allowing 8,000*l.* a year for the foundation of new bishoprics. As for the monks, some had small pensions doled out to them; others were put in prison, and others sent to the gallows. The inmates of the London Charterhouse were put into Newgate, where they perished through hunger, want, and disease; the priors of Woburn, Burlington, and several other convents, were hung in front of their own churches; and some of the greatest of the monastic rulers, among them the abbots of Reading and of Glastonbury, who lived in princely style, with larger revenues than the highest nobles in the land, fell under the axe of the executioner. After these summary processes, parliament was asked, or rather ordered, to sanction the dissolution of the religious houses, which formality was gone through with much pomp and ceremony. All the members of the two houses waited upon the king, rode in state with him, in pairs, to Westminster Abbey, heard the Mass of the Holy Ghost, and, having escorted his grace back to the palace, proceeded to the parliament chamber in the same state and order. They then passed an Act, drawn up by Cromwell, ordering that "all monasteries, or other religious houses, dissolved, suppressed, surrendered, renounced, relinquished, forfeited, or by any means come to his highness, shall be vested in him, his heirs and successors for ever." Almost simultaneously with this great anti-papal measure, the obsequious representatives of the people enacted a statute more inquisitorial and more popish than any that had ever been passed in England. Henry, by the mouth of his lord chancellor, Thomas Audley, declared that it was his will "to extirpate from the kingdom all diversity of opinion in matters of religion;" and to this end required the co-operation of both the Lords and Commons. To defeat the intrigues of the Roman Catholic party, headed by the duke of Norfolk, Cromwell managed in getting the appointment of a committee, consisting of himself, Crammer, and several other Protestants, to whom was left the task of drawing up certain "articles of faith." But while they were proceeding slowly in their labours, Norfolk got the ear of the king, persuading him to dispense with the committee altogether, and to elaborate the faith of the nation from the depth of his own royal wisdom. This was too much to the taste of Henry not to be at once assented to; and Norfolk, accordingly, was ordered to lay before parliament a short bill of six articles, containing all that the people of England were henceforth to believe, or not to believe. The humble Lords and Commons, immediately and without murmur, did the bidding of their master, converting the bill into a statute, henceforth, and for all times, known as "the bloody statute."

The Spanish inquisition itself, greatest of religious despotisms the world had ever seen, never possessed such powers as those now granted to the English pope-king by the nominal representatives of a free people. By the Statute of Six Articles the monstrous popish doctrine of the real presence was established under the most severe penalties; private masses were declared necessary; auricular confession was absolutely enforced; and the degrading and immoral celibacy of the priesthood was made the law of the land. The mere denial of the real presence doctrine subjected offenders to death by fire, without even the privilege of recantation, one never withheld in the worst times of Romish persecution. The abstaining from confession was likewise punishable with death, as well as the marriage of priests; and to enforce these and other parts of the "bloody statute," commissioners were appointed in all parts of the country. The latter, most of them zealous adherents of Rome, did their work so effectually, that in a short time all the prisons were filled with victims, and the fires of the stake kept blazing from one end of the kingdom to the other. Two among the prelates of the Church of England known as Protestants, Latimer, bishop of Worcester, and Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, stood out against the persecution by resigning their sees, for which mild act of opposition they were at once cast into the Tower. The head of the Protestant party, on the other hand, Archbishop Crammer, meekly bent before the storm, humbling himself before the despot who had raised him to his high position, by casting off his wife and children. All freedom of conscience was now once more banished from the land, and the fiercest persecution of Protestants spread its terrors far and wide. To get a little spectacular amusement on his own account, while the flames were busy in devouring heretics, Henry did not disdain setting up as grand inquisitor. His first appearance in this new character was meant to be imposing. There was a poor wight of a schoolmaster in London, called John Lambert, who, with thousands of others, had adopted the views of the German reformers respecting the eucharist, and who, either more honest or more imprudent than the majority of the thousands—including the archbishop of Canterbury—wished to make converts to his faith. On being tried for heresy, in the archiepiscopal court, the man had the foolish idea of appealing to the king for judgment; whereupon Henry, not at all displeased to meet with an occasion for exhibiting his popeship, resolved to break this little fly upon the wheel. The preparations made for annihilating the poor little schoolmaster were on the usual gorgeous scale. An immense scaffolding, overhung with cloth of gold, was erected in Westminster Hall, with the throne on one side, and accommodation for the judges, clergy, and nobility of England on the other; and all the upholstery being ready, the herald trumpeted forth notice that King Henry the Eighth, lord of England, Ireland, and France, Defender of the Faith, was going to enter the lists against John Lambert. Accustomed as the good citizens of London were to processions, shows, and spectacles of all kinds, this exhibition gave promise of entire novelty; and accordingly, on the day appointed, an immense crowd filled the great hall of Westminster, to witness the touting between king and schoolmaster.

Henry appeared on the throne in robes of white satin, emblem of his immaculate purity as king and judge, and all around, in vast circle, sat the bishops, peers, nobles, and great functionaries of the realm, overwhelming masses of purple and gold. Into the midst of this resplendent company John Lambert was led by soldiers—a very small piece of game for such a mighty array of hunters. The bishop of Winchester, Richard Sampson, opened the exhibition by a long and somewhat remarkable speech. He told his hearers that the wretched heretic now upon his trial had appealed to the king against the judgment of his ecclesiastical superiors, which showed a belief among the vulgar that his majesty had abandoned the religion of his forefathers, and adopted the tenets of some foreign people calling themselves reformers, or Protestants. This, the bishop said, was a wicked falsehood. All that the king, their gracious lord and master, had done, was to free himself of the supremacy of the pontiff; but, this accomplished, he was more than ever anxious to uphold the purity of the Catholic faith, and to destroy all heresies. After this overture, not very hopeful to the poor schoolmaster, Henry commenced his theological spectacle. "What sayest thou, fellow?" he shouted from his throne at the prisoner below, "what sayest thou touching the sacrament of the altar? Wilt thou agree to the doctrine of the Church, or wilt thou deny that the eucharist is the real body of Christ?" There was pluck in the little dominie, as well as abundance of vanity; and being thus questioned, he attempted to recite a set speech, commencing with fulsome praise of the royal master. This, however, was not to Henry's taste, who, while exhibiting his own elephantine dignity, had no wish to show off the little worm he was going to crush under foot. He therefore coarsely interrupted the prisoner, thundering at him a wild mass of arguments, scriptural and non-scriptural, in favour of the real presence doctrine. There was terrific applause in the vast hall at this wonderful display of royal wisdom, utterly annihilating to the poor worm of a school-master; but, to give him the finishing stroke, Archbishop Crammer, with nine other bishops, thought it necessary to fall upon him with a dreadful onslaught of theology. For above five hours the king and all his great and learned men kept tilting at John Lambert, till the wretched creature was fairly in the dust, confused, browbeaten, and utterly bewildered in his senses. At last Henry, in his grand white toga, raised himself full upright, and asked John Lambert the very interesting question whether he felt inclined to live or to die. Trembling all over, the man pitifully prayed for his life, crying, "I yield my body unto your grace's clemency." He might as well have invoked the clemency of a hyena. "Thou must die!" cried the brutal despot; whereupon the sentence of death, prepared beforehand, was read to the prisoner, which finished the spectacle. A few days afterwards John Lambert was burnt at Smithfield, under monstrous cruelties. Instead of being tied to the stake, as usual, his legs and thighs were first consumed at a slow fire, producing such agonies of pain that even the soldiers who stood around took pity upon the miserable being, and lifting him up on their halberds, cast him into the flames to end his fearful sufferings. Encircled by fire, the martyr gasped forth, with his dying breath, "None but Christ; none but Christ."

The despot of England was now fast verging towards madness. His body was slowly dissolving in putrefaction, being eaten up by loathsome disease, while the last fragments of human reason got undermined by fierce cravings of a tiger-like lust. The torturing and burning of heretics remained now but a mild sort of excitement, his chief attention being directed towards getting a new wife. Cromwell's task of procuring this wife had proved even more difficult than at first expected. The jaded voluptuary desired his spouse to be not only of high estate, and of great personal attractions, but of form and countenance strictly prescribed. She was to be stout limbed, warm-eyed, of full and sensuous beauty, able to fan, in looks and gesture, the expiring fire of animal passion. Great as was the experience of the much-travelled vicar-general, he found it difficult, if not impossible, to get such a princess; the more so, as in seeking for a royal spouse, he had to consult his own religious and personal interests as well as those of the mighty beast his master. He felt that with the growing ascendancy of the Roman Catholic party, his own head would soon fall on the block unless he was able to strengthen himself by a new influence, which offered itself in the charms of a queen and his grand object consequently was to find one attached to his interests. Protestant Germany was the country he naturally looked to for support, and his agents carefully examined every princely household, to discover beauty powerful enough to assist in the work of the leaders of the English Reformation. But Henry was too anxious in his matrimonial concerns not to have his own agents also, and those kept exploring southern Europe while Cromwell's men were busy in the north. Gifted, apparently, with a keener scent than their colleagues, the royal envoys were the first to report their discoveries. They had found, at the southern slope of the Alps, a dowager-duchess of Milan, buxom widow with large round eyes, splendid teeth, and a figure to please a sultan—the very ideal of female loveliness required at Hampton Court. The fine widow was not at all unwilling to give matrimony another trial; but, unfortunately, her guardian and near relative was Kaiser Charles, and he would so little hear of a marriage with the king of England, that he threatened to shut her up in a convent if she did so much as mention his name. The poor marriage agents, turned off unceremoniously, were crestfallen for the moment; however, they soon hunted up, north of the Alps, another dowager-lady, Marie de Guise, widow of one duke de Longueville, grandee of France, possessed of a sprinkling of royal blood. She was not nearly so nice and fat as the Italian beauty, but very passable, with a particularly fine complexion and excellent appetite, so that there were hopes she might improve upon the roast beef of old England. But notwithstanding her good appetite, she was a timid creature, fearing for the safety of a pair of blooming cheeks and a pretty round head in a journey to England. It was in vain that Henry, now very anxious to get a fresh spouse, made every effort to win Mary de Guise. The lady remained steadfast in her refusal, pleading a previous engagement with the Scottish monarch; and the king of France, appealed to in the matter, took her part, although he expressed his sorrow to the English ambassador that his fair subject should refuse so high a match. To soften the bitterness of disappointment, Francis, at the same time, offered an eligible wife in the daughter of the duke of Vendôme, likewise of the blood royal; but on hearing that she was rather thin, Henry at once indignantly refused the offer. At length, after much negotiation, the names of several other princesses having been brought forward, Henry had the insolence to propose that the king of France should meet him at Calais, in company with all the handsome and high-born ladies of his court, so that he might have his pick among them. The reply of Francis showed his indignation. He was sorry, he wrote, to disoblige his royal brother; but he had too much respect for the fair sex to carry ladies, like geldings, to the market. The sharp rebuke took no effect upon the coarse mind of Henry, unable to see in women anything but animals; and he continued to insist upon the Calais meeting till replied to with open contempt. It was now Cromwell's turn to present the fruit of his own activity, which he did with eagerness, believing he had found the fair princess destined to be the prop of English Protestantism.

There lived, in the small town of Cleves, on the left bank of the Rhine, close to Holland, an elderly gentleman of good descent, though very poor in purse, with a son and two grown-up daughters, the latter beauties after the Dutch fashion. Owning only a few square miles of land, with the title of Herzog, or duke of Cleves, the old gentleman would have been lost in utter obscurity among the ten score German princes, but for the fact that he was one of the earliest to embrace the tenets of Luther, and displayed great energy in spreading the reformed doctrines in his own remote corner of the empire. This brought him into connection with the elector of Saxony, patron of Luther, and head of the Protestant league, who after a while married his eldest daughter Sybilla. The marriage, which took place in 1527, had some effect upon the progress of the Reformation, inasmuch as Sybilla, as staunch a Protestant as her father, took a zealous part in the great struggle, encouraging her husband, in many a dangerous moment, to stake all and to lose all rather than recoil from his great work. Forming the head quarters of German Protestantism, Cromwell's matrimonial agents visited the Court of the elector of Saxony at the very outset of their tour, and when, after diligent inquiries, they discovered that the energetic electress had two unmarried sisters living at Cleves, they at once started for the little town at the Dutch frontier. Their report as to the physical condition of the ladies being favourable, Cromwell felt intensely anxious to secure one of them for his master, as from a political point of view he could scarcely hope to make a better match. Once the brother-in-law of Luther's friend and protector, and wedded to a princess as zealous for religion as the electress of Saxony, there seemed indeed, all but certainty that Henry would break with the Catholic party and throw himself into the arms of the reformers. But there were difficulties in the way of the alliance, the greatest of them being that the elector of Saxony, a simple-hearted and truly religious man, felt a dislike amounting to abhorrence for the despot of England; deeming him, not unjustly, a monster of cruelty, and, as he expressed it, "more false and more malicious than the pope of Rome." To overcome resistance in this quarter, Cromwell despatched a special envoy, Christopher Mount, to the elector, instructed to urge the importance of the Cleves marriage for the great cause he had most at heart. The effect was as expected by the shrewd vicar-general. On the repeated assurance of Christopher Mount, that the progress of Protestantism in Europe would be greatly accelerated by the visible existence and influence of a Lutheran queen of England, the elector gave way, and his example was enough for the Herzog of Cleves to give his consent to the marriage. As for the Cleves ladies themselves, they had no voice in the matter, having been brought up in the strict Dutch principle of implicit obedience; besides which, it remained undecided on which of the two would fall the choice of the king of England. They awaited their fate with mute resignation; and in the meanwhile, all negotiations for French and Italian princesses having failed, Cromwell had the great satisfaction of informing his master that he not only had found a veritable beauty in Protestant Germany, but even the choice between two beauties. That was pleasant news indeed for King Henry.

But there remained still some obstacles towards the fulfilment of Cromwell's earnest desire. Henry was determined that his fourth wife should be a paragon of loveliness, and in his anxiety to secure all perfections in one woman, mere verbal or written reports of female charms appeared to him weak and insufficient. This had been his great argument in insisting with Francis upon the Calais ladies' market. On the French ambassador representing to him that his agents might send in a minute description of the matrimonial candidates, "Par Dieu," replied Henry, "how can I depend upon any one but myself?" In respect to the princesses of Cleves, this difficulty was the greater, as the father would not even send their portraits. He had consented to the marriage, as he explained to Dr. Barnes and Christopher Mount, agents of Cromwell, for the good of the Protestant cause; but he was by no means anxious about it, and would not be at all displeased if it did not take place. But in the midst of these discussions death came in at the court of Cleves, carrying off the old duke; and his son and successor, a great deal more vain and much less scrupulous than the parent, at once ordered his sisters to sit for their portraits to Hieronimus, renowned painter of Dusseldorf. Before he could execute his task, however, Henry resolved upon a scheme which he thought would ensure perfect truth, by despatching his own great painter, Hans Holbein, together with a special envoy, Nicholas Wotton, dean of Canterbury, to the princesses at Cleves. The dean executed his task first, stating in his report that both the ladies were comely, but the eldest, Anne, more so than her younger sister Amelie. Of Anne his praises were great. "She can read and write her own language," Nicholas Wotton wrote; "but French and Latin, or other language, she knoweth not; nor yet can sing or play on any instrument, for they take it here for a rebuke and an occasion of lightness that great ladies should be learned or have any knowledge of musick. But her wit is so good, that no doubt she will, in a short space, learn the English tongue, whenever she putteth her mind to it." What was still more in Lady Anne's favour, according to the worthy dean, was her not getting drunk, or, as he expressed it, her not being "inclined to the good cheer of the country"—unspeakable virtue in those damp Dutch regions. "Your grace's servant, Hans Holbein," the dean concluded his report, "hath taken the effigies of my Ladye Anne and the Ladye Amelie, and hath expressed their images very lively." The "effigies" duly arrived in the autumn of 1539, and Henry liked that of "my Ladye Anne" so well that he at once determined to do her the great honour of making her his fourth wife. The marriage contract was signed in September by the young Herzog of Cleves, his sister Anne giving her consent to the union shuddering, but without resistance. Accustomed as she was to blind obedience, the poor Dutch maiden could yet not help being frightened at the fate which awaited her. There were dark rumours afloat in the land of Cleves that Henry had murdered his three wives—poisoned the first, beheaded the second, and killed the third by neglect. Lady Anne therefore bid good-bye to her friends with a heavy heart, prepared for death even, but resigned to it as a necessity, fully believing that if she suffered, it was, as the Lutheran minister told her, "for the great cause of Protestantism."

In England, as well as abroad, the marriage of Henry with the princess of Cleves was considered a signal triumph of the Protestant party, and great accordingly was the consternation of the partizans of Rome. The religious camps, by this time, had come to be strictly divided. Cromwell and Cranmer being the leaders on the one side, and the duke of Norfolk, with Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, on the other. Ever since the death of Jane Seymour the great struggle between the two parties had been to choose the new wife of Henry, all other means to tame or guide the savage despot having long been found to be useless. The first news of the Cleves contract was felt by the papists like a death-blow; but they soon recovered themselves, and knowing that their very life depended upon the contest, they made another desperate effort to defeat Cromwell. The plan hit upon was a notable one, altogether worthy of popery and the newly-founded school of jesuitism. It consisted simply in giving Henry a fresh mistress, devoted, heart and soul, to the cause of Rome, and through the influence of this mistress to neutralize, or, if possible, overturn the power of the cunning Protestant wife. The little scheme met with marvellous success. When Henry, on the humble solicitation of Bishop Gardiner, honoured him one day by a dinner visit, he found at the table a relative of the duke of Norfolk, Catherine Howard, a beautiful creature, small featured, dark-eyed, and altogether bewitching. He instantly got enamoured, and the obliging bishop so far favoured the sentiment as not only to give Henry every opportunity of declaring his passion, but arranging subsequent meetings, more or less clandestine, within the precincts of his own mansion. Meanwhile, however, Princess Anne came slowly journeying on from Cleves, was received with great honours at Calais, and on the 27th December, 1539, set foot on the shore of England. The king, who previously had expressed the greatest anxiety to see his bride, now showed no hurry whatever to meet her; and it was not until the first of January, when the princess had come as far as Rochester, that Henry paid her a private visit. On beholding the dreaded tyrant who was to be her husband, the poor princess fell upon her knees, frightened, probably, as much by his ugly looks as by the remembrance of his bloody deeds. Though not more than forty eight at this time, the unwieldy body of the king bore all the marks of vice and disease; his ulcerated limbs, bending under the weight of the swollen trunk, his blotched face, and his protruding big eyes, forming a hideous contrast to the mass of pearls, jewellery, and cloth of gold with which he was bedecked. Utterly ignorant of all the arts of coquetry, Princess Anne was unable to conceal the impression made upon her by the monster she was to wed, and thereupon Henry thought he had a right to be offended. Fresh from the arms of Catherine Howard, voluptuous little woman, of much experience in love matters, Henry contrasted her looks with the cold, impassive, and somewhat broad figure and features of his Dutch bride, and the result of his musings was an instant dislike. Having quitted Anne, the king coarsely told his courtiers that she was "a Flemish mare," and bitterly upbraided Cromwell for having procured him such a wife. The experienced vicar-general, indeed, might have known better. In the gloomy wreck of physical and mental powers of that miserable being who directed the destinies of England, wild lust had long been the strongest impulse, and a cold apathetic Dutch maiden of twenty-four could scarcely be expected to offer fit companionship. Norfolk and his jesuit friends soon proved to Cromwell that they knew more, if not of human nature, at least of human villainess.

To amuse himself, while the preparations for his marriage were being made, Henry had a few heretics executed, burning, as usual, the Protestants, and hanging the Catholics, among the latter an abbot or two. Impartiality was now the more necessary, as the two great religious parties were to all appearance well balanced in the royal favour, the Norfolk camp having furnished a comely mistress and the Cromwell faction an intended wife. But before the Protestant princess had actually reached her high position, the Catholics made one more determined effort to gain the day. As soon as it was known that Henry was dissatisfied with the personal appearance of his contracted spouse, there were not wanting skilful insinuations to fan the dislike; the duke of Norfolk especially, who had accompanied the royal lady from Dover, throwing out hints that, as she was not as fair as represented, the contract might be annulled. It was suggested at the same time that a convenient reason for declining the marriage might be found in Anne having been once promised, by her father, to a prince of Lorraine, which promise might easily be constructed into a pre-engagement. Henry listened placidly to all these insinuations, but nevertheless kept on with the preparations for his marriage. The fact was the "Flemish mare" was by no means an ugly woman; and Marillac, the ambassador of King Francis, who bore her not much good will, wrote home that she was de beauté moyenne, or tolerably handsome. What Henry determined in his own heart, therefore, was to appropriate to himself the lady, first of all, and to cast her off afterwards. This little matter being settled to his own satisfaction, he put on a smiling face, and on the 6th of January went through the ceremony of the nuptials, with the ordinary pomp and splendour. Cromwell's hopes revived after the marriage, for though Henry still professed to dislike his new queen, and made disgusting remarks about her in open court, he yet showed her outward respect, which, it seemed probable, might rise into affection. But all the while the Romanists continued their intrigues, and speculating as much upon the brutal passions of the despot as Cromwell did upon his higher instincts, or what he held to be such, Norfolk and his friends were sure of ultimate victory.

In the spring of 1540 Cromwell called another parliament together, to replenish the king's empty exchequer. The immense sums procured from the dissolution of the monasteries had already been wasted; and to open another source which promised to be bountiful, it was resolved to depose the knights of Malta, who owned many rich lands, houses, and moveable goods in England. The plan of this confiscation came from the vicar-general, and Henry was so much pleased with it that, five days after the meeting of parliament, on the 17th of April, he elevated him to the earldom of Essex, which had just become vacant, making him likewise a Knight of the Garter. One of Cromwell's first measures in the new parliament was to settle the dowry of Queen Anne, after which the demanded subsidies to the king were voted without opposition, as well as the spoliation of the Maltese knights, on the ground that "they had lost the island of Rhodes to the Turks, and that their revenues might be better employed." This having been accomplished, Henry opened his heart to the earl of Essex on another subject, that of getting rid of his wife. But Cromwell, for the first time since he had made himself the slave of the king, offered opposition. Being well aware of Henry's passion for Catherine Howard, the mere tool of his popish antagonists, he rightly judged that the fall of the queen would lead to his own destruction, and, probably, the loss of his life, and therefore spoke eloquently in her behalf. With wonted hypocrisy, Henry pretended to be convinced by the arguments of his minister in favour of retaining the queen, only lamenting that she was "unfit to nourish love." But the pretended submission served but to mask the plans of the king, who from that moment determined to get rid of his old servant, now that he had become an obstacle in the way of his passion. There were long and intimate conferences with Catherine Howard and her friends, and the result became visible on the 10th of June, in the sudden arrest of the earl of Essex. He was presiding at the council board, in the full exercise of his exalted power, when his great enemy, the duke of Norfolk, marched into the room, accompanied by soldiers, and, laying hold of him, exclaimed, "I arrest you in the name of the king." Cromwell quietly walked to the Tower, in the midst of his guards, followed by the yells and curses of a howling mob led by papists. Rome had cause to rejoice and England to weep.

The charge against Cromwell was the usual formula under which Henry effected his murders, namely, high treason. However, as there did not happen to be even the semblance of a decent accusation against him, the proceedings were shortened by ignoring his existence altogether, and putting him on trial in his absence. On the 17th of June, the humble lords passed, with due unanimity, the bill of attainder, which stated that Cromwell had been "the most corrupt traitor and deceiver of the king and the crown that had ever been known in his whole reign;" and the dutiful commons, long crouching at the feet of the powerful minister, but hooting the fallen man like the London mob, having passed the bill with like unanimity, all was ready for the work of murder. Thomas Crammer alone showed some courage, though of a very feeble sort, in defence of his old friend and colleague, in saying that he "thought no king of England had ever had such a servant;" to which he added, however, with archiepiscopal caution, "but if he was a traitor, he was glad it was discovered." On hearing that he had been condemned to death, Cromwell wrote a touching letter to the despot whom he had served—served far too faithfully—for more than twelve years, imploring his mercy. His majesty cried over it, and, having dried his tears sufficiently, gave orders for the execution. It took place on the 28th of July, and to celebrate the event, Henry went through the ceremony of marriage with his bewitching mistress, Catherine Howard. Aiming, as always, at high morality, Henry deemed it necessary, before taking a fifth wife, to get rid of the fourth, which was accomplished in a very simple manner. Cromwell, whom she knew to be her chief protector, as well as the originator of her marriage, having been dragged to the Tower, the queen momentarily expected to follow thither, on the road to the scaffold; and she was overjoyed, therefore, when receiving a notification from her dread husband, asking for nothing more but a voluntary separation. The poor princess never hoped in her life to get rid of Bluebeard thus cheaply, and expressed her extravagant joy, in Dutch fashion, by laying in a stock of new clothes. "Her conduct," wrote Marillac, the French ambassador, to his court, "is the more pleasing to the king, because, as it is said, his new amourette is already with child." With extraordinary generosity, Henry, seeing the meek submission of his wife, granted to her the title of "the king's majesty's sister," as well as a yearly pension of 3,000*l.*, the latter, however, under condition of not returning to her own country. There were always possibilities of the executioner being unnecessarily idle.

Cromwell's murder inaugurated a reign of terror, the atrocities of which surpassed anything previously seen in England, or, indeed, in any Christian country. The Romish party, headed by Norfolk and Gardiner, were now sole rulers, and not a day passed without a number of Protestants being dragged to the stake and committed to the flames. Now and then, to exhibit his superior wisdom and most gracious impartiality, the king interfered with his advisers by hanging a few papists at the same moment that they were burning anti-papists; the show being made more striking by the novelty of Catholics and Protestants being tied together in pairs on hurdles, which were drawn in long strings to the place of execution. While thus busily engaged at home, Henry devoted some of his spare time in spreading a knowledge of his own special theology abroad. He first made efforts to convert the Protestant German princes, and these attempts having been repulsed with some show of indignation, he addressed himself to his nephew, King James of Scotland. James at this moment was in a very peculiar position. Many of his subjects were secret adherents of the Reformed Church, and the middle and upper classes especially seemed ready to throw off the allegiance of Rome; but the priesthood, knit together in a strong bond of union, were more powerful than these dissuited masses, and kept down the tumultuous spirit of free inquiry with a high hand. The first example of their determination to suppress revolt by the terrors of the Church was given in the committal to the flames of a noble youth, called Patrick Hamilton, who had filled for a time the high position of abbot of Fenne. In his travels through Europe, Hamilton had come into contact with several of the friends of Martin Luther whose teachings impressed him so much that, when returned to Scotland, he openly declared his belief in the tenets of the reformers. The report of this flagrant case of heresy was carried by Campbell, prior of the Dominicans, to David Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrews, who thought the matter so important that he summoned Hamilton to appear before a conference and to renounce his errors. The bold youth came forward as called, but absolutely refused recantation; whereupon he was at once condemned to the stake. He met his fate in was very fond of all sorts of magnificence, and was, moreover, assisted in his operations by the very expensive French princesses, his matrimonial partners. His first wife, Madeleine, imitated the manners of the court of Paris; and when at her death, in 1538, he married Marie de Guise—once wooed by Henry, but afraid of taking apartments in the Tower of London—the splendours of Paris itself were thrown into the shade by those of Edinburgh. The good people of Scotland did not at all dislike these glories, except when asked to pay for them, which they stoutly refused, thus putting King James to more than temporary inconvenience. To extricate himself from his financial difficulties, the rich monasteries of Scotland were lying there, a tempting bait, the use of which was strongly advocated by Henry. There was little resistance to be feared on the part of the nobles, who hoped to share the spoil, as in England; nor were the middle classes, already half won over to Protestantism, likely to put in opposition to a measure tending more than any other to undermine the power of an arrogant priesthood under foreign rule. But notwithstanding these favourable opportunities for filling his exchequer, the hand of James was kept off from the possessions of the Church by the

the most heroic manner, and being insulted by his false enemy, the prior of the Dominicans, when already surrounded by flames, he, in solemn manner, cited him to answer for the insult before the heavenly throne of Christ. It so happened that Campbell soon after was attacked by fever, and died raving mad, to the great consternation of the judges of Hamilton, and the no mean satisfaction of his zealous friends, who made no doubt that it was a judgment of Heaven. Others took up the task of preaching the Reformation, among them a man of great eloquence, known as Friar Forrest; and though he too perished in the flames, the Protestant heresy spread farther and farther, till at last the priests themselves began to doubt the effect of their violence. While deliberating where to execute a new victim, a monk ironically advised his clerical brethren to burn him in a cellar, as the smoke of heretical flesh was sure to affect all on whom it blew. Such was the state of things in Scotland when Henry attempted to persuade his royal brother to erect himself into a pope, after his own example.

The characters of James and Henry were utterly unlike; but one thing they had in common—constant want of cash. No matter how often the royal treasury was replenished, it was always and constantly empty; and the distress occasioned was the greater, as James action of two personages who, of all others, had most influence over him, his queen and his prime minister, David Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrews. Marie de Guise was a bigoted and violent Roman Catholic, ready to extirpate the reformed religion by fire and sword; and not less Romanist in his opinions, though more prudent in his actions, was David Beaton. To gain him still more over to his cause, Pope Paul III. sent the cardinal's hat to Beaton, and the effect of the gift soon became visible in renewed persecutions of heretics and an aggressive attitude towards the English government. To counteract the latter, Henry despatched Sir Ralph Sadler, one of his cleverest diplomatists, to the Scottish court, who succeeded in worming himself greatly into favour with King James, and finally reported home, that if Henry would but consent to meet his royal nephew at a friendly interview, a perfect alliance between the two kingdoms might be established. To make a proselyte to his own notions of civil and ecclesiastical government was too flattering to Henry's vanity to be refused, and the proposed meeting, therefore, was settled to take place at York. Henry intended to make the interview as magnificent as possible, not behind his earlier splendours in the Field of Cloth of Gold.

The preparations for the king's progress into Yorkshire were ready in the spring of 1541, but an unexpected occurrence kept his majesty for some months longer at Hampton Court. Suffering under fearful oppression, and impelled by hunger and misery, the people of the northern counties made another attempt at insurrection, which was taken advantage of by the Romanists, who converted it into a fresh "Pilgrimage of Grace." The revolt, like former ones, was soon quenched in blood; but it was followed, nevertheless, by important consequences. Always suspicious, Henry began to distrust his chief advisers, Norfolk and Gardiner, and instead of leaving to them the government of the realm, in his projected journey to the north, he made it over, once more, to Crammer, with whom was associated the earl of Hertford, brother of Jane Seymour, and consequently uncle of Prince Edward, who aimed at filling the place of Cromwell as leader of the growing Protestant party. But though thus discarding the friends of his new wife, Henry made no change in his behaviour towards the queen, but, on the contrary, seemed to get daily more enamoured of her. A reprobate woman, inured in vice from her earliest youth, without any education, and not even able to write her own name, Catherine Howard was, for these very reasons, a fit companion for the jaded voluptuary, whose burnt out passions wanted exertement. Better than any of his previous wives, Catherine understood the art "to nourish love," and Henry was loud in declaring to all who wanted to hear it that he never felt more happy in his connubial relations than with this new spouse. Engrossed by this felicity, Henry, accompanied by his queen, set out on his northern progress early in the autumn of 1541. They were received everywhere with the greatest splendour, the nobles and chief towns vying with each other to entertain the dread majesty of England—dreaded the more as passing over the bloodstained ground of the late rebellion. Slowly the magnificent cavalcade went their way to York, where the triumphal progress was to be completed by the meeting with King James. But Henry's brow darkened on learning that his royal nephew had not only not arrived, but sent a message refusing the meeting altogether. Such an insult had never before been offered to the tyrant before whose breath heads were falling in the dust.

King James, though over anxious to fill his treasury, had little faith in the promises of his uncle to help him in despoiling the monks; and at the very last moment was kept back from the projected interview with him by a most skillful ecclesiastical manoeuvre. All the reasons brought forward by his cardinal minister against an English alliance, and even the tears of his beloved wife, did not make him waver in his resolution to keep the appointment; but when, at the last moment, the bishops presented themselves with the offer of a yearly addition of a hundred thousand pounds to the crown revenues, and, as an earnest of the engagement, put fifty thousand into his hand at once, he thought the arguments too weighty to decline them. Cardinal Beaton now had it all his own way, and it being arranged that the meeting with Henry should not take place under any circumstances, an unceremonious message to that effect was sent to York. Boiling over with rage and vowing vengeance, Henry quitted his northern capital towards the end of October, to hurry back to Hampton Court. Arrived at the palace, Catherine once more brought the whole power of her charms to play upon her lord, with so much effect as to move him to a veritable transport of delight. On Allhallows-eve, as reported by the chroniclers, the king "received his Maker, and gave Him most hearty thanks for the good life he led and trusted to lead with his wife," and having quitted the chapel, sent for Crammer, ordering him to draw up a public form of thanksgiving for his happy union that all the nation might share his joy. The archbishop looked serious, and taking a paper from his pocket, handed it to the king, requesting that his majesty would condescend to peruse it when alone. He then retired. Henry read the document, and, trembling in every limb, burst into tears. Probably, for the first time in his life, the tears were genuine.

MICKLEGATE, YORK

While Catherine was enjoying the splendours of royalty in her first public journey to the north, a man of the name of John Lascelles, intimately acquainted with her former life, requested an audience of Cranmer, and made to him some extraordinary revelations. Very likely the man was not unacquainted with the fact of Catherine Howard being an instrument in the hands of the Roman-Catholic party, the deadly foes of the archbishop, whose favour he hoped to gain as the tale-bearer of important news. The main purport of his tale was to the effect that the queen had led a dissolute life from her earliest youth, having given herself to several men, notably to two servants of the duchess of Norfolk, in whose house she was brought up; and that her profligacy had been such that she had even called her admirers to her bed when sleeping with other women. Lascelles further stated that Catherine's principal lover, one Derham, had been recently admitted into her service as secretary, which fact was naturally open to the gravest suspicions. The archbishop had no sooner received this information when he communicated it to his friend, the earl of Hertford, as well as to Lord-chancellor Audley, fearing that the sole knowledge of this important matter might lead him into ruin. After mature discussion, they found that there was but one course open to them, that of laying the whole information before the king, and they deputed Cranmer to do it. But the act was dangerous in the extreme. It was Catherine's influence that had brought Cromwell to the scaffold, and there was strong probability of her being powerful enough to urge the tyrant reposing in her lap to send all her enemies to the block. For a few days Cranmer hesitated; but receiving Henry's order to offer the prayers of the Church for the abandoned woman, his wife,* all hesitation ended, and he handed him the paper containing the whole information given by John Lascelles. Its reading brought on a fit of mingled grief and rage; and, recovering himself, Henry swore it was a base forgery, the perpetrators of which should be severely punished. However, his innate distrust soon got the upper hand. His queen having been accused, it was impossible for him to rest till he knew the whole matter, and, with this view, he gave orders to place her under arrest. After remaining at Hampton Court for a few days, she was taken to Sion House, the investigation of the charges brought against her being entrusted to the lord privy seal Sir Thomas Wriothesley. A short inquiry was sufficient to show that the early life of the queen had been one of utter lasciviousness, and such as to proclaim her a woman of the most abandoned character. The report caused the deepest mortification to Henry. It was not his love, a feeling he never knew, but his vanity, which was intensely hurt at the idea that, after seeking the fairest maid in Europe for a wife, he should have come to pick up the harlot of a brace of lackeys. To still his vengeance, there was nothing left but to revel in blood.

The men on whom Catherine Howard had bestowed her favours, before she knew the king, were cast at once into prison, and put to death after frightful tortures. It was undisguised assassination, for theirs was not the fault of the king's choice; and although there were suspicions at first that Catherine had been

unchaste after her marriage, not the least proof of it could be discovered. On the contrary, it was found that she had cast off her old lovers long before her marriage, and, in fact, had never shown any sincere attachment for them, exhibiting on all occasions as much coldness and heartlessness as if they had been mere toys to her. Thus, in reality, she had never sinned against the king, her husband, except in not telling him, before her marriage, of her former mode of life, which, though highly immoral, was yet not within reach of even Henry's criminal code. However, determined as he was upon revenge, the difficulty was of not the least importance. Her two early paramours Derham and Colepeper, having been tortured, hanged, and quartered, and their heads placed upon London Bridge, the queen herself was conveyed by water from Sion House to the Tower, to prepare for the scaffold. To give some show of legality to her execution, the lords and commons, ever humble servants of the dread majesty of England, were brought forward to vote an act of attainder against Catherine and a number of her relatives who were to be punished with her. The aged duchess of Norfolk, wife of the conqueror of Flodden Field, had already been cast into prison, together with her son, Lord Ham Howard, and a number of others; and the whole of them were included in the bill of attainder. Soon had many of the great nobles sunk by this time under the fierce despotism swaying the realm, that seemed ready to sacrifice their own flesh and blood, and the duke of Norfolk himself, leader of the powerful Catholic party, had the unutterable baseness to turn round upon his nearest friends as soon as he found that they had fallen under Henry's displeasure. He had already helped to send Anne Boleyn, his niece, to the block. Catherine Howard was his niece, and, moreover, had done his work in destroying Cromwell; yet as soon as she ceased to be useful, he turned her accuser and enemy, as well as that of his brother, his sister, and mother-in-law. An abject letter addressed to Henry, the noble duke bitterly bewailed his misfortune of having had to witness "the most abominable deeds done by the hands of his nieces against his highness," which, he declared, had brought him into the most miserable condition that ever fell to the lot of a poor mortal wretch. Wherefore," the great chief of the Howards continued, "my most gracious sovereign lord, prostrate at your feet, most humbly I beseech your majesty to recall to your remembrance that a great part of this matter is come to light by my declaration to your majesty. . . . Wherefore, I beseech your majesty that, as it shall please you to command, I may be permitted plainly to lay your highness doth weigh your favours towards me, assuring your highness that unless I may know your majesty to continue my good and gracious lord, as you were before their offences committed, I shall never desire to live in this world any longer, but shortly to finish this transitory life, as God shall ordain." If anything on earth could serve to extenuate the vile despotism of Henry VIII., it would be the base and detestable servility of the foremost of his subjects.

The parliament which assembled early in the year 1542 had sunk so much in respect as to show, even in its outward forms, that it had become a more assembly of royal lackeys. The sittings were opened on the 16th of January, by Lord-chancellor Audley, with a long speech, as full as usual of the most nauseous flattery about Henry's great virtues and boundless wisdom. Every time the king's name was mentioned, the whole of the lords and commons bowed to the ground, ready, apparently, to kiss the dust, after the fashion of Asiatic slaves. As the only business for which they had been called together was to rid Henry of another wife, they set about their work without delay. A bill of attainder against Catherine Howard, "late queen of England," the duchess of Norfolk, Lady Rochford, Lord William Howard, and others, was voted at once in the House of Lords; but even this did not give full satisfaction to Henry. On the 31st of January, the lord chancellor informed the bowing senators that a better method of treating the matter had occurred to the king, namely, that they should humbly petition his majesty to give his permission to try the queen, as well as his gracious pardon to all members of both houses, who, "in the course of the business, should speak with disrespect of her." This was really very thoughtful of Henry, for as there existed a previous statute, passed in Anne Boleyn's time, which punished disrespectful language towards the king's spouse with death, it would have been perfectly fair and legal for his majesty, first to allow his faithful lords and commons to condemn his fifth wife, and, having beheaded her, to cut off all their heads likewise. The humble representatives of the nation were not at all ignorant of this fact, and, overjoyed at the unspeakable kindness of their sublime master, they passed the petition with the greatest enthusiasm; and were rewarded by an immediate reply, that their lowly prayer had reached the royal ears, and would be granted. The act of attainder against Catherine Howard and her friends was then voted a second time, with the addition of several monstrous clauses. By one of these it was made high treason to conceal the incontinence of the queen for the time being; by another, the offence of a queen soliciting a subject, or a subject the queen, was also made high treason; while a third clause declared that if the king, or any of his successors, should intend to marry any "reputed maid," and she not being so, did not reveal the same to the king, this also should be high treason; and if any other person knew her not to be a maid and did not reveal it, it should be misprision of treason. These shameless laws—inscribed 33 Henry VIII., cap. 21 in the statute book—caused some merriment among the lower classes, least affected as yet by the more than Turkish spirit of despotism which governed the realm. They said that the king must henceforth look out for widows, for no man would risk his head as witness for a "reputed maid."

Henry's fifth wife was beheaded on the 13th of February, her blood covering the ground almost on the same spot on which Anne Boleyn had fallen. To the last she declared that she was innocent of the charge of adultery brought against her, and for which she was punished, though she admitted having been dissolute in early life. Her parting words to her confessor, the bishop of Winchester, bore all the impress of truth. "As to the rest," she cried, "for which I stand condemned, God and His holy angels I take to witness, upon my soul's salvation, that I die guiltless, never having abused my sovereign's bed: what other sins and follies of youth I have committed I will not excuse." The death of Catherine Howard did not cause much pity in England, for she herself had tampered too much in blood, besides which, the people were getting thoroughly brutalized by the constant executions, burnings, and hangings; but in Scotland, as well as on the continent of Europe, her fate raised a wild outcry of indignation. The king of France, especially, loudly exclaimed against the "wife butcher," declaring his intention to seize the first opportunity for making war upon a monarch who was outraging all the laws of humanity. An opportunity was not long wanting. In ignorance as yet regarding the feeling of Francis towards him, Henry, about a month after the execution of his wife, sent an embassy to Paris, to negotiate a renewal of the treaty of peace and amity concluded by Wolsey, and which was about to expire. The ambassadors were very coldly received, and, after a short while, treated with such insolence that they were compelled to depart. Henry thereupon got into a passion, and talked of invading the French territory at once; but, before doing so, he deemed it necessary to settle accounts with the king of Scotland, whose insulting behaviour, in not keeping the proposed interview at York, he thought worse than that of Francis. Before quitting York, his offended vanity having mounted into rage, he had given orders to the archbishop to search all the ancient records of the diocese, so as to find proofs of the just claim of the kings of England to the crown of Scotland; and the proofs being duly forthcoming—the art of demonstrating things out of ancient records being almost as well understood in the sixteenth as in the nineteenth century—Henry sent a cool message to his royal nephew, summoning him to do homage to his liege lord and superior. The insolence startled James, and he was about to retort by an angry reply, but was stopped by his wiser prime-minister. Cardinal Beaton was anxious to avoid war with England, not only as hurtful to the true interests of the Scottish nation, but still more so to those of his own party. The adherence of a majority of the middle classes, and of great numbers of the nobility, to the tenets of the reformed religion, was no secret to the shrewd cardinal; and he had just fears that a war would enlist these feelings on the side of England, and, if bringing about no other disastrous ends, would lead to the axe being laid on the roots of Roman Catholicism—the monasteries. Cardinal Beaton therefore advised James to send messengers of peace to his irate uncle; and, following the counsel, the Scottish king despatched the bishop of Aberdeen, together with Sir James I. Armont of Darsay, to Hampton Court. But Henry, whose vanity was greatly raised by this offer of conciliation, treated the envoys with contempt; and before even they had found their way back to Edinburgh, the duke of Norfolk was ordered to invade Scotland with forty thousand men. The order was easier given than obeyed; the English exchequer was drained to the lees, and all the royal decrees were powerless to raise fighting men without cash in hand.

The people of England showed no inclination to war with their brethren in the north; but there were Scotchmen in the country more anxious than the subjects of Henry to enter upon the contest. A great number of Scotch exiles, among them the earl of Angus, Sir George Douglas, his brother, and other powerful nobles, had been living for some time near the border; and seeing the difficulty of the duke of Norfolk to raise his forty thousand, they persuaded Sir James Bowes, warden of the East Marches, to begin the struggle with a raid across the Tweed, assuring him that their presence would be sufficient inducement to their countrymen to rise in arms and overthrow the rule of James. Anxious to earn laurels, Sir James allowed himself to be persuaded, and, in August, 1542, he, at the head of three thousand horse, rushed across the frontier into Teviotdale, accompanied by the noble exiles. Like a torrent, they carried everything before them, till arrived near Jedburgh, where they were met by the vanguard of four thousand Scotch, under Lord Home and the earl of Huntley. Home's forces, most of them his vassals, were the first to engage in battle, on the 24th of August, near the village of Haddenrig, and though fighting with great courage, they were repulsed by the heavy cavalry of Yorkshire. But suddenly, while shouting for joy at their victory, the English beheld the troops of Huntley marching up to their flank and rear, as if to encircle them in deadly grasp. A panic now seized the invaders; unacquainted with the strength of their new opponents, and believing the main army of King James marching upon them, they fled in wild haste from the field, hotly pursued by the enemy. Only a few were killed in the flight, the English showing themselves capital riders; but they had to leave behind many prisoners, mostly persons of note, elderly country squires and noblemen, whose legs did not vibrate fast enough against the flanks of their steeds. The earl of Angus and his friends, however, spurred well, and safely got back over the Tweed.

The duke of Norfolk, in the meanwhile, by raising impositions from the people in the northern and the midland counties, had succeeded in executing his commission, and recruiting at least a portion of his forty thousand troops. His standard having been joined by the earls of Derby, Hertford, Cumberland, Shrewsbury, Surrey, and a number of other great nobles, he marched, at the beginning of October, from his headquarters at Newcastle towards Berwick. Here the Douglasses fell in with the royal army, and burning to retrieve the disaster of Haddenrig, they urged Norfolk to commence hostilities without delay. On the 21st of October he crossed the Tweed at the head of thirty thousand men, ravaging the country far and wide, and burning the abbey of Kelso and a number of villages. On the report of this new invasion, King James, engaged in gathering troops on the Borough Muir, near Edinburgh, set out in forced marches for the south; but before he reached the Lammermuir hills he found that the English were in full retreat. Norfolk, closely watched by Home and Huntley, had thought prudent to march his forces back to Berwick, not trusting their discipline, and fearing that they were more inclined to plunder than to fight; and seeing this, James was full of ardour to follow, and to carry the war upon English territory. But to his intense mortification, his chief nobles refused to take part in the enterprise, arguing that the season was too late, that they had no provisions, and that their forces were insufficient to attack Henry's troops upon their own ground. All these were valid reasons; but James would not listen to them, and, lashing himself into a fury of passion, assailed his chieftains as cowards and traitors, swearing that he would attack the English even if alone. Galloping back to Edinburgh, he appealed to the clergy for help, and with their assistance raised a force of nearly ten thousand men, with which he stormed towards the western border. At the castle of Caerlaverock the little army came to a halt, and James, handing over the command to Lord Maxwell, bid him speed across the frontier, to take reprisals for the ravages committed by Norfolk. But the troops had no sooner passed the river Eske, into Cumberland, when Oliver Sinclair, a private gentleman and favourite of the king, rode up to Maxwell, and producing a commission of James, announced that the post of commander-in-chief was to be ceded to him. The insult was too great to be borne quietly, and the army had no sooner heard of it when they broke out into open mutiny. The Scotch were now standing upon Solway Moss, a large level plain, some eight miles in circumference, composed of mud and the putrid fibres of heath, covered over with a thin crust of moss and rushes. At every step of man and beast the earth kept shaking; but the excited troops heeded it not, being engaged in angry discussions as to whether they should obey their old general or the detested courtier set over them by the king. In the midst of this confusion, the enemy all on a sudden appeared in sight. Five hundred English horse, commanded by Lord Dacres, came galloping up the morass with fierce shouts, the ground trembling under the stroke of their hoofs. The Scotch, taken by surprise, without commander, and utterly distracted and perplexed, did not await their approach, but turned round and fled in wild haste towards the north. No attempt was made to fight, but all scrambled in mad hurry to get away; some hid themselves in the fens, some were drowned in the river; many fell under the swords of the pursuers, and many more were taken prisoners. Dacres, with his five hundred, took back to Carlisle no less than a thousand captives, among them the earls of Glencairn and of Cassillis, Lords Maxwell, Gray, Oliphant, Fleming, Somerville, and many other nobles. On hearing the report of this disgrace, King James rode slowly back to Edinburgh, as one bereft of sense; from Edinburgh he went to Falkland Castle, and within its walls immured himself, refusing to speak to any living soul.

Henry's joy at the news of the destruction of the Scottish army was extreme; and it increased when he heard that his royal nephew was dying—dying of a broken heart. It was a disease which Henry could scarcely understand; yet which he probably fancied a retribution of justice, for not having met him at York, and bringing to nought all the projected festivities. There was something absolutely mysterious in the illness of James, soon followed and ended in his death. Though previously enjoying the most vigorous health, he seemed to break up all at once, both in mind and body; and on the 14th of December, less than three weeks after the fatal rush of Solway Moss, he was a corpse. Seven days before his death, the queen brought into the world a daughter, called after her, Mary, who, two sons having previously died, was thus left sole heir to the crown of Scotland. To unite the northern kingdom with his own dominions now became the grand object of Henry, which he resolved to accomplish by a diplomatic movement, in seeking the hand of the baby Mary for his son Edward. The noble prisoners of Solway Moss were surprised when they found themselves suddenly brought forth from their rigid confinement, and ushered into the presence of King Henry, who addressed them in the kindest manner, declaring that it was his ardent wish to establish perpetual peace between his and their country, and that nothing could bring it about as well as the marriage of the presumptive heirs of the two crowns. The captive noblemen joyfully acceded to this proposition; and, upon Henry's demand, put their names to a formal treaty, by the terms of which they engaged themselves not only to use all their influence and power to accomplish the matrimonial alliance between young Prince Edward and the infant Mary, but, pending this, to acknowledge Henry as sovereign ruler of Scotland, and to place the government of the kingdom into his hands. This treaty they confirmed by a solemn oath; and having left hostages with Henry, and promised, at the same time, that, if failing to carry out the agreement, they would return into captivity, the noble prisoners were set free, and immediately returned to their country. But before they arrived in Scotland the tide of affairs had come to run in another direction. Cardinal Beaton, immediately after the death of James, had produced a will appointing him regent of the realm; but this will was declared a forgery by the earl of Arran, great grandson of King James III., and presumptive heir next to the infant Mary, and he succeeded at once in overthrowing the cardinal and establishing himself in power. Being a zealous adherent of the church reformers, Arran was not disinclined to make common cause with the English party, and one of his first acts was to recall the earl of Angus and the other Douglasses from their long exile. They were but the forerunners of the prisoners of Solway Moss, who had sworn allegiance to Henry; and when these arrived, towards the end of January, 1543, there seemed high probability of the northern kingdom being brought, after a while, under the sceptre of the monarchs of England.

The chances were altogether in Henry's favour; but his vanity and dogged egotism once more became fatal to success. It was utterly hopeless, seeing the sturdy feeling of independence of the Scottish nation, which often enough had refused to bow to their own kings, to attempt an immediate union of the two governments; and the captives of Solway Moss, although they signed Henry's treaty under compulsion, were well aware of this impossibility. Nevertheless, they were resolved to execute the promises made to the best of their power; and, with the assistance of the earl of Arran, they succeeded in procuring the consent of the national representatives to the marriage of the royal children, involving the union, at a time more or less distant, of the two crowns. The parliament which passed this resolution met at Edinburgh on the 12th of March, and was, according to a letter of the earl of Angus to the English government, "the most substantial parliament that ever was seen in Scotland in any man's remembrance, and best furnished with all the three estates." Nearly the whole of the members of the three estates were in favour of the union, but under the conditions that the national laws and privileges should be preserved, and that the infant heir to the throne, Princess Mary, should be left in the country till the age of ten, after which she was to be sent to England for education. To these very fair stipulations, Henry not only objected, but went so far as to hurl the bitterest reproaches against his allies among the Scotch nobility, for not handing the government of the kingdom over to him at once. Although having really gained no advantage over the Scottish nation than the purely accidental success derived from the scramble of Solway Moss, Henry already looked upon Scotland as a conquered country, absolutely within reach of his sword. Against this presumption his very allies were compelled to protest, Sir George Douglas being the first to do so, in a spirited letter, in which he told Henry that to fulfil all his demands would be absolutely impossible. "There is not so little a boy," he exclaimed, "but he will hurl stones against it; and the wives will handle their distaffs, and the commons universally will rather die." Henry's own ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler, a shrewd man, eminently fitted for the difficult position of drawing the two nations together, wrote home to the same effect. "The Scotch," he reported, "would rather suffer extremity than come to the obedience and subjection of England. they would have their realm free, and live within themselves, after their own laws and customs." The word "free" could not but sound unpleasant to the ears of a despot accustomed to see every human being bend in the dust before him. It was in accordance with this feeling that he resolved to make another attack upon Scotland, at the same time that he was preparing for war with France.

Henry's craving for dominion, and particularly his desire to subjugate the northern kingdom, was greatly increased by events that had recently taken place in Ireland, by which that country was, for the first time in history, actually brought under English rule. Though nominally under the sceptre of English sovereigns since the time of Henry II., Ireland had remained in reality an independent country, governed by its native chiefs, who spent their lives in warring with each other, not paying the least attention to the orders and decrees of the foreign sovereigns which made their appearance from time to time. Seeing this state of things, and with no means in hand to alter it, most of the monarchs of England had left the fertile island in the west to itself; and very few, such as Richard II., had taken any interest in its affairs. During the Wars of the Roses, the supremacy of England was almost entirely annihilated, and though subsequently Henry VII., after being firmly seated at home, made some efforts to re-assert his authority in the country, he could do little more than employ his influence to back one or the other of the contending parties of nobles who were eternally fighting amongst themselves. But even he was absolutely powerless to prevent Lambert Simnel, the Oxford baker's boy, being crowned king of England as well as of Ireland at St. Patrick's cathedral, with all due forms and ceremonies, and to assume royal sway in such dressing-up as his new subjects could afford to give him. At the death of Henry VII. the English authority, as far as it went, extended no farther than over about one-half of the counties of Dublin, Kildare, Louth, Westmeath, and Wexford; and all the rest of Ireland was divided among some ninety fighting chieftains, or kings, all hating each other bitterly, but united in common hatred against the foreign monarch who should presume to interfere with their liberty of killing each other. Of these chieftains, the two most powerful were the Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare, and the Butlers, earls of Ormond or Ossory; and the policy of Henry VII. consisted chiefly in taking the part of either the one or the other in their everlasting feuds, and by this means keeping up a semblance of his own supremacy. That this was a great mistake, and so far from adding to, only undermined the royal authority, Wolsey was the first to perceive. It was he who struck out a new path by organizing a vigorous government, representing the ablest men he could obtain, which went far to subdue the Irish anarchy, and the final effect of this measure was the peaceable reconquest of the country. The ninety kings still continued brandishing their swords for a while, but after a last fierce outburst in 1534-6, the steady increase of English power began to tell upon them, and they were gradually brought into submission, the long drama ending in the execution of the whole of the ancient race of the Fitzgeralds, only a little child escaping from the slaughter into Flanders. All the fighting chieftains who escaped the gallows got rewards, titles, and pensions; and, having sworn fealty to Henry, he elevated, in 1542, the country from a lordship into a kingdom, adding to his other titles that of "king of Ireland."

With this success before him, Henry now determined to conquer Scotland as well as France, and personally to lead his troops to victory. However, before setting out upon warlike expeditions, he contracted another marriage, this time choosing—as predicted by popular jest—a widow of the mature age of thirty-four. The person selected for the honour of becoming his sixth wife, was Catherine Parr daughter of a Northamptonshire squire, who had already lost two husbands, and thus gained an amount of matrimonial experience which made her bold enough to risk the union with so dangerous a partner as Henry. The nuptials were celebrated at Hampton Court palace on the 12th of July, 1543, the royal bridegroom being wheeled to the altar in a machine upon rollers, strong enough to carry the fat, unyielding body, now going fast into decay. To prove his affection for his new spouse, who showed a lively sympathy with the Lutheran reformers, Henry sent a batch of Protestants to be burnt at Smithfield the day after his marriage, and ordered new prisons to be built, the old gaols having become too small to hold all the offenders. The increase was due to the promulgation of a fresh statute, which settled religion on the entirely new basis of a book written by the king, called, 'The Erudition of a Christian Man.' This book was ordered to be the future Bible of England, subject to such additions as the royal author might deem fit to make. It was solemnly enacted by parliament that all persons who should teach or profess anything contrary to the doctrines contained in the king's book, or to any which he might thereafter promulgate, should be punished, in the first instance, by carrying a faggot, and on a second offence, should be put upon the faggot and burnt alive. It was sheer mercy now on the part of Henry if he refrained from burning all his subjects; a few strokes of his pen, and a new doctrine or two added to the 'Erudition of a Christian Man,' were sufficient to make every soul in the kingdom a heretic, and send them all to the stake, with legal obligation to the last survivors to set fire to each other.

In the meanwhile, awaiting the final exercise of his power at home, Henry pursued his plans for extending his influence abroad. To subdue the Scotch, a fleet of two hundred sail, commanded by Viscount Lisle, admiral of England, and having on board an army of ten thousand men, under the earl of Hertford, uncle of Prince Edward, set sail for Leith, with instructions to effect a landing, and to ravage the country by fire and sword. Henry's commission to the earl of Hertford ran textually as follows:—"You are thore to put all to fire and sword; to burn Edinburgh town, and to raze and deface it when you have sacked it and gotten what you can out of it. . . . Beat down and overthrow the castle, sack Holyrood house, and as many towns and villages about Edinburgh as ye conveniently can; sack Leith, and burn and subvert it, and all the rest, putting man, woman, and child, to fire and sword, without exception, when any resistance shall be made against you. This done, pass over to the Fife land, and extend like extremities and destructions in all towns and villages wherunto ye may reach conveniently, not forgetting among the rest so to spoil and turn upside down the cardinal's town of St. Andrews, as the upper stone may be the nether, and not one stick stand by another, sparing no creature alive within the same." No other human being but a despot, under whose murderous hand wives and relatives and the nearest and dearest friends had fallen, could have possibly given instructions such as these, every line begrimed with blood.

Before Hertford was able to execute his commission in Scotland, Henry put himself in movement to conquer France. The chief ground of accusation against the ruler of France was that "he had stirred the Scots to resist his majesty, contrary to their duty and allegiance;" and to punish him, Henry declared by the mouth of the herald that he would "put his own royal person, with the power of his realm and subjects, in armour." Previous to putting himself, or being put, into armour, Henry called his parliament together, to vote him large subsidies as well as a batch of new statutes. The most important of these was a law altering the succession to the crown, by placing the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth next in order to Prince Edward, without, however, repealing the acts which declared them illegitimate, and by means of which they might at any time be again excluded from the throne. The object of this Act was to please Kaiser Charles, with whom negotiations had been opened for the invasion of France, which was to end in a division of that kingdom, and a marriage of his son Philip with Princess Mary. Charles was as eager as ever to humiliate his great rival, the French king; and having made the most flattering promises to Henry, the treaty for a combined attack upon France was signed in 1543. The whole of the next winter was spent in preparations for the invasion, and large bodies of troops having been despatched into France, Henry himself crossed the Channel in the month of July, 1544, leaving the government in the hands of his wife. Though utterly broken in health, and so fat as scarcely able to move, Henry showed himself as fond of show and frippery as ever, and made his French campaign—last campaign upon earth—a special means of gratifying it. The ship which carried him from Dover to Calais had sails of cloth of gold, with more trumpeters on board than sailors; and on landing he passed through triumphal arches gilded all over, with such a blazing of gunpowder as would have sufficed for a great battle. In the agreement with Kaiser Charles, it had been settled that the English army should march upon Paris, while the Imperial troops invaded the eastern and northern provinces of France; but Henry, disliking the fatigue of a long march, and wishing to have as much of pomp as possible, overthrew this arrangement, and went to sit down before Boulogne. Being at the head of a very powerful armament, with abundance of great ordnance and ammunition, he reckoned upon taking the city at once, and making a magnificent entry: in which, however, he was grievously disappointed. Boulogne held out for several months, and to gratify his vanity and make the most of his position, he underwent the suffering of having his obese trunk clapped into armour and hoisted upon a tall war horse, which was led slowly in front of the troops. Nearly the whole of its walls having been shivered to pieces by heavy guns, Boulogne fell at last on the 14th of September, and on the 18th Henry made his anxiously-expected triumphal entry. "The king's highness," reported Recorder Hall—now getting old, but magniloquent as ever—"the king's highness, having the sword borne naked before him by the lord Marquis Dorset, like a noble and valiant conqueror rode into Bulleyn, and the trumpeters, standing on the walls of the town, sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of all the king's true subjects the same beholding. And in the entering there met him the duke of Suffolk, and delivered unto him the keys of the town, and so he rode towards his lodging, which was prepared for him on the south side of the town. And within two days after the king rode all about the town, within the walls, and then commanded that our Lady church of Bulleyn should be defaced and plucked down." After this proper finish of the expedition, Henry returned to England in the greatest ill-humour, owing to Kaiser Charles having signed, on the 19th of September, a treaty of peace with the French king, without taking the least account of him or his grand doings at Boulogne. It was clear that Charles acted wisely in making peace, seeing that he did not receive the least assistance from his royal brother of England, who seemed to have utterly forgotten the agreement about the march to Paris. But all this did not in the least abate from the fury of Henry, which spent itself upon his unhappy courtiers and generals. The dukes of Norfolk and of Suffolk, first of English peers, so much trembled for their lives, that they wrote a piteous letter to the queen-regent, begging her to avert the anger of the dread majesty, "whosedispleasure is death unto us." Catherine Parr, wise beyond all women, managed to soften the wrath of her angust lord, which now once more directed itself upon unhappy Scotland.

In accordance with his instructions, the earl of Hertford landed his troops in the Firth of Forth early in the summer of 1544, and forthwith commenced the work of devastation. After battering down the gates of Edinburgh, burning and plundering the city, and demolishing the harbour of Leith, he set sail again for Berwick, where he was joined by a larger force, with which he marched slowly and leisurely along the border, sacking and destroying everything in his way. From Kelso Abbey he wrote to his master, detailing his exploits. "We have resolved," ran the narrative, "to raze and deface this house of Kelso, so as the enemy shall have little commodity of the same, and to remain encamped here for five or six days, and in the mean season to devastate and burn all the country hereabouts, as far as we can with our horsemen." At the end of a week the general reported further progress. "To morrow," he wrote, "we intend to send a good band of horsemen to Melrose and Dryburgh, to burn the same and all the corn and villages in their way, and so daily to do some exploits, and then to march to Jedburgh to burn the same, and then to march through a great part of Tyvydale, to overthrow their piles and stone houses, and to burn their corn and villages, with all annoyance to the enemy we can, which in our opinion would be such a scourge and impoverishing to the enemy as they shall not be able to recover a long season." Hertford noted with evident surprise the flourishing aspect of the Scottish realm. "Surely," he informed the king, "the country is very fair, and so good a corn country, and such plenty of the same, as we have not seen the more plenteous in England, and undoubtedly there is burnt a wonderful deal of corn." The burning of corn, reported over and over again, was altogether the principal business of the royal army, the work of murder, ordered by Henry, becoming difficult on account of the determined attitude of the population. Jedburgh having fallen before the torches of the destroying host—"I caused the abbey, the friars, and town of Jedburgh," reported Hertford, "and all the villages within two miles and more of the town, to be burnt, where was destroyed also no little quantity of corn,"—the invaders were compelled to turn back, and in their retreat suffered all the miseries which they had wished to inflict. Thinking only of murder and rapine, the king had made no preparations whatever for supplies, and his troops were decimated by hunger and disease on their march through the fair country which they had changed into a desert. Those that returned into England were immediately directed to the south, now the scene of the most serious events.

The king of France having made his peace with Kaiser Charles and no other enemy on hand, resolved to make an attack upon Henry, for the double purpose of creating a diversion in favour of his old allies the Scotch, and of regaining the important city of Boulogne. His own country having been invaded more than once by English troops, Francis felt anxious to repay the compliment by despatching a French army to the shores of England. All the preparations having been made, a fleet of more than a hundred sail, commanded by Admiral D'Annebaut, left Havre early in the summer of 1545, and went to the attack of Boulogne, aided by a French army under the Dauphin, which had come to besiege the place from the land side. The intention of Francis was, first to retake his own city, and next to throw his troops upon the coast of England, but his fleet had no sooner arrived in the Channel, when, seeing no English ships near, he changed his plan, and gave orders for the immediate invasion. A number of Spanish, Portuguese, and Venetian transports were pressed into the service in great haste, and, stocked with soldiers, the fleet, now amounting to near two hundred sails, steered westward, right towards the English shore, which was touched on the 18th of July. Here all was panic and confusion. Henry's treasury, as usual, was empty; the nobles trembling for their lives; the people dissatisfied and miserable under grinding taxation; and the army and navy engaged in burning and destroying Scotch homesteads instead of defending English ones. Though having had notice for a considerable time of the expected French invasion, the king had done little else towards protecting the realm than engaging fourteen thousand Swiss mercenaries, ten thousand foot and four thousand horse; deeming those soldiers of fortune more fit for the defence of England than his own subjects, whom, despot-like, he had come to mistrust. But the Swiss, after all, did not arrive. Kaiser Charles refused to let them pass through his dominions, and when they had waited long enough, the recruiting agents of Francis appeared and led them to the attack of Boulogne. Thus when the French fleet appeared in sight of England, there was no preparation made for resistance, and no obstacle for an invasion—no other obstacle, but the stout hearts of the inhabitants in which Henry put so little trust. A few earthworks had been thrown up in hurry along the coast of Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire; but these were contemptible as a military defence, except at Portsmouth, the strongest fortified point, behind which the English fleet, under Lord Lisle, retreated at the approach of the enemy. The French admiral, with great courage, apparently despising to take any unsecured place, went sailing along the coast till he came to Portsmouth harbour, before which he dropped anchor, signaling to Lord Lisle that he was ready for battle. Although greatly inferior, in ships, guns, and men, to the French, Lord Lisle was anxious to accept the challenge, and his sailors were burning for impatience to rush upon the foe; but as there were positive orders to keep strictly upon the defence, the commander did not dare to stir from his narrow prison in the harbour. To restrain the impatience of his subjects, Henry himself went down to Portsmouth, parading his obese body before the troops and sailors, and trying to persuade them by example that cowardice was a virtue. The great virtue of obedience, indeed, was required to keep Englishmen quiet under this enormous provocation. Emboldened by the inactivity of his opponents, the French admiral, having remained quiet at Spithead for several days, gave orders for his flat boats to be launched, and while these came right up to the entrance of Portsmouth harbour, almost under the bows of the English fleet, detachments of soldiers were landed near the town, to ravage and plunder the country. It was meant as, and certainly was, a deep insult, intended to provoke the English admiral to come out of his hiding-place and give battle; but the effect was altogether lost upon the majesty of England. Admiral D'Annebaut, uncertain what to do next, then began firing upon the fleet in the harbour, and succeeded in sinking a large vessel, called the Mary Rose, which, overloaded with guns and ammunition, went to the bottom with every soul on board. However, the loss of several of his galleys soon proved to the French commander that it was an absolutely hopeless task to attempt a struggle within the harbour, fortified as it was by tremendous land batteries; and, after holding a council of war, an attack upon the Isle of Wight was determined upon. Troops were landed at three different places, and several villages burnt; but D'Annebault soon perceived that not much glory was to be earned in this direction, and after taunting the fleet in Portsmouth harbour a little longer, he set sail for the straits of Dover. Here he found orders to restrict himself to a blockade of Boulogne, and to disembark most of his troops, news from the Italian peninsula having once more turned the attention of King Francis to the old land of his hopes. The invasion of England came thus to an end; but not without leaving behind a deep stain on the naval prowess of the people, subdued by the most odious despotism.

The state of England now was deplorable. There was murder within and murder without; constant streams of victims led to the stake and the gallows; war in the north, invasion in the south, and famine, tears, and misery throughout the land. Law and order had ceased to exist, save in the unbridled will of a maddened tyrant, at whose feet peasants and nobles alike were crawling, and before whom parliament itself was bowing down like a soulless slave. The ancient realm of England had ceased to be a free country, and become the property of one man. All imaginable rights—the right to devise the crown to whomsoever he liked, the right to issue decrees having the force of statutes, the right to dispose of the lives and property of his subjects, and even the greatest of all rights, that to prescribe their religious faith, had been made over to this despot, until his rule at last had become more absolute than that of any oriental despot. But England, too, sank to the social condition of a slave state. The tyrant kept oppressing till he could oppress no more, and was beholding his own ruin in the kingdom which he had ruined. Year after year parliament voted subsidies, each session more than the other in name, but each time with lesser result, till at last the country seemed drained to the very lees. All the immense property of convents and monasteries had been squandered in reckless confusion; churches and chapels despoiled, and the richest lands in the realm confiscated; and the result was ever-increasing poverty of the royal exchequer. Now, in 1546, Henry went one step further, the last he could possibly go, by laying his hands upon the charities and hospitals in the kingdom. On the royal demand, the obsequious commons, in the month of November, not many weeks after the disgrace at Portsmouth, passed an Act by which all the colleges, charities, and hospitals in England, with their whole real and moveable property, were made over to the king. Fortunately, the days of the tyrant were now numbered. Had he lived much longer, not a school might have been left for the children of the people; not a place where a starving man could get a crust of bread, nor a couch on which a sick man could lay down to die.

The chief part of the treasure thus amassed went for the prosecution of the war in Scotland, so that the English were robbed in order that the Scotch might be robbed in their turn. The war in the north continued as it commenced, with murder, rapine, and devastation, to which, in its new turn, assassination came to be added. Henry's great enemy in Scotland was Cardinal Beaton, the leader of the Roman Catholic party; and in his destruction centered all the hopes of gaining over, by fair means or foul, the now kingless nation. But Beaton, a man of undaunted energy and inflexible courage, was not easily struck down; and though falling more than once, he quickly rose again. His first attempt to assume the government of the kingdom, immediately after the death of James, having failed, he was shut up in the castle of Blackness; but in less than eight months he not only got out again, but obtained a signal victory over the regent, the earl of Arran, by persuading him to abjure the Protestant faith, and to stand out in opposition to England. The Roman Catholic now became the national party, and on Beaton assuming the custody of the infant queen, he got virtually invested with sovereign powers. To these were added, in 1544, those of papal legate, which he exercised in a very despotic manner, burning and hanging great numbers of heretics. At Perth, three men were taken to the gallows by his orders for eating a goose during Lent, and a woman was drowned for refusing to pray to the Virgin Mary for help in childbirth; so that altogether he played the pope quite after the manner of Henry. But Henry did not like Cardinal Beaton the better for this rivalry, and therefore gave to his commander those special orders, "so to spoil and turn upside the cardinal's town of St. Andrews, as the upper stone may be the nether, and not one stick stand by another, sparing no creature alive within the same." However, Hertford did not get as far as St. Andrews, and the only effect of the burning and sack of Edinburgh, Leith, and the southern border lands, was the increasing influence of the cardinal and the gathering around him of the greater part of the nation. On his desire, the Scottish parliament repealed the treaty of union offered to Henry, but refused by him; and thenceforth nothing remained but war to come to terms. The king's instructions to Hertford showed that he was vain enough to believe Scotland might be overrun in a day; but he soon found out his mistake, and had to think of other means. A simple plan now was suggested to Henry, that of assassinating the cardinal, and thus producing complete anarchy in the kingdom, there being no man able to take the reins of government from his hands. The foul scheme originated with the earl of Cassilis and others of the noble prisoners of Solway Moss gained over to English interests; and having been laid before Henry, it was greedily, although cautiously approved of. However, the conspirators wanted a round sum of money in payment of the murder, and the king was reluctant to make a clear bargain. Sir Ralph Sadler, the English envoy, was ordered to tell the earl of Cassilis that he must trust to the "accustomed goodness" of the king, not forgetting also that the assassination would be "not only an acceptable service to the king's majesty, but also a special benefit to the realm of Scotland." This understanding having been come to, the murder of the cardinal was finally determined upon.

time, in the discussion of the all-important question of payment. Henry meant to be liberal, but would not state the exact sum he intended to pay down, and thus the matter suffered delay. At last, Sir Ralph Sadler advertised his master that he had received a letter, stating that the laird of Grange and the master of Rothes "would attempt either to apprehend or slay the cardinal, at some time when he should pass through the Fife-land." The bearer of the letter, according to Sir Ralph, was "a Scottishman called Wysbert," or Wishart, a zealous preacher of the doctrines of reform, whose dispositions were not by any means mercenary, but who, in his religious fanaticism, held that the killing of the great leader of the popish faction would be an acceptable service to God. But the cardinal, although ignorant of his project, was before him in the work of murder. While staying at Ormiston, in East Lothian, Wishart one day found his house surrounded by a troop of horse under the earl of Bothwell, and was captured after some resistance, under a promise from the earl that his life should be spared. He was forthwith carried to St. Andrews, placed before an ecclesiastical tribunal under the charge of heresy, and without hesitation was condemned to be burnt. The sentence was carried out the day after his trial, on the 28th of March, 1546, and caused deep rage among the whole of the reformed party, the execution of Wishart being looked upon as sheer assassination. It hastened the end prepared for the cardinal. As soon as Wishart's death became known, Norman Lesley, the master of Rothes named in Sadler's report, called together his friends and associates, who resolved to despatch their enemy without delay. On the evening of Friday, the 21st of May, the conspirators, sixteen in number, proceeded to St. Alban's, and careful in all their movements, entered the town successively at different gates. Early next morning, before the sun had risen above the horizon, they approached the castle, the residence of the cardinal, in detached groups, and, dressed as workmen engaged in repairing the fortifications, passed the first drawbridge unnoticed. At the second they were stopped by a sentinel; but when too late, the man was instantly killed, thrown into the ditch, and the bridge having been lowered with the keys taken from him, the conspirators found themselves inside the castle. But they had not yet gained their object, for there were fifty servants attached to the cardinal, besides a hundred labourers working on the inner ramparts. Neither obstacle was sufficient to frighten the small band of assassins. They peremptorily ordered the workmen to the gates, where they were dismissed, and then roused the household servants, and threatening them with instant death at the least noise, they led them likewise, one by one, to the gate, which they now barricaded. All this was done in the quietest manner; however, the working at the gate roused the cardinal, who had been hitherto asleep, and opening the window of his bedroom, he inquired what it meant. "The castle has been taken by Norman Lesley," was the reply. Rushing from his chamber, the unhappy man tried to escape by a privy postern, but finding this and all other outlets secured, he went back, seized his sword, and ordered his page to bolt and lock the inner and outer doors of the apartment. A minute after, heavy steps were heard outside, mingled with loud voices, demanding admittance, threatening to force the doors. "Open!" said the cardinal to his page. The crowd of assassins came rushing in: Beaton sitting on a chair, pale as death, exclaiming, "I am a priest! I am a priest! ye will not slay me!" Lesley was about to strike him with his dagger, when James Melville, one of the conspirators, interfered. "This work and judgment of God," he exclaimed, "although it be secret, ought to be done with gravity." Admonishing the unhappy man to repent of his sinful life, and to seek the pardon of Heaven for the murder of Wishart, he bent him down on his knees to say his prayers; then shouting, "I kill thee because thou art an obstinate enemy against Christ Jesus and his holy Evangel," he twice thrust the sword through his body. "I am a priest! I am a priest! all is gone!" faltered the cardinal, expiring on the floor. Thus perished, in the fifty second year of his age, the last and greatest leader of the Romish church in North Britain, David Beaton, not unaptly termed the "Wolsey of Scotland."

The death of the cardinal was fatal to the Roman Catholic party in Scotland, but Henry reaped no particular advantage from it. His military operations in the course of two years had not gone beyond border war, and even this had to cease a few weeks after Beaton's assassination, owing to a treaty of peace made with France, and in which Scotland was included. In his contest with the French king, Henry had been throughout most unsuccessful, and after losing almost his last soldiers, a body of nine thousand men, two thirds of them foreigners, in an expedition from Calais to St. Omer, in the spring of 1546, he was glad enough to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of hostilities. French and English commissioners accordingly met at Campe, a village at the boundaries of the Cloth of Gold Field, and signed, on the 7th of June, 1546, a treaty of peace, the principal stipulations of which were that Boulogne should be returned to the French king for a sum of money, and that England should cease to make war upon Scotland. To the latter clause Henry was most unwilling to accede, and gave way only on being informed that there would be no peace unless Scotland was included in it. The treaty of Campe ended all the foreign wars of England, leaving Henry to direct his whole attention to internal affairs. But a short span of life now was left to him, and he made full use of it by burning and hanging as many of his subjects as he could possibly get within his grasp. There was some little difficulty in procuring a constant supply of heretics for the stake, the terror-stricken people having become shy to divulge their opinions on moot points of theology, so that Henry's commissioners had to increase in zeal with the slackening love of martyrdom. The reading of the Bible supplied the greater number of victims, for as it had been allowed half a dozen times, and twice as often forbidden, there were a good many people totally ignorant whether the study of the Word of God was right or wrong, and they were easily brought within one or the other of the many statutes of treason and heresy. Henry's chief agents in persecution now were Lord-chancellor Thomas Wriothesley, and Solicitor-general Griffin, together with Bishop Gardiner, long trained to the hunting of heretics; and the combined zeal of the three seldom failed in keeping the prisons filled, the rack at work, and the stake burning. They employed torture more largely than ever to extort confessions, not disdaining to assist with their own hands to inflict hellish torments on the bodies of their victims, even when they were women. One of these victims, heroic beyond example, was a lady named Anne Askew, an avowed Protestant and personal friend of the queen. Imprisoned in the Tower, she freely confessed her heretical opinions about the eucharist; but being pressed to retract them, refused. Then she was put to the torture. There was a faint spark of human feeling left in the lieutenant of the Tower, who, after the poor woman had undergone horrible pain, refused to torture her more. Upon this Chancellor Wriothesley, who was present, threw off his gown, and, according to John Fox, martyrologist, "drew the rack so severely that he almost tore her body asunder." The torn body, still breathing, was carried to Smithfield a few days after, chained to the stake, and then committed to the flames, Bishop Shaxton, apostate Protestant, looking on and preaching a sermon. King Henry in the same month published a sermon of his own, in the shape of a message to parliament, exhorting all his subjects to Christian love and kindness, and solemnly requesting them "to be in charity with one another, like brother and sister."

THE RACK.

The martyrdom of Anne Askew had not all the results expected by the promoters. In putting her to torture, and degrading himself so far as to draw the rack himself, the chancellor, with his two coadjutors, hoped that she would make revelations respecting the Protestant tendencies of her friend the queen; and they were sorely disappointed on finding that all the excruciating pain they were able to inflict was insufficient to extract from her a word on this subject. Queen Catherine Parr was hated as well as feared by the Roman Catholic party, her growing influence over the king being held detrimental to their cause, not only directly, but indirectly, as acting upon the counsels of the heir-apparent to the throne. To ruin her had long been the earnest desire of the three royal executioners; and although they well knew that she was almost indispensable to Henry as a tender and affectionate nurse, they knew still better that all his passions had now become concentrated in lust of blood, and that the pleasure to send his wife to the executioner would be greater to him than any pleasure he might derive from her society. Acting upon this conviction, the chancellor and his friends did not cease watching the queen, till at last their grasp was dangerously near her throat. One day, at Hampton Court, Catherine imprudently discussed theological subjects with her dread lord, and in the warmth of conversation dropped a few words in favour of the reformers. Henry said nothing, but watched her, cat-like, and the same evening complained of her remarks to Bishop Gardiner. The latter eagerly embraced the long sought opportunity; and after fulsome praise of the all-abounding royal wisdom, brought Henry to sign articles of impeachment against the queen. Fortunately for her, the earl of Hertford, who had his spies in the antagonist camp, received instant notice of this act, and hurrying to Catherine, he revealed to her the imminent danger into which she had fallen. The poor woman naturally was much alarmed, but resolved to act with spirit and circumspection. Having met the king again the next day, and attended to his frightful ulcers, the smell of which kept even the servants distant, Catherine showed more than usual liveliness; and when the conversation turned again upon religion, she made a neat and flattering speech to her lord, telling him that she was utterly ignorant about theological subjects; that she looked upon him as the source of all wisdom, judgment, and learning; and that the only thing she ever aimed at, was to entertain him, now and then, by some weak show of opposition, such as she had presumed upon the day before. Henry's vanity was so much excited by this clever address, that he embraced his spouse, calling her "sweetheart" and other loving names, and drawing her into the garden for a chat. They had not been there long when Wriothesley appeared, at the head of a body of guards; and entirely unaware of the change that had taken place, marched up to arrest the queen and convey her to the Tower. On his approach, Henry received him with a storm of abuse, calling him knave, fool, and beast, and ordering him to quit his presence immediately. The chancellor's eyes opened wide, and he beat a hasty retreat; resolving never more to meddle with the queen.

The failure of this attempt to destroy Catherine had great effect in damaging the Catholic faction, and bringing about the ascendancy of the party headed by Hertford and Cranmer. Between these opposite poles, representing political as well as religious interests, the tyrant was now constantly drifting, having grown physically and mentally unfit for independent action. He had become in every respect the human tiger, or hyena. Other passions having died out, he inordinately indulged in that of feeding, and this and the pleasure of murder constituted the sum total of his delights. He gorged himself with food till he was unable to move; after which, as mental enjoyment, he gorged himself with blood. But the fawning courtiers bowed deeper than ever before the terrible monster who was wheeled about through the royal apartments, far too big to pass through the ordinary doors, and so full of ulcers as to be repulsive to all the senses. Life was fast fading from this hideous body, but no ray of love or fear from the unseen world beyond the grave shed its light upon the dark soul. There was no priest near with courage enough to tell the fierce tyrant that kings do sometimes die, and that it would be well to prepare for the last account. No priest nor friend was near, and the dying despot, who had murdered thousands of innocent human beings, who had killed wives, friends, teachers, servants, and counsellors, kept his hands steeped in blood to the last hour of existence. Of all the companions of his earlier life, there was only one left whom he had not killed, and this one he determined to destroy with his dying breath. On the 12th of December, 1546, the duke of Norfolk, Henry's oldest friend, first subject of the realm, was suddenly arrested and thrown into the Tower, together with his son, the earl of Surrey. The charge against both of them was of a strangely frivolous kind, that of having quartered the arms of Edward the Confessor, to which they were entitled by descent, on the wrong side of the shield. Surrey, most accomplished poet of the age, was accused, in addition, of having entertained in his house some Italians who were "suspected to be suspicious spies;" and to expedite his doom, he was at once placed before the lord-chancellor, found guilty, of course, and beheaded on the 19th of January. Henry was lying on his deathbed now, his huge body fast dissolving in corruption, and his mind troubled with the thought that the work of murder was not getting on fast enough. There were certain forms necessary to kill Norfolk, greatest peer of the kingdom, and parliament had to be called together to vote a bill of attainder. Norfolk employed the interval to write a touching letter to Henry, dwelling upon his long and faithful services, his sincere attachment to the royal house, and his entire innocence of any crime laid to his charge. The reply to this pathetic appeal was a message from Henry to the speaker of the House of Commons, telling him to hasten on the bill of indictment against Norfolk. The despot seemed to feel that his career of murder was drawing to a close, and trembled for rage at the thought that his old friend might escape the block. The parliamentary serfs did the royal behest with great rapidity. On the 20th of January, the day after the execution of the earl of Surrey, the House of Lords, without examining the accused, without trial and without evidence, passed a bill of attainder against Norfolk, and sent it forthwith to the Commons. A slight delay occurred here: the crouching slaves whispered to each other that their dread lord was in his death swoon—the Howards were mighty in the land, they all remembered. But soon the whisper ceased; and when all heard that the master was still alive, able to make signs at least, if not to speak, they hurried on with their bloody work. It was finished on the 27th of January, and the tyrant, breathing heavy, in supreme agony, stamped his sign manual to the warrant of death. Without losing a moment, order was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower to execute the duke of Norfolk. He commanded it to take place early next morning, the 28th of January; but before the bright dawn came to lighten up the gloomy walls of the great prison, the decree was reversed. King Henry had gone to his final account before accomplishing his last murder.

Henry expired at two o'clock on the morning of the 28th of January. On the evening before, the chief physician had told the assembled courtiers that, perhaps, the majesty of England might die. Was there a man with courage enough to communicate the intelligence to the dread tyrant? They all trembled, fearing to open their lips; but at last a bold knight, Sir Anthony Denny, came forward, venturing to approach the couch of the dying monster. Sir Anthony carried his life in his hand, for the eyes of the despot glared upon him with fierce anger. He refused to see a priest, refused to believe in his end; but after a while his voice got thick and he fell into a stupor. Awaking, he desired that Cranmer should be sent for. The archbishop was at Croydon, and came up in haste to Westminster palace, but before he arrived Henry had become speechless. Then Cranmer began praying, felt his hands pressed by a wild convulsive grasp, and heard a faint gurgling sound. More fervent now grew the archbishop's prayer, and with faltering voice he implored the mercy of Heaven upon a poor human soul—a soul which never knew mercy.

The death of the king was kept secret for three days, and then announced to parliament by Lord-chancellor Wriothesley, torturer of heretics, who managed to weep on the occasion. Henry had left a large sum for masses to deliver his soul from purgatory, and the priests kept chanting dirges day and night while the lying-in-state took place at Whitehall. But there was, all the while, an earnest competition between priests and players. "To-morrow," the bishop of Winchester wrote, on the 5th of February, to the secretary of state, "the parishioners of this parish and I have agreed to have a solemn dirge for our late sovereign lord and master, in earnest, as becometh us; and to-morrow, certain players of my lord of Oxford intend, on the other side, within this burgh of Southwark, to have a solemn play, to try who shall have most resort." All the praying and playing culminated in a grand funeral at Windsor on the 10th of February, Norroy, King-at arms standing at the grave, and shouting, "Of your charity pray for the soul of the high and mighty prince, our late sovereign lord King Henry the Eighth."

King Henry. "If," he exclaimed, "all the patterns of a merciless tyrant had been lost to the world, they might have been found in this prince." According to Holinshed's 'Chronicles,' seventy-two thousand human beings were burnt, hanged, beheaded, or otherwise killed in the reign of Henry the Eighth.

SEAL OF HENRY VIII.

SECTION III. EDWARD VI.

THERE was a grim struggle for power as soon as King Henry had drawn his last breath. While the body of the tyrant was lying stiff and stark on its couch, the few favourites who had seen the heavy eyes close in death hurried about in wild haste, taking possession of all the papers and important state documents they could lay hold on. That they might not be interrupted in their task, they spread the report that the dread king was still alive, rightly judging that the terror of his presence would be quite sufficient to keep away all intruders. The chief direction of affairs was at once undertaken by the earl of Hertford, acting in conjunction with, and under the advice of, Cranmer; while under them served with zealous energy Sir William Paget, for some time secretary of state. A plan of action having been concerted among them, the earl took to horse, and in hot haste rode off to Hertford Castle, the residence of his nephew, little Prince Edward. With him he went to Enfield, where Princess Elizabeth was kept, and there announced to both the royal children that their father was dead. Their grief could not possibly be great, little as they had known of a father's love; however, they wept a few tears, and then put on their best clothes to go to London, under the safe conduct of the earl of Hertford and a body of his armed followers. The friends of the earl in London meanwhile carried out their part of the scheme with much punctuality. Although, according to law, parliament stood dissolved with the death of the monarch, they allowed it to assemble on the day after Henry's demise, Saturday, the 29th of January; and it was not till Monday, the 31st, that the representatives of the nation heard the announcement of the great event from the lips of Chancellor Wriothesley. Having had full three days to prepare his grief, the chancellor acted to perfection, being, as officially entered in the parliamentary proceedings, "almost disabled by his tears from uttering the words." The faithful lords and commons were somewhat perplexed whether they ought to laugh or to cry, but, after due consideration, came to a compromise with their feelings, "so tempering their sorrow," according to Burnet, "for the death of their late master with their joy for his son's happy succeeding him, that by an excess of joy they might not seem to have forgot the one so soon, nor to bode ill to the other by an extreme grief." Together with the announcement that "their late master" had died, parliament received the news that, in accordance with statute 28 Henry VIII. cap. 7, which granted him the right to bequeath his kingdom to whomsoever he liked, he had left the property, under "executors," to his son Edward, by a will dated December 30th, 1546. Thereupon all the lords and commons rose in joyful tumult, crying "Long life to Edward the Sixth!"

The shouts had scarcely ceased in Westminster hall, before Hertford entered the city with the young king, conducting his precious charge straightway to the Tower. Among the good citizens of London, less versed than members of parliament in the arts of self-control, the joy was exuberant, venting itself in a tremendous amount of shooting; "whereat," as recorded by the Rev. John Sturpe, "the king took great pleasure." It was a new life to the poor boy, just passed nine, who had been brought up in such solitude and confinement that the world could seem little else to him than a dreary desert, with not even big guns to enliven it. When scarcely out of baby-clothes, little Edward chiefly looked after by his shrewd uncle Hertford, and his friend and coadjutor Cranmer—fell among the divines, good Protestants at heart, and worthy men, but whose quintessence of life was in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. At the age of six, when fairly able to trot, two uncommonly learned men took him in hand, Dr. Cox and Mr. Cheke, the first, according to Burnet, "to be his preceptor for his manners and the knowledge of philosophy and divinity, the other for the tongues and mathematics." The "tongues" the poor child mastered so well as to be able to write elegant letters in Latin before the age of eight; when he was driven with full speed into philosophy and divinity by both Dr. Cox and Sir Anthony Cook, the latter "famous for his five learned daughters." Whether these terrible maidens assisted in Edward's studies, reciting Greek tragedies, or dancing after the manner of the ancient Egyptians, has been left unrecorded; but at any rate, the three tutors, Cook, and Cox, and Choko, with a select band of minor professors, did their best to keep the little prince fully employed. Of the gambols of boyhood he knew nothing, and for playing there was no time; besides which it would have been unbecoming in one studying philosophy and divinity. Thus his eyes must have brightened when his uncle

Hertford came to fetch him, telling him he should be king and have a holiday. So he was led to London with great pomp, installed in new lodgings in the Tower, and saw all the great nobility of the realm pass before him in review on the day after his arrival, Tuesday, the 1st of February. In passing, every one knelt, and kissing the little king's hand, exclaimed, "God save your grace!"

The first measures of Hertford and Cranmer were, thus far, successful enough; but in the further prosecution of their designs they met with some obstacles. By the will of Henry, the royal property, that is the kingdom, was left in charge of sixteen "executors," who, in conjunction with twelve additional councillors, were to govern the realm until King Edward had reached the age of eighteen. The difficulties of such a numerous regency were obvious, and no sooner, therefore, had the young king been installed, when Cranmer proposed that the members of the council appointed in the royal will should elect a president among themselves, to carry out the chief functions of the executive. The proposal was acquiesced in by all except Lord-chancellor Wriothesley, one of the sixteen "executors," and the chief representative among them of the Roman Catholic party. Fearing that the appointment of a president would throw the whole political power into the hands of the reformers, he resisted Cranmer's design most strenuously, pleading that it was contrary to the intentions of King Henry. To stop the opposition of the chancellor, he was accused of having committed a misdemeanour by giving the great seal in commission, and the case having been proved before judges, the council of the regency pronounced that he had forfeited the office, that he should pay a large fine, and that he was to be imprisoned in his own house until further orders. Before this judgment had been arrived at, Hertford was unanimously elected by his colleagues Protector of the Realm of England and governor of the king's person, and this nomination was followed up by a distribution of titles and honours among the chief members of the council. The Protector himself became duke of Somerset; his brother, Sir Thomas Seymour, was made Baron Seymour of Sudley and lord high admiral; and John Dudley, Viscount Lisle, was raised to the dukedom of Warwick. This having been accomplished, and the Roman Catholic party been entirely subjugated by the expulsion of Wriothesley from the government, the Protector, on the 12th of March, made his nephew sign a patent by which nearly the whole of the powers of absolute royalty were transferred to himself. The "executors" were done away with by this act; liberty being given to the Protector, both to choose his own counsellors and to consult them or not as he thought fit. A mighty change was thus accomplished without the least visible effort. In reality, the duke of Somerset was now king of England, with Thomas Cranmer for prime-minister. For the first time in history, the realm had come to be under a Protestant government.

Edward VI. was crowned king of England and of Ireland on Sunday, the 20th of February, four days after his father's funeral. Archbishop Cranmer put the regal diadem on his head before the altar of Westminster abbey, and he and the Protector showed their good sense by abridging the ceremony, so as not to be hurtful to the delicate constitution of the boy-king, whose health had grievously suffered in his monastic education. Even now it was not well attended to, and partly by his own wish, engendered by long habit, partly from political motives, the poor boy was kept shut up in his state apartments day after day and week after week, with nothing but the weary crowd of tutors and ministers passing around him and enlivening his existence. On the whole, he had but left his prison in the country to get into another, somewhat more sumptuous, in town, where the joys of happy boyhood were more than over beyond his reach. To enliven the solitude of his confinement, the unfortunate child took to write an autobiographical sketch of his life, which, when brought up to his dreary gilded existence, changed into a diary. All the philosophers, divines, and mathematical and classical masters got wild for joy at the scholastic zeal of their pupil, utterly unable to see, with their learned eyes, that the poor little king was building himself a tomb among the dusty Greek and Latin folios. However, their praises sounded sweet to his ears. He was delighted when Master William Thomas, great among the book-worms of the age, bestowed public praise on him for his scholarly acquirements, in a work printed soon after his coronation. "King Edward," wrote the learned Thomas, "is the beautifullest creature that liveth under the sun; the wittiest, the most amiable, and the gentlest thing of all the world. Such a spirit of capacity, learning the things taught him by his schoolmasters, that it is a wonder to hear say." William Thomas got his reward by being appointed soon after one of the clerks of the council; but his praises did more harm than good to the pale royal boy, who got more and more ambitious of "learning the things taught him by his schoolmasters." His studies were greatly encouraged by his uncle, the duke of Somerset, who came forward in his own person the more he retired, growing, as expressed by Strype, the historian, "an exceeding great man swelling with titles." He called himself "Governor of the person of the King's Majesty, Protector of all his realms, Lieutenant-general of all his armies by land and by sea, Lord High Treasurer and Earl Marshal of England." There was nothing but the shadow of a pale sickly boy between him and the throne.

Somerset had scarcely seized the reins of power when he was drawn, somewhat against his own wish, and still more against that of Cranmer, into war with Scotland. It arose out of an event expected for some time, the death of the French monarch. King Francis I. survived his royal brother of England, with whom he had often feasted and often fought, little more than two months; and his son and successor, who ascended the throne under the name of Henri II., at once diverted the policy of France from its old course by throwing himself into the arms of the ultra Roman Catholic party. Guided by the duke de Guise and cardinal de Lorraine, the two brothers of the queen-dowager of Scotland, and chief leaders of the popish faction, the young king exhibited undisguised animosity to the new English government, and even expressed a wish for war in refusing to ratify the treaty of Campo, entered into by the French and English plenipotentiaries on the 7th of June of the previous year, and which Francis I., owing to great bodily suffering, had not been able to sign before his death. Henri II., indeed, had one plausible if not valid reason for refusing to submit to the treaty of Campo, in the continued interference of the English government in the affairs of Scotland. King Henry, till the time of his death, had kept up a more or less open intercourse with the Scottish insurgents, especially with the murderers of the archbishop of St. Andrews; and the duke of Somerset, so far from interrupting this communication, greatly extended it by a treaty with the same rebel forces. The position of the latter at this moment was very strange. The men who murdered the great leader of the Roman Catholic party in Scotland were not looked upon as common assassins, but had risen to be the chief opponents of the established government; and while King Henry himself was unable to enter upon more than a border war with his army, Norman Lesley and his few co-conspirators held the castle of St. Andrews, which they had taken by stratagem, against the earl of Arran and the whole army of Scotland. Immediately after the murder of Cardinal Beaton, his inveterate enemies dragged his body upon the battlements and hung it across in a linen sheet; and when the people of the city came rushing up in terror, they mocked them, crying, "See, there is your god; and if ye are satisfied, get home to your houses." Such boldness intimidated all from disturbing the handful of men who held possession of the stronghold, so that they had time to invite all their friends and partizans to join them; and as the castle was well stored with food, guns, and ammunition, they soon found themselves at the head of a little army, necessarily the focus of the insurrection and the hope of the ever-growing body of reformers. In vain the earl of Arran, regent of Scotland, attempted to take the castle by a regular siege; his army suffered so much, that after an assault of five months he was glad to retire and to enter into a truce with Norman Lesley and his followers. This was a few weeks after the death of King Henry, when Somerset had just come to power, who lost no time in making a formal treaty with the insurgents of St. Andrews, among whom was John Knox, greatest of Scottish reformers. By their treaty with England the rebels bound themselves to use all means in their power for forwarding the marriage of the infant queen with King Edward, and to hold the castle of St. Andrews against the regent until the accomplishment of this event. On Somerset's part, there was this justification for the treaty, that the Scottish parliament had solemnly consented to the marriage of Mary and Edward; but the queen-dowager and the Roman-Catholic party, which sided with her, held that this consent had been invalidated by the subsequent action of King Henry. For a moment after the earl of Arran had been compelled to give up the siege of St. Andrews, there were hopes of a peaceable settlement of the question, the regent being not at all disinclined to it; but these expectations entirely vanished with the news of the death of the king of France. With the accession of Henri II., the confidence of the queen-dowager and the papal faction rose to the highest pitch, and before even the old king had been buried, the duke de Guise was able to inform his royal sister that the new king would fight the battle of Catholicism in Scotland.

The interference of France in Scottish affairs at this moment was most wanton and mischievous, for as far as the English government was concerned there was no cause whatever for hostilities. In striking contrast to King Henry's proceedings, the Protector's conduct towards Scotland was characterized by the greatest moderation, and in all respects wise and statesmanlike. Soon after his accession to power, Somerset addressed an almost affectionate message to "the nobility and counsellors, gentlemen and commons, and all other the inhabitants of the realm of Scotland;" setting forth, "with greeting and peace," his own desire and that of the English people to live on perfect and unalterable terms of friendship with the brethren and neighbours in the north. The Protector eloquently argued that, being dwellers on the same island, and speaking the same tongue, the inhabitants of Scotland and of England ought to be connected in the most intimate alliance, so as to form one political body. "It is," he wrote, "unnatural, unnatural, and unchristian, that there should be mortal war betwixt us, who, in respect of all other nations, should be like as two brethren." Then, rising into still higher eloquence, he continued: "If we two, being made one by amity, be most able to defend us against all nations, and having the sea for wall; the mutual love for garrison, and God for defence, should make so noble and well-agreeing monarchy, that neither in peace we may be ashamed, nor in war afraid of any worldly or foreign power; why should not you be as desirous of the same; and have as much cause to rejoice of it as we?" That it was not the desire of the English people to subjugate Scotland, no more than of the Scottish people to conquer England, was the main point of his argument. "We are quite willing," the Protector exclaimed, "to take the indifferent old name of Britain again, because nothing should be left on our part to be offered; nor do we seek to take from you your laws or customs, but will seek only to redress your oppressions, which of divers ye do sustain." He finally argued that there never had been such an opportunity as now for the union of the two crowns, in the persons of two infant sovereigns; an opportunity manifestly offered by Divine Providence for the happiness of the two nations. The Lord Protector never was greater, never was wiser, and never spoke truer words than in this message, and yet it remained entirely without result. The eloquence of Heaven itself would have been ineffectual against the intrigues of a wily, bigoted woman, backed by a tribe of howling priests. The queen-mother and popish party saw no hopes of repairing their fallen fortunes but in war; and Marie's French friends being ready to steep Scotland in blood for her satisfaction, the demons of war were let loose once more.

France commenced the strife without any previous notice, by sending a powerful fleet to Scotland, to assist in the reduction of the cast of St. Andrews. The whole movement was directed by the queen-

dowager; and when the French galleys arrived, the regent of Scotland was absent with his army, engaged in a little plundering speculation on the western border. Arran hurried up in great haste when he heard of the somewhat unwelcome arrival of the French allies, and to prevent them having it all their own way, sat down with them before St. Andrew's. However, he was not able to do much, for the French ordnance, once fairly posted, went blazing away at such a rate that the old castle seemed fairly to crumble under it to pieces. From the steeple of the abbey church, from St. Salvator's college, and from every point of vantage, the big guns of France hurled their shots against the stone walls, till at the end of a month a number of gaps betokened the terrible effects of the fire. Within the castle the besieged had little else but stout hearts to oppose to the big guns. They stood out valiantly, postilence adding to their sufferings; but at last, when the large gaps in the walls told of the impossibility of holding the fortress any longer, they hoisted the white flag, and on the 30th of July surrendered to the French. The soldiers of Henri II. lost no time in securing their prize, they marched all the prisoners, great John Knox included, on board their galleys; and having plundered the castle of everything worth taking, set sail again for France. The earl of Arran grimly looked on, envious of the success of the dear allies, and still more envious of their booty, of which he had not the smallest share. He got, however, fresh work for his troops in the demolition of the castle—determined on partly as an expiatory sacrifice for the murder of Cardinal Beaton, and partly for fear of its falling another time into the possession of an enemy of the government. The task of breaking down the thick walls, battered though they were by the French guns, did not prove easy, and was only partly accomplished; and to this day the picturesque ruins of St. Andrew's castle boldly overlook the sea, a landmark for mariners.

The report of the landing of the French troops in Scotland had no sooner reached the Protector than he collected an army in all haste, and set out towards the north. By the beginning of August he found himself at the head of twenty thousand troops, with which he started from Newcastle on the 29th of the month, and four days after entered Berwick-on-Tweed. Here admiral Lord Clinton was waiting with twenty-four galleys, prepared to co-operate with the army; and after a conference held with the Protector, the fleet put to sea on the 3rd of September, followed the next day by the troops. The army kept close to the shore, as much as possible in sight of the fleet; and having got as far as Dunbar, meeting with no resistance, Somerset turned west, marching directly upon Edinburgh, while Clinton sailed up the Firth of Forth. Near Musselburgh the English troops once more met the ships, and almost at the same moment came in sight of the main army of Scotland, strongly encamped on a hill on the eastern bank of the river Esk. The encounter was so unexpected that the earl of Warwick, next in command to the Protector, was very nearly captured by a body of Scotch cavalry reconnoitring the ground, and only saved himself by a desperate and protracted hand-to-hand fight, maintained till the timely arrival of some of his own troops. Seeing the enemy approach, the earl of Arran, who commanded the Scotch army, immediately prepared for battle. He had seeming good reason for hurrying on the contest, his position not only being far better than that of his antagonist, but his troops twice as numerous, more than forty thousand men having enrolled under the banner of Scotland. The Protector appeared far less anxious for the deadly encounter. It was not fear of being defeated that made him hold back, but a strong feeling of pity and commiseration for the men under his own command, as well as for the Scotch troops, whom, in accordance with his last message of peace, he looked upon as brethren. To make a last attempt at reconciliation, he entrenched his army at Prestonpans, about two miles from the Scottish camp, to which he despatched a herald, offering a cessation of hostilities on almost humiliating terms. His proposal was to evacuate the kingdom, and to make good all the damages committed by his troops, on the sole condition that the Scotch should engage not to send their young queen out of the country, but keep her at home, and when of age allow her to choose her own husband. The earl of Arran received this, to him most advantageous proposition, by no means in the spirit in which it was offered; but attributing it solely to fear, hastened on the sanguinary struggle. His haste was the greater as, being endowed personally with no great strength of character, he had fallen gradually under the dominion of the priests, who swarmed all over his camp, directing the military movements as much or more than his own officers. Armed with swords and daggers, the teachers of religion went from tent to tent, inflaming the minds of the soldiers, and exhorting them to kill the English heretics in the opposite camp for the everlasting glory of God and the Holy Virgin. Before long, the regent himself was unable to restrain the ardour of his excited troops, and, led more than leading, hurried into battle.

The morning of Saturday the tenth of September broke dull and gloomy over the two armies prepared for deadly strife. Somerset knew that the battle could no longer be evaded, and at eight o'clock in the morning slowly moved his troops from their entrenchments into the plain near the mouth of the river Esk. He was prepared to meet the Scotch near their own camp; but great was his surprise, on passing an intervening hill known as the Fawside Brae, to see that they had left the splendid ground which they occupied, and actually crossed the steep banks of the river, placing themselves near a swamp, in the most disadvantageous position. This movement was owing to the priests, who, hearing of Somerset's disinclination for battle, and fearful lest the heretics might escape from their clutches and retreat on board the fleet, had driven Arran to leave his well-selected post on the hills and descend into the plain in search of the English army. The Protector at once perceived the immense advantage thus given to him by the enemy, and without further loss of time ranged his troops in order of battle. He posted his vanguard on a hill to the left, farthest from the sea, with orders to remain on the high ground till the approach of the Scotch; nearer to the river, hidden by its steep banks, Lord Grey was stationed at the head of the horse, to fall on the flank of the enemy when marching towards the van; while Somerset himself, with the main body of the army, remained on the Fawside Brae, where the royal standard of England was planted securely in the ground. These dispositions had no sooner been taken when the Scotch came rushing along with terrific force, both towards the English vanguard and the main. Nothing could withstand the furious onset, the storm of which drove back both infantry and cavalry, and before the Protector could well bring his troops into action, a body of Highlanders had grasped the flag-staff of the standard of England, trying to tear it to the ground. There was frightful confusion for a moment, but it passed over as rapidly as it had come. Rallying once more round their commanders, the English troops quickly formed themselves into one impenetrable mass, and levelling their bows and arquebuses, greeted the assailants with a hail of heavy missiles. At the same moment the fleet opened fire upon the dense ranks of the Scotch, and from the hills above, where the English artillery was stationed, there came a raking shower of lead and iron. The tide now turned in a moment, the very impetuosity of the Scotch becoming fatal to them. The wild and senseless excitement of the first onset suddenly got changed into an equally senseless depression, and seized by a fierce panic, they rushed backward quicker even than they advanced. No more fighting now was needed on the part of the English—all that was necessary was to slaughter.

There was no neglect shown in killing; from all sides death kept pursuing the flying men; down upon them came the cavalry of Grey, the infantry of Warwick, and Somerset with the guards, while the big guns on the hills and the ships hurled columns of fire upon the doomed host. "And thus," wrote an eye-witness, a native of London, named Patten, judge-marshal in Somerset's army, "and thus, with blood and slaughter of the enemy, the chase was continued five miles in length westward from the place from their standing, which was in the fallow fields of Under-Esk, until Edinburgh, park, and well nigh to the gates of the town itself, and unto Leith; and in breadth nigh four mile, from the Firth sands up toward Dalkeith southward. In all which space the dead bodies lay as thick as a man may note cattle grazing in a full replenished pasture. The river ran all red with blood."

Scotland lost near twenty thousand of her bravest sons on this fatal day. Not a man of the whole of Arran's army would have escaped had the Protector willed it; but Somerset in mercy put a stop to the dreadful slaughter before it was quite dark. Staying the further pursuit of the enemy, he called his troops together in the camp which the Scotch had left in the morning, where, ranged for review, they broke out in such a tremendous shout of victory, that it was heard at the gates of Edinburgh. All day long the atmosphere had been thick and oppressive; but now a heavy shower of rain began to fall, refreshing the earth, and offering a last solace to the parched lips of the thousands of wounded and dying men who covered the ground for miles around. The English set up their tents for the night on a neighbouring hill, known as that of Pinkie—after which the battle came to be named—and the next morning, having stripped the Scottish camp, and taken possession of immense stores of arms, ammunition, and clothing, they leisurely marched towards the sea-shore near Leith. It would have been easy for the Protector, the preceding evening, to take Edinburgh, to the gates of which the panic-stricken remnant of the great Scottish army had been driven; nor was it difficult now, seeing the utterly helpless condition of the citizens. But Somerset, notwithstanding the almost unparalleled victory he had gained, and which had made over to him a whole kingdom not less than a great army, seemed as reluctant as before to follow up the war. He made no attempts whatever to take the capital; but while his fleet was sweeping the sea before him of every Scotch sail, he sat quietly down on the shore of Forth, forgetful, apparently, of battles, wars, and victory. Thus he remained inactive from Sunday the 11th till Saturday the 17th of November, when, to the intense surprise of his troops, the order went forth that they were to return to England. Never before in the history of fighting mankind had a grand victory been followed by such a voluntary retreat; and the indignation of the English soldiers thereat was so great, that, to vent their anger, they rushed into Leith, setting fire to the town and all the ships in the harbour. To prevent further mischief, Somerset hurried on his departure, and before day-break on the morning of the 18th of November the tents were struck, and the army marched to the south-east under a red sky, leaving the burning town at the rear. The Protector himself with the main army took the road along the sea, avoiding the great battle-field, as if the remembrance of his victory was giving him pain; but some few of his troops went roaming over the ground, and had to behold a most extraordinary spectacle. "Part of us," reported Patten, the judge-marshal, "kept the way that the chief of the chase was continued in, whereby we found most part of the dead corpses lying very ruefully, with the colour of their skins changed greenish, about the place they had been smitten in, still above ground unburied. But many we perceived to have been buried in Under-Eck churchyard, in graves but thinly covered with green turf. By many others again of the dead bodies was there set up a stick with a clout, with a rag, with an old shoe, or some other mark for knowledge, the which we understood to be marks made by the friends of the party dead when they had found him, but durst not, for fear or lack of leisure, convey away to bury while we were in those parts." The terrified people everywhere fled before the invaders, but Somerset soon removed their fears; for after leaving small garrisons at Haddington and several other fortified places on his road, he went in a rapid march to the north, which he recrossed on the 29th of September, and immediately hastened back to London. The citizens wanted to prepare a triumphant reception, but he declined it. "If anything," he exclaimed, "hath been done to the honour of the realm, it is God's doing, and therefore give Him the praise."

The Protector's quick return to London, after an absence of only six weeks, was not entirely owing to his unwillingness to make war upon the Scotch nation, but also, in no small degree, to unwelcome news transmitted to him by his trusty friend and adviser, Sir William Paget. Somerset had to learn, with unconcealed regret, that, short as had been his power, and hard as he tried to discharge his duties, there was already a strong party forming against him, with his own brother at the head of the coalition, and to all appearance, one of his bitterest enemies. The animosity was solely the produce of envy. Both the Protector and his brother were little above the rank of country squires previously to the marriage of Henry VIII. with their sister, Jane Seymour, but while this union and the subsequent birth of a prince had the effect of raising the elder of the two brothers to the earldom of Hertford and a high position at court, it left the younger in a poor dependent position. The rise of the Protector was partly due to his insinuating manners, but more still to his strong attachment to the Protestant cause, which brought him into intimate connexion with Cranmer, as well as with Cromwell, whom he succeeded as leader of the party. It was Cranmer who planned but he who executed the great plan of making the infant son of Henry the means of establishing Protestantism in England; and while the archbishop carefully directed the education of the young prince, the earl of Hertford no less carefully watched over his personal security, prepared to grasp the crown, at the death of the king, in the name of his royal nephew. The success of the scheme was too perfect not to raise a host of envious foes, all eager to tear the high minded usurper from his lofty position. The Protector was well aware of the fact, but he trusted his brother; and one of his first acts on arriving at power was to raise him to the peerage, giving him the title of Baron Seymour of Sudley, with grant of large estates in various parts of the kingdom. His wealth and position was increased by a marriage with Catherine Parr, King Henry's widow, who was vain enough to believe in his insincere protestations of love, and to give him her hand soon after the demise of her dread lord. Catherine, during her short and perilous career as sixth queen of Henry, had managed to amass immense treasure, which was emptied by the old widow, with usual infatuation, into the lap of her young and handsome husband. Seymour spent the money freely in his high ambitious objects, engaging large bands of retainers, and gathering round him men of spirit and courage, chiefly from the ranks of the lower nobility. His movements were quiet as long as his brother was near, but no sooner had Somerset gone to Scotland, than he threw off the mask, openly avowing his aim to become ruler of the kingdom. It was the report of these doings that accelerated the quick return of the Protector to London.

His return was quite sufficient to allay the storm that seemed threatening against him. Seymour, able, unscrupulous, and master in hypocrisy, denied all the charges brought against him, and the Protector was too good natured and full of brotherly love not to believe and forgive. He was the more inclined not to bear ill will against friend or enemy, as he had a task before him, the greatness of which left no room for petty malice and personal considerations. The mighty work in which Somerset and Cranmer were joined, with many able minds under them, was to give to England the two inestimable blessings of Protestantism and free government. The first part of the task, the most important, they commenced to execute immediately after their accession to power, by instituting a visitation of the clergy after the manner inaugurated by Cromwell. For this purpose the kingdom was divided into six great circuits, each of which was placed, for the time being, under the absolute control of three or more ecclesiastical visitors, whose duty it was to inquire into the religious condition of the several dioceses, to exhort the clergy as well as laity to the study of the Bible, to remove idolatrous images, to repress priestly fanaticism, and in general to destroy as much as possible all outward forms of popish superstition. The success of this work, entirely directed by Archbishop Cranmer, was very great; and when the Protector returned from Scotland, he learnt to his intense satisfaction that the visitors, all of them zealous reformers, had carried out their instructions everywhere without opposition, cordially aided by the people. A great step towards freedom of conscience having thus been accomplished, Somerset next hazarded a bold stroke for political liberty. The first parliament of the new reign was called together on the 4th of November, 1547, and the first bill laid before it was expressly prepared to destroy the basis of the late king's monstrous despotism, as far as it was embodied in legislative acts and royal decrees having the force of statutes. The preamble of this bill recited that former parliaments had passed certain laws "which might seem and appear to men of exterior realms, and many of the king's majesty's subjects, very strait, sore, extreme, and terrible," and that therefore the whole of them should be for ever repealed and annulled. The two houses duly passed the Protector's bill, and thus were swept away with one stroke the whole of those terrible statutes, described in the 'Commentaries' of Blackstone as "the new-fangled treasons of the bloody reign of Henry VIII." The act of repeal included the monstrous statute of the Six Articles, which had brought hundreds to the stake; the sanguinary law "concerning punishment and reformation of heretics and Lollards;" and, finally, that most preposterous of all the parliamentary enactments of Henry's reign, by which royal decrees were allowed to have the force of statutes. To stretch the repeal as far as possible, it was made to include the whole of Henry's despotic laws against freedom of conscience, or, as it was expressed, "all and every other act concerning doctrine and matter of religion." This great statute of repeal—first statute of the reign of Edward VI.—properly laid the foundation of religious liberty in England. Thirteen years before Cromwell had severed, with one gigantic stroke, the ancient bonds which chained the people to Rome; and now Cromwell's friend and successor annihilated, with stroke not less gigantic, the bonds, mightier than those of Rome, by which men's minds were held under the influence of worldly authority. Cromwell transferred the rule of faith from the pope to the king; Somerset transferred it from the king to God.

The opposition to all the measures for the reform of religion carried out by the Protector and Cranmer was remarkably slight, showing that the people of England had been Protestant at heart long before it pleased King Henry to make himself independent of the Roman pontiff. Everywhere the inhabitants, with the exception of the very lowest classes, joyfully welcomed the teachers and preachers of a purified faith, and eagerly assisted in the destruction of the images of idolatrous worship, which for centuries had debased the rites of Christianity into paganism. Even the high dignitaries of the Church, who had the greatest interest in remaining attached to ancient practices, showed scarcely any resistance to the new reforms, thus silently acknowledging that they met with the approbation of the vast majority of the people. Of all the bishops, only three stood forth in opposition, namely, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, Bonner, bishop of London, and Tunstall, bishop of Durham. The antagonism of the latter was very mild, so that Cranmer did not think it necessary to interfere with him; as for Gardiner and Bonner, they got exceedingly loud in their declamations, so that the Protector was compelled to shut them up in the Fleet prison. Under Henry's reign, for which both bishops professed extraordinary admiration, their speeches against royal authority would have certainly brought them to the block or the stake; but the Protector was wise enough not to interfere too much with these excited ecclesiastics, and having given them a few months in the Fleet, to cool down, he let them out again. This leniency, unfortunately, was very little appreciated by many of the old and new friends of Rome sympathising with Bonner and Gardiner. Taking the Protector's kindness to be weakness, and regarding his lofty scruples of conscience to punish men for their belief as indifference to religion, they began to band together, declaiming, at first softly, but gradually in more determined tone, against many of the measures of reform, attempting even, here and there, to stir the ignorant population into insurrection. Somerset had not much trouble in keeping down open revolt. However, he seemed sorely vexed on many occasions to see the ingratitude of those very classes, the lowest and most oppressed of the nation, for whom he was struggling with all his might to gain freedom, and to whose political and religious emancipation he had devoted his life. To a mob which, stired by priests, had risen in the eastern counties, demanding that the old forms of government should be restored, he sent a noble reply. "The Six Articles," he wrote in the king's name, "and the statutes that made words treason, and other such severe laws, ye seem to require again, the which the whole parliament, almost on their knees, required us to abolish and put away; and when we condescended thereto, with a whole voice gave us humble thanks, for they thought that before no man was sure of his life, lands, or goods. And will ye have these laws again? Will ye that we shall resume the scourge again and hard snaffle for your mouths?" The Protector had yet to learn the great lesson that the mob of all lands and all ages is ever more ready to crucify than to give thanks to its benefactors and reformers.

Somerset's extreme forbearance in the war against Scotland did not meet with more success than his leniency against the priestly element at home. After his overwhelming victory at the gates of Edinburgh, it was in his power to bring about the union of the two nations by taking possession of Mary, the infant queen, and thus securing the marriage with the young king which he so vainly advocated in his message to the Scottish parliament. But his fear of accomplishing by violence what he hoped might be done in peace made him neglect this golden opportunity; and not to give him the chance of another, the bigoted queen-dowager immediately concerted measures with her friends for carrying little Mary to France, and contracting her to the Dauphin; or, in other words, offering the crown of Scotland to the French king. The design met with great resistance among all the classes of the Scottish people, but was nevertheless carried out in a very short time, chiefly through the active agency of the priesthood, and with the help of French troops and French gold. In the middle of June, 1548, a body of six thousand mercenaries, under the command of general D'Esco D'Espauvilliers, were landed at Leith, and marched towards Haddington; and when encamped here, ostensibly for the purpose of besieging the town, still held by the English, the queen dowager called a parliament together to sanction the removal of her daughter to France. The deputies met in the ancient abbey near Haddington, the head-quarters of the foreign mercenaries; and in this unenviable position, with French guns pointed at their heads, were asked whether they had any objection to the marriage of their infant queen with the Dauphin. The danger of opposition was clearly great; nevertheless there were men among the deputies who dared to lift their voices against the proposal, arguing that if Scotland must needs be dependent, it would be better to be under the kindred English government than under the rule of the alien king of France. Threats and bribes soon silenced these orators, for gold was plentiful in the French camp, as well as gunpowder. The earl of Arran, who had made a show of patriotic opposition, on a sudden became very quiet, consenting to accept a French pension of twelve thousand livres a year, together with the title of the duke of Chatelherault. Others followed his example, and the marriage of Mary to the Dauphin and her removal to France were voted by a majority. No time was lost in completing the scheme, great as were the difficulties still in the way. English ships held the command of the Channel, narrowly watching the traffic between France and Scotland; and to escape their vigilance, Captain Villegaignon, experienced mariner in the service of Henri II., conceived the bold project of carrying off the young queen by circumnavigating the kingdom. A voyage round the north of Scotland, through the intricate channels of the Orkney and Shetland Islands, had scarcely ever before been attempted; but the circumstances being desperate, the queen-dowager consented to the plan, resolved to risk anything rather than let her fall into the hands of the English heretics. Towards the middle of July, Captain Villegaignon quietly dropped down the Firth of Forth with four galleys, as if intending to return home by the usual route; but instead of sailing south when arrived in the open sea, he stood northward, and groping his way along the rocky coasts of Aberdeenshire and Caithness, around Duncansbay Head and Cape Wrath, between the Hebrides and the Isle of Sky, he succeeded in reaching the mouth of the Clyde, and threw anchor at Dumbarton. Here the infant queen, in charge of Lords Erskine and Fleming, and a suite of two hundred ladies, gentlemen, and attendants, was waiting to go on board; and Villegaignon quickly ran his four galleys across the Atlantic to Brest, landing his precious charge on the 13th of August. Queen Mary Stuart, now nearly six years old, was immediately conducted to St. Germain-on-Laye, and there betrothed to the dauphin, aged six. Thus Scotland had become a dependency of the crown of France.

The Protector saw when it was too late, the immense blunder he had committed in not following up his advantages against the northern kingdom. Even at the moment when the French were preparing to carry off the infant queen, his generous sympathies blinded his political judgment to the extent that he issued an address to the people of Scotland, imploring them, in eloquent terms, to agree to a union of the English and Scottish crowns, and thus to end the danger that beset them from foreign encroachments. He could not, or would not see that in this case he was not dealing with the people at all, but with a set of bold and unprincipled adventurers, who only looked to their own interest and not to that of the country, and who, like their leader, the queen dowager, were far more bound to the Pope, and the king of France than to the Scottish nation. But it was not until the crown of Scotland had been carried to France, that Somerset became conscious of his fatal mistake in trusting to arguments against people whose chief weapon was perfidy and intrigue, and in attempting negotiations where energy and physical force alone could lead to success. To repair his grave political error as far as possible, the Protector determined to appeal once more from diplomacy to arms, and commenced levying troops for a war against Scotland. It was the more necessary, as the French had already commenced war on their part, besieging the English garrison at Haddington, and reducing them to sore distress. An attempt to relieve them, made by Sir Thomas Palmer, governor of Berwick, at the head of twelve hundred horse, had failed entirely, the French general taking the field against them with his whole army, and, capturing one half of the small force, driving the rest back over the border. The repulse so much exasperated the people of the northern counties, that the earl of Shrewsbury, who, by order of the Protector, was gathering troops around his standard for the invasion of Scotland, saw his ranks swelled by a great many of the yeomen and middle classes, and was able to take the offensive, at the end of August, with an army of twenty-two thousand men, aided by a fleet of fifty sail under admiral the Lord Clinton. There was no resistance met with anywhere, the French retreating on all points, and Shrewsbury, after changing the garrison at Haddington, and leaving abundant stores of food and ammunition, went in search of General D'Espanvilliers, whom he found under the walls of Musselburgh, in a strongly intrenched camp. To hazard an attack upon it, Shrewsbury was unwilling; and, after various warlike demonstrations, much sounding of bugles and beating of drums, the French looking sternly at the English all the while, and the English at the French, the two armies bid farewell to each other. Uncertain what to do in Scotland, the thoughtful English commander now turned his face again southward, and safely carried every man of his army back across the Tweed. Lord Clinton's fleet, which had started together with the army, did not get back quite so safely. With a wonderful absence of military knowledge and even common sense, the admiral landed several thousand of his men, sailors and soldiers together, without guns, and almost unarmed, at an inhospitable corner of the coast of Fife, with orders to march inland and to find something to conquer, or to plunder. They found nothing but the laird of Wemyss and a number of his friends on horseback, and as the laird persisted in riding towards them, the trespassers thought it best to beat a precipitate retreat. But having once commenced to run, they had all the country people behind them, with scores of well-horsed lairds and angry priests for leaders, who did their best to change the flight into a rout. Many were killed, and the rest, according to a Scotch historian, were "forced to save themselves by wading in sea to the necks, having got no better booty than their backful of strokes and wet skins." After this achievement, the noble admiral set sail again for the English shore, making his appearance at Berwick a month after the arrival of his friend in command, the earl of Shrewsbury.

The disgrace of these proceedings against Scotland, which seemed deep enough to rouse the Protector to energetic action, was almost lost upon him, the critical state of affairs in his own immediate neighbourhood absorbing his entire attention. His high aims, genuine kindness, and extreme affability were gaining for him a daily increasing popularity among the middle and lower classes, but at the same time contributed to swell the number of his enemies in the upper ranks and those nearest to the throne. Accustomed to the brutal despotism of their former master, the great nobles felt no respect for one whom they deemed their inferior in birth, and who, though he might have easily purchased reverence by terror, was more inclined at all times to forgive than to punish. But the royal power which Somerset wielded was yet too exalted to allow them to go beyond hints and murmurs; and it was not till there arose a man among them bold enough to become their leader that they ranged themselves in open opposition. This man was Lord Seymour, the Protector's brother, and, as he gradually proved himself, his deadliest enemy. It was in vain that riches, honours, and dignities were heaped upon him to soothe his ambition and to become a dutiful subject; his mind, coarse and vulgar in the extreme, was doomed to be never content, and all that was given to him served but to increase his greed. In every respect, Seymour was the opposite of his elder brother. The Protector was strictly moral in his private life, and Seymour a wild unprincipled libertine; the former democratic in his political views, and the latter haughtily aristocratic; the former sincerely religious and attached to the Protestant faith, and the latter a bitter sceptic with a dash of Popish superstition. In trying to reconcile such a brother and to win his love, Somerset's labours were necessarily vain, nevertheless, he made attempt after attempt to gain this object, sparing no trouble nor sacrifice for the same. Besides raising his brother to the peerage and bestowing upon him the title of lord high admiral, the Protector successively made him great chamberlain, high treasurer, and earl marshal, to which dignities were added grants of numerous rich estates, so that at last he who was all but a beggar only a few years before, came to be one of the richest men in the kingdom, holding landed property in no less than eighteen different counties. But gratitude was a feeling unknown to Seymour, and hatred and envy seemed to increase with every successive gift. After the Protector's return from Scotland, he made a faint show of submission, on being taken to account for his treasonable practices; but only a very short time elapsed before he broke out into renewed turbulence, scarcely hiding his great object of becoming guardian of the young king and ruler of the realm. There were even signs that his restless and unscrupulous ambition was soaring still higher, to the throne itself. Owing to his marriage with the widow of King Henry, the Princess Elizabeth was residing under the same roof with him, and to her he made love openly, even in the presence of his wife. The latter died on the 5th of September, 1548, soon after giving birth to a daughter, and then there arose dark rumours that she had been poisoned to facilitate his designs. It now became impossible for the Protector to overlook the doings of his brother any longer, there being numerous proofs of his intentions to overthrow the existing government. Accordingly, the order went forth for his arrest, and on the 19th of January, 1549, Lord Seymour entered the gate of the Tower, never to leave it again.

The trial of the brother of the Protector took place, after the despotic fashion inaugurated under Henry VIII., before a commission which made its report to parliament, without giving the accused the slightest chance of being personally heard in his defence. As soon as Seymour had been thrown into prison, all the great nobles who professed to be his friends and followers, looking upon him for a restoration of that oligarchical form of government which had been so completely crushed under the iron heel of the two Tudor kings, showed themselves false and treacherous; and instead of assisting him, as they might have done, turned his accusers and enemies. The principal charges against Seymour were that he had tried to secure the person of the king, so as to concentrate in his own hands all the power of the government; that he had "attempted and gone about to marry the king's majesty's sister, the Lady Elizabeth, to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and peril of the state of the same;" and, finally, that he had abused his office as lord high admiral to extort money, actually making compacts with pirates, and had likewise induced, with the same object, the master of the mint at Bristol to coin base money. The latter charges were well proved: but the first two somewhat imperfectly, owing to the necessity to examine the highest personages in the realm as witnesses. Both King Edward and his sister Elizabeth were placed under examination, and their evidence was very remarkable. The boy king testified that Seymour had supplied him with pocket-money, with which, it appears, he was scantily furnished, and had said, upon one occasion, "Ye must take upon yourself to rule, for ye shall be able enough, as well as other kings, and then ye may give your men somewhat," and again, "Ye are but even a very beggarly king now, ye have not to play, or to give to your servants." Little Edward, it was proved, took those taunts to heart, for the marquis of Dorset, one of his attendants, deposed, "that the king's majesty had divers times made his moan unto him, saying 'My uncle of Somerset dealeth very hardly with me, and keepeth me so strait that I cannot have money at my will; but my lord admiral both sends me money and gives me money.'" More extraordinary still was the evidence regarding Princess Elizabeth, which showed a deep-laid plan of corruption of the royal children. It was deposed by one of the attendant ladies of the princess—now going to be sixteen, and uncommonly shrewd and lively for her age—that Seymour used to visit her very early in the morning, "and if she were in her bed, he would put open the curtains and bid her good-morrow, and make as though he would come at her, and she would go further in the bed so that he could not come at her." Princess Elizabeth thought it necessary to defend herself against some of the current rumours about her connection with Seymour in a letter to the Protector, written in January, 1549, while her admirer was under trial. She declared the report of being "with child by my lord admiral" a "shameful slander," to disprove which she offered to come to court "that I may show myself there as I am." The offer was not accepted; but a commissioner, Sir Robert Tyrwhit, was despatched by the royal council to take her under examination. Sir Robert had many queries, among them whether she would have liked to marry the lord admiral, with the consent of the king. To which Elizabeth pertly replied that "she would not tell him what her mind was therein," expressing her wonder, "who bade him ask that question." The poor envoy soon discovered that he was no match for the daughter of King Henry and Anne Boleyn. "She hath a very good wit," he reported to the council, "but nothing is gotten of her but by great policy."

Seymour's trial and examination came to an end on the 23rd of February, when the whole of the commissioners went to the Tower in a body, to tell him that the charges against him had been proved, but that yet forgiveness would be extended to him if he would promise to give up all his ambitious projects, make his submission to the Protector, and not further disturb the peace of the realm. New threats and menaces, mingled with the energetic demand to have an open trial, formed the sole reply of the prisoner. The trial was too full of dangers for Seymour's former friends, now his accusers and enemies, that they felt disposed for a moment to grant it; and, on his refusing to sue for mercy, a bill of attainder was at once laid before the upper house of parliament. The noble lords, among whom Seymour, till his incarceration, had been all-powerful, passed the bill unanimously and in one sitting, the only speeches made being for the purpose of throwing stones upon the fallen man. The commons, to whom the bill of attainder was sent immediately after it had passed the upper house, made a feeble show of generosity, if not of public spirit, entirely new in Tudor parliaments. According to Burnet, some few of the members had the courage to speak "against attainders in absence, and thought it an odd way that some peers should rise up in their places in their own house and relate somewhat to the slander of another, and that he should be thereupon attainted," and they went so far as to propose that Seymour "should be brought to the bar, and be heard to plead for himself." To stifle this spirit of opposition, the council made the king sign a message to parliament, stating that his majesty held it to be "not necessary to send for the admiral," on which the commons forthwith remembered their duty, bowing in the dust as of old. The act of attainder was passed in a very full house, near four hundred votes being given for it, and only ten against it. On the 14th of March the royal assent was given to the bill, and three days after, on the 17th, the warrant was issued for Seymour's execution. It was believed that the Protector, who throughout did everything in his power to save his brother, acted under compulsion in signing the death-warrant, inasmuch as this document had also attached to it the name of Cranmer—it being deemed contrary to canon law for a bishop to sign an order of blood. Seymour was led to the block at Tower Hill on Wednesday, the 20th of March, protesting his innocence with his dying breath. A few days after the execution, Bishop Latimer, who attended the admiral in his last hours, preached a sermon about Seymour before the young king, telling him that his uncle "died very dangerously, irksomely, horribly;" and adding, "he was a man farthest from the fear of God that ever I know or heard of in England." The sermon proved, if nothing else, that Christian charity was nearly as much disregarded, in this burning age of religious zeal, among the friends of the Reformation as among the partisans of Rome.

The parliament which attained Seymour was employed, during the rest of the session, upon ecclesiastical affairs. Cranmer had appointed, the year previous, a committee of bishops and divines to compose a liturgy in English, in substitution of the old Latin formularies of public devotion, and the task having been accomplished, the two houses were asked to order the adoption of the same, which they did without resistance. The next important measure of religious reform brought before parliament was an act for the abolition of the celibacy of the clergy. In Germany, the Lutherans had made it one of their first efforts to destroy this unnatural law, and to fill up the great gulf separating the priesthood from the people, and forming it into a distinct caste; but in England nothing had been done hitherto to accomplish the same, although the leader of the English Protestants had strong personal reasons to follow in the steps of Luther. But Cranmer was essentially a timid man, and the very fact of being married, though known to every one, prevented him from advocating the destruction of so-called priestly chastity, for fear of its being ascribed to selfish motives. But the tide of the Reformation was now running too fast for even Cranmer to resist, and the bill against celibacy was brought in accordingly. It met with some little resistance in the upper as well as in the lower house, the plausible old arguments as to the necessity of ministers of religion devoting themselves entirely to the service of God and keeping free of earthly ties, being brought forward once more. The law permitting clergymen to take wives was finally voted by a large majority, though with the preamble, "that it were better for priests and the ministers of the church to live chaste and without marriage; and it were much to be wished they would of themselves abstain." It was strangely illogical on the part of the national representatives that, after abolishing a law as bad, they should at the same time recommend its voluntary retention; but in this, as in other respects, they merely obeyed superior orders. Like many other men, before and after, rise to power made a great modification in the views of Archbishop Cranmer, and the more unrestricted he had become in his sway, the more unwilling he showed himself to countenance those radical principles of religious reform which he had formerly advocated. It depended but on him now to remodel the government of the church of England after the tenets of Luther and Calvin; but instead of going in this direction, the primate, in his newly-acquired absolute power, seemed inclined rather to retrograde to Rome, not shrinking back even from Romish persecution. Soon after parliament had established the English liturgy, a commission was granted by act of council to Cranmer and some of his friends, "to examine and search after all anabaptists, heretics, or contemners of the book of common prayer;" and the zeal with which the archbishop set to work in punishing people who differed from him in their religious views, was not at all creditable to his character, as developed in the height of prosperity and power. Among the heretics brought before him was a woman called Joan Bocher, or Joan of Kent, a poor creature whose brain had been completely upset by protracted religious musings. She advocated "that Christ was not truly incarnate of the Virgin whose flesh, being the outward man, was sinfully begotten and born in, and consequently he could take none of it: but the Word, by the consent of the inward man of the Virgin, was flesh." This was the reported "doctrine" of Joan Bocher—mystical in the extreme, to the ordinary understanding—but with which Cranmer, nevertheless, thought it necessary to interfere. Joan was cited before the archiepiscopal court, and, on refusing to retract, was condemned to be burnt. According to Fox, the martyrologist, the young king for a long time refused to sign the warrant of death, and, when overcome at last by the importunities of Cranmer, declared that her blood should fall upon his conscience. Though this story has had doubts thrown upon it, none remain regarding the active part taken by Cranmer in the persecution of advanced reformers, several of whom, such as Van Parr, a Dutchman, were given to the flames for no other heresy but the mild one of Arianism. Joan Bocher, after lying more than a year in prison, was burnt in May, 1550, her fanaticism having increased to such extent that she hugged and kissed the faggots, and kept crying to the orthodox church of England preacher, who attempted to convert her amidst the flames, "Get ye away: you lie like a rogue! Go, and search the Scriptures!" But Cranmer was not always so severe against nonconformists, and while burning poor Joan, he allowed Princess Mary, heir-apparent to the throne, the free use of mass and confessors, and all the other paraphernalia of the church of Rome.

While Cranmer was busy with ecclesiastical reforms and persecutions, and Somerset engaged in levying troops for another war against Scotland, which seemed to promise great success, the people having come to repent of their too intimate alliance with France, there broke out a series of popular insurrections all over England, very embarrassing to the government, and not a little characteristic of the ferment of the times. In some respects, the risings were merely a prolongation of those witnessed in the two preceding reigns, consequences of the great political change effected by the Tudor rule in the systematic debasement of the great landed aristocracy and the accompanying favour bestowed upon the industrial and lower working classes. Under Henry VII., the movement was too new to have acquired much strength, and the wise king, besides, knew how to deal with it by legislation; but his son and successor had no other remedy but brute force, and though it suppressed for a while the outward symptoms of the disease, it was only to foster the germ of new eruptions at the removal of the pressure. A great part of the soil of England had changed hands since the accession of Henry VII., and the labouring classes among the agricultural population, from being in a state of dependency on their feudal superiors, had become absolutely free men—free to work, but also free to starve. Though infinitely raised in their moral and social position, the tillers of the soil were not for a time gainers from the material point of view, the free men often wanting bread and a hut to live in, where the serf was provided with both. The chief ambition of the old nobles and landowners was to have the greatest possible number of retainers, over whom they exerted a paternal despotism, but for whose bodies, if not souls, they cared well; the new landowners, on the other hand, had no such ambition, their all-absorbing aim being that of making money. They hired labourers and paid them, when required; and when not, they turned them adrift, with leave to perish on the road or in a neighbouring ditch. Shrewd and calculating men as they were, the new nobles soon found out, too, that the tilling of the soil did not put half as much money into their pockets as the use of it for grazing, and having once discovered this, the conversion of arable land into pasture went on at a rapid rate. Year after year, as the demand for English wool kept increasing on the continent of Europe, especially in the busy Flemish cities, acre after acre of fine corn-land was given over to the sheep, until, as remarked by Sir Thomas More, "a sheep had become in England a more ravenous animal than a lion or wolf, and devoured whole villages, cities, and provinces." The immense distress thus occasioned was still increased by the wanton and wasteful spoliation of the monasteries. The religious houses were not only the greatest landowners in England, but the best of landlords; they exacted neither too hard work nor too high rents; and as the monks themselves put praying above digging, and good cheer above either, they were not loth in carrying out the same principle with their lay dependents: thus while they sometimes corrupted their souls, they always fed and clothed the bodies. No man ever went away hungry from a convent door, as long as food was to be had within; charity was easy and natural with the inmates, who had no reason for saving, being without social and family ties. But all this gigantic system of poor relief was swept away with one stroke, and no substitute was made for it in any shape or form. The fine monasteries were razed to the ground, and the splendid, well-cultivated estates fell into the hands of rapacious courtiers, who, careless of the future, and looking only for immediate gain, let them either out on short exorbitant leases, or turned them into sheep-farms. The immediate consequence showed itself in hordes of beggars, more numerous, more miserable and wretched than ever before seen in England. To get rid of the paupers, Henry VIII. had recourse to his one great specific—he hung them. But even he had to discover that murder was no cure for hunger, and that, though strong enough, if so willed, to kill all the barons, he could not kill all the beggars. Notwithstanding the extreme cruelty of the vagrant laws enacted by Henry's parliaments, pauperism increased so much during this reign as to become a national curse. The accession to power of the duke of Somerset effected a complete change, amounting to a revolution, in the disposition of the government towards the suffering agricultural population. A democrat at heart, and sincere friend of the people, the Protector strove with all his might to assist the hard-working sons of the soil in their distress, making the greatest, though not always the wisest efforts to relieve it. In order to stop the conversion of the arable land into sheep-farms he got a bill through parliament—2 & 3, Edward VI., cap. 36—laying a heavy tax upon sheep, as well as woollen manufactures, every wether being charged with twopence, and every ewe with threepence a year, while all manufactured cloth had to pay an impost of eightpence in the pound of its value. To tax the rich for the benefit of the poor, the Protector further obtained the grant of an impost of a shilling in the pound from all persons worth ten pounds a year, or upwards; of two shillings in the pound from aliens, and of six shillings in the pound from the beneficed clergy. The greater part of the sums thus obtained were spent on improving the condition of the labouring classes, but to very little effect. Somerset soon found that the tax upon live stock and woollen manufactures, so far from diminishing the distress, increased it greatly, so that it had to be repealed after a couple of years, and other remedies be sought for. There were great complaints all over the country of the commons and open places being encroached upon by the new and greedy set of landowners which had arisen since the reign of Henry VII., and to attend to those complaints, the Protector appointed a commission for making inquiry concerning enclosures, ordering moreover that all enclosures recently made should be laid open by a certain day. Hearing that some of the judges were venal, and would not give the poor man justice, he likewise opened a court of request, over which he presided in person, patiently listening to all the grievances brought before him, and settling matters, as far as possible, without protracted lawsuits. This necessarily gained him great popularity, but also many enemies, and in the royal council itself the opinions were very much divided as to the wisdom of these proceedings. By his earnest friend and adherent, Sir William Paget, the Protector was advised "not to meddle with private suits, but remit them to ordinary courses," while, on the other hand, Cranmer approved of the democratic-despotic policy, and the more ardent of the political and religious reformers were enthusiastic about it. In one of his sermons before the young king, Latimer, after telling the story of Cambyses, ruler of Persia, who flayed a dishonest judge alive, and spread his skin over the imperial throne, cried, "I pray God we may once see the sign of the skin in England." The feeling which prompted this outburst was purely and sincerely philanthropic; but Latimer, in his admiration of tyrannic justice, forgot the fact of England being very unlike Persia, and of Englishmen, whether judges or not, having a great dislike to being skinned.

All the efforts of Somerset to ameliorate the condition of the labouring classes had been of very little result hitherto; but the least successful of all was the measure against enclosures, which, so far from satisfying the people for whose benefit it was designed, had the direct effect of leading them into revolt. The commissioners appointed by the Protector to hear and determine all complaints about enclosures and other wrongs to which the labouring classes thought themselves subject, had no sooner started on their errand, when the people rose in many parts of England, and, taking the law into their own hands, began tearing up the hedges, gates, and boundary fences of all obnoxious landlords whose title to their property was held to be doubtful. There seemed to be a general feeling, from one end of the country to the other, that the Protector was Protector of the poor alone, and enemy of all men of property; and inspired by this report, the ignorant mob suddenly forced the bounds of law, and almost simultaneously broke into insurrection in Sussex and in Yorkshire, in Kent, Norfolk, Herts, Essex, Berks, Suffolk, and Gloucestershire. In the summer of 1549, before even Somerset's commissioners had all reached their appointed posts, more than one half of the kingdom was in rebellion. It seemed like a general conspiracy; but events soon proved that there was none whatever, the vague helplessness of the masses who had risen being even more conspicuous than the fierce impulse which had driven them into insurrection at one and the same time. In most places they cried for purely local, and but in few for extensive national reform; hatred of individuals guided some, and of particular laws others: but there were no leaders to be found who could give a clear account of the wishes and objects of the rebellious crowds which had gathered in camps all over England. The Protector seemed as much astounded as any one when receiving the report of this huge confusion which had broken forth so suddenly. "The causes and pretences of these uproars and risings," he wrote, in August, 1549, to the English ambassador in Germany, "are divers and uncertain, and so full of variety in almost every camp, as they call them, that it is hard to say what it is: as is like to be of people without head and rule, who would have they know not what. Some cry, pluck down enclosures and parks; some for their commons; others pretend religion; a number would rule and direct things as gentlemen have done; and, indeed, all have conceived a wonderful hate against gentlemen, and take them all as their enemies." It was, in fact, the germ of a socialist revolution, engendered by the sufferings of thousands of miserable wretches in want of employment and of bread, but who had no leaders to give utterance and direction to their aims. They had vague notions of having a right to live, and to sustain their bodies with food, in return for work; yet how to get work they did not know, and thus all their longings fell into "a wonderful hate against gentlemen." But the hatred, after all, did not assume violent proportions.

The fires of insurrection, which burnt all over the kingdom, rose into large flame only in two parts—the extreme west and the extreme east. In Cornwall and Devonshire, old homes of revolt, the rising began early in June, and soon took a form very different from that in any other part of England. While everywhere else not a single leader came forward to direct the dumb multitude, here the movement at once fell into the hands of some cunning priests, who knew exactly what they wanted, and who, being gifted with the power of speech, found not the least difficulty to guide the excited crowd. The priests appointed one Humphrey Arundel, a man of some property, as chief leader, and by vigorous exertions stirred up the people so well that by the middle of June there were above twelve thousand men gathered round his standard. After committing all sorts of depredations, and plundering the country far and wide, they marched upon Exeter, and on the 2nd of July commenced a regular siege of the city. There was a strong priestly and great were the rejoicings when, after a month's siege, they heard of the tardy march of the royal troops. Humphrey Arundel and his men, made fearless by long negotiations, which they naturally looked upon as weakness on the part of the government, did not wait for the arrival of the troops, but marched forward till meeting them face to face at Tennington bridge, near Crediton. The battle which ensued resulted in the total rout of the insurgents, and Lords Grey and Russell, the commanders of the royal army, drove the flying multitude back to Exeter. Here they were reinforced by an accession of Cornishmen, led by priests, and the fury of these brought about another sanguinary encounter on Cliff Heath. The rebel host stood their ground bravely, for, according to an old historian, "great was the slaughter, and cruel was the fight, and such was the valour and stoutness of these men that the Lord Grey reported himself that he never in all the wars that he had been in did know the like." However, it was impossible for an undisciplined, badly-armed crowd, led by such poor strategicians as priests, to gain any advantage against regular troops, and stoutly as they fought, it served to nothing but the exasperation of faction within the gates, and the rebel leaders were in hopes that they might assist their entrance; however, the majority of the inhabitants would hear of no surrender, and, while guarding themselves both against the internal and external enemies, they hurried off expressmen to London to obtain help from the government. It was impossible for the Protector to decline his assistance; but he at the same time showed himself most unwilling to shed the blood of the poor people, whom he held to be less criminal than misguided. With a singular ignorance of his own age, already displayed in the affairs of Scotland, he firmly believed in the possibility of gaining over large masses of men, even of the most ignorant, by the force of persuasion; and he therefore once more had recourse to proclamations and despatches instead of guns and soldiers. On being asked their objects, the Cornish rebel leaders were bold enough to let the mask fall, and to state their intention of fighting for the old religion. They demanded that mass should be said, as formerly, in Latin; that the reading of the Bible should be prohibited; that monasteries be re-established; that the images of saints be again set up in churches; that Cardinal Pole, foremost champion of the Pope, be appointed a member of the government; and, finally, that the act of the Six Articles, or the "Bloody Statute," should be made once more the law of the land. It was only on learning these extraordinary proposals of the priestly faction in the western counties that the Protector got convinced of the further uselessness of negotiations, and consented to an attack upon the rebels. The latter, in the meanwhile, had brought great sufferings upon the citizens of Exeter by undermining the walls and cutting off the supplies, the soldiers, which in the end got so furious as not to be restrained by the generals. Notwithstanding the strict injunctions of Somerset to be mild and forbearing against the deluded multitude, the greater part of the rebels caught by the troops fell under the sword, while numbers were hung on gibbets along the road. Humphrey Arundel, the nominal chief leader, was carried to London, tried, condemned, and executed; but most of the priests were summarily despatched on the spot. One of the most notable of the clerical commanders, the vicar of St. Thomas, Exeter, had the distinction conferred upon him of being hung on the top of the steeple of his own church, "in his popish apparel, with a holy-water bucket and sprinkle, a sacristy bell, a pair of beads, and such other like popish trash hanging about him." There was evidently no more inclination among the Protestants than among the Roman Catholics to treat each other like Christians.

While the rebellion was raging in the west of England, another of entirely different aspect had commenced in the eastern counties. In both instances, exactly the same class of people, agricultural labourers, paupers, and vagrants, composed the mass of the rioters; but while in the west, owing to the accident of leadership, they set up a cry for popery and the old right to be burnt or hung under the act of the Six Articles, in the east the rebels knew much better what they wanted, and at the outset declared undisguisedly that they were planning a social revolution. The rising commenced on the 6th of July, at Wymondham, in a tumult which ensued after the performance of some itinerant plays, and which ended in the destruction of hedges, gates, and enclosures for several miles around. The disorderly crowd thus collected acquired some coherence a day or two after, through the exertions of one Robert Ket, a tanner of Wymondham, and a man of some property, who, either driven by ambition or that true rebellious instinct which distinguishes demagogues, put himself at the head of the rioters to lead them towards Norwich. Not being able, to march at once into the fortified city, Ket ordered his followers, who soon came to number near ten thousand, to throw up an encampment at Mousehold Heath, a broad eminence overlooking Norwich, and the rich valley of the River Yare. It was not a bad spot for a crowd of half-starving people to dwell on, in the finest season of the year, with fertile lands all around, fields stocked with vegetables, pastures full of sheep, and parks swarming with deer. They helped themselves freely to all these good things, like men with a heavy appetite and a light conscience; and, after a short while, to get the supplies in a business-like manner, without the fear of fast days, Robert Ket organized a regular commissariat, acting under fixed instructions. "We, the king's friends and deputies," ran the warrant supplied to the foragers, "do grant license to provide and bring into the camp at Mousehold all manner of cattle and provision of victuals, in what place soever they may find the same, so that no violence or injury be done to any honest or poor man: commanding all persons, as they tender the king's honour and royal majesty, and the relief of the commonwealth, to be obedient to us the governors, and to those whose names ensue." With such organization, the ten thousand, honest and poor, who had their dwelling on Mousehold Heath, fared exceedingly well, and the report of their good cheer soon had the effect of attracting another ten thousand hungry souls, willing to serve under the standard of the tanner of Wymondham. Somerset was weak enough again to spend his time in writing proclamations, exhorting the people to disperse, and to separate themselves from "one Ket, a tanner, who hath taken upon him our royal power and dignity, and calleth himself master and king of Norfolk and Suffolk." It was not likely that the poor wretches on Mousehold Heath would leave their quarters at the bidding of such despatches, the persuasive effect of which, however great, was entirely destroyed by the fine savour of the roast legs of mutton, and the unlimited supplies of fowl, fish, and game, furnished by the commissariat of King Ket. The latter, moreover, neglected nothing outwardly to give himself the true airs of majesty. He had a sort of throne erected for him under a wide-spreading oak, known as the "Tree of Reformation," where he sat in state, dispensing justice, conferring honours, and receiving ambassadors from all parts of the eastern counties. He even sent for the vicar of Norfolk to say prayers in the camp, and to exhort his men to lead a God-fearing life, which had such an effect upon public opinion that many of the middle classes began to sympathise with the rioters. Pious landowners even forgot the stolen deer in the feeling, that they were being prayed for; thinking, with the historian Fuller, the scamps could not be so very bad, "so religiously rebellious were they."

weeks, in the course of which the tanner of Wymondham actually defeated a detachment of royal troops, took possession of Norwich, and laid siege to Yarmouth. Remarkable order was kept all the while, and, except the forcible taking of food and provisions, no outrages of any moment were committed. So liberal were the insurgents in their views, that they allowed not only all sorts of persons to come amongst them, but even to preach against them in their very midst, to such extent that after a while the "Tree of Reformation," became a regular pulpit, its gigantic branches being admirably adopted for the purpose. But the arguments of the preachers, all of whom tried to persuade the mob to seek their homes and petition the government for the redress of any grievances under which they were labouring, took no effect, there being a strong and not altogether unnatural belief among the multitude that they were in far better position for negotiations while armed and encamped than while dispersed among their homes—if possessed of such. Thus even the sending of a royal herald, to which the Protector condescended on the petition of some of the leading citizens of Norwich, proved fruitless. The messenger made his appearance in great state on Mousehold Heath, and read his proclamation, offering full pardon to all offenders and strict investigation of their complaints, without the slightest interference; but only a very small number declared themselves ready to submit to King Edward, and the overwhelming majority remained faithful to King Ket. The Protector now could hesitate no longer in forcibly restoring peace, and a troop of fifteen hundred horse, under the marquis of Northampton, was despatched for the purpose. Before they reached Norwich, the rebels had taken possession of the city, and though the royal troops succeeded in gaining an entrance, they were attacked the next day and driven back in disgraceful rout, with the loss of several of their chief officers. The state of affairs now was so serious that the Protector himself began preparations to take the field; but, before doing so, ordered the earl of Warwick, who was busy in the northern counties in enlisting troops for a new campaign against Scotland, to make an effort for dispersing the rebels, if possible without bloodshed. Warwick, at the head of some five thousand men, succeeded, in the middle of August, in forcing his way into Norwich, from whence he despatched Norroy king-at-arms with a final summons to the rioters to lay down their arms and accept a full pardon. The herald brought back a blank refusal, and nothing remained now for the earl but to take the offensive. His first efforts were by no means successful, owing, probably, to strong sympathy between his own troops and the enemy, and it was not till the 26th of August, on receiving a reinforcement of fourteen hundred Flemish lances, that he was enabled to offer a pitched battle to the insurgents. The struggle took place in the valley of Dussindale, at the foot of Mousehold Heath, and was soon decided by the flight of the rebels, who turned in wild confusion before the steady fire of the foreign matchlocks, against which their pikes and pitchforks were sadly useless. The victory was disgraced by great cruelties committed upon the flying men, and numerous executions, only stopped at last by a general pardon issued by the Protector. Ket, the leader of the rebellion, was hung in chains against the tower of Norwich castle, and there were gibbets planted along the chief roads of the county. But although thousands were sabred down, shot, and hung, the terrified landlords of the eastern counties, bewailing the loss of their sheep, kept clamouring for more blood, so as to disgust even Warwick, not otherwise inclined to undue tenderness. "Is there no place for pardon," he replied to the panic-stricken squires, who had come forth from their hiding-places to rush upon the sheep-stealers; "Is there no place for pardon among ye: so tell what shall we do? Shall we hold the plough ourselves, play the carters, and labour the ground with our own hands?" It was strange for a general to remind the lords of the soil that, with all their hatred of poor flesh and blood, they wanted "hands."

The rebellion had the effect of creating great political dissatisfaction among the upper, and chiefly the land-owning classes. Though unaccompanied by any excesses, and easily suppressed, the squires and all the new nobility, who had got their estates from the wreck of ancient civil and ecclesiastical society effected by the Tudor kings, stood aghast at the spectacle of the gigantic multitude which had arisen in their sight. The new nobles of the purse had made no scruple to possess themselves of the old baronial halls, and to accept, on cheap terms, the vast domains of the church; but the very fact that their property was new, and not unfrequently ill-gotten, made them dread any new claimants; even if they wanted nothing else but the right to live on the land on which they were born, and to earn their subsistence in the sweat of their brow. This, in reality, was the only demand of the rebels, stripped of all the boisterous nonsense of clerical and other leaders whom chance had placed at the head of the movement both in the eastern and western counties. But poor laws were not yet thought of in England; there was no right to live, but only a right to starve, with the alternative of being imprisoned for begging and hung for stealing. There was not a man in high position, except the Protector, capable of sympathy with the great dumb mass of agricultural serfs, whose brawny arms and sinews represented the strength and glory of the nation, more precious than all its wealth of gold, silver, and merchandize, yet less valued than the cattle in the field. Somerset really and truly sympathised with the suffering people; but, high as was his position and great his power, even he was not able to do much towards alleviating their sufferings, being opposed in his efforts by every man in power and even his most intimate friends. All, without exception, blamed him for taking the part of the poor against the rich, of the oppressed against the oppressors; and, seeing that he continued in his course without taking heed, they broke out in open resistance against his authority. It manifested itself, immediately after the suppression of the Norfolk rebellion, in a sudden and violent conspiracy. The principal leader of it was the earl of Warwick, whose victory over the insurgent host at Dussindale, and indiscriminate slaughter afterwards, had given great satisfaction to all the enemies of the Protector. The earl of Warwick was the son of the rapacious Dudley, executed for gross extortion early in the reign of Henry VIII., together with Empson. Finding him a shrewd, sharp fellow, in many respects like his father, and hopefully obsequious and unprincipled, Henry kept young Dudley near his person, made him into a Viscount Lisle after a while, used him for various purposes, and in his will nominated him one of his executors. Always ready to remain at the top, whatever might happen, the viscount no sooner saw the good arrangements which Somerset and Cranmer had made for seizing the power, than he attached himself warmly to them, and in recompense was invested with the illustrious title of earl of Warwick. A man of undoubted talent, though utterly unscrupulous, the new earl stuck to the Protector as long as he saw his fortunes in the ascendant; but as soon as he perceived the growing disfavour with which Somerset was regarded by the aristocracy, he immediately wheeled round, placing himself at the head of the opposition for further advancement. That the bulk of the people were as yet far too ignorant, as well as disorganized, to serve the purposes of political ambition, could not for a moment escape the notice of Warwick; and his shrewd calculation was that his friend the Protector would be entirely unable to withstand any decided attack of the upper classes. To secure the success of his scheme still more, Warwick sought allies among the great Roman Catholic party, whose hatred of Somerset was almost greater than that of the democracy-fearing landowners. The chief leader of this party, the ex-chancellor Wriothesley, created earl of Southampton by the Protector, and, notwithstanding his dangerous opposition, even reinstated by him in his place in the privy council, eagerly joined the conspiracy, on the promise that a check was to be applied to the Protestant movement. All these arrangements having been quietly entered into, Warwick and his friends assembled together in London towards the end of September, a month after the battle of Dussindale, to dispose of the supreme power of the English realm.

The greatest success attended the movements of the conspirators. Finding the city authorities in their favour, they openly paraded the streets with a great array of armed retainers, dressed up showily, with long swords and full pockets, so as to be able both to bribe the selfish and to frighten the timid. After obtaining entrance, by a stratagem, into the Tower, and removing the lieutenant, Warwick found himself master of the capital without striking a stroke, and nothing else remained to be done but to obtain possession of the young king to complete the revolution. There was nothing in the character of Edward VI. to offer the slightest obstacle to the success of the scheme. He had been well drilled in the dry formulas of Protestantism, and was thus far attached to the policy of Somerset and Cranmer; but to a keen observer like Warwick the great fact had long been visible that he was, on the whole, a boy of great callousness of heart, not improved by scholastic cramming. Young as he was, he kept a journal of the chief events of the day, noting down in succession, with as much unconcern as his royal father might have exhibited, all that was passing before his eye, murders and mummeries, state assemblies, street riots, and executions. That there would not be much difficulty in separating this young king from his uncle, who loved him much, but for this very reason did not pander to his vanity, nor was unnecessarily compliant to his whims, the earl of Warwick knew well enough, and therefore made little ceremony, after having gained his footing in London, in demanding his custody. The Protector, who was staying with Edward at Hampton Court, and only had become aware of the movements of his enemies at the last moment, replied to the demand by a royal proclamation, issued on the 1st of October, requiring all subjects to meet under the king's standard, "in defensible array, with harness and weapons, to defend his most royal person, and his entirely beloved uncle, the Lord Protector, against whom certain persons have attempted a dangerous sympathy." The proclamation had very little effect, the poorer classes, upon whom alone Somerset was able to rely, having no "harness and weapons," and the arms-bearing property-possessing nobles and citizens being ranged, almost undivided, against the democratic chief of the state. He had, in this hour of need, no armed force to rely on. Of two bodies of troops, raised for the suppression of popular tumults, and partly for a new attack on the French in Scotland, the principal one, in the eastern counties, was under the command of Warwick, and, after the victory of Dussindale, entirely devoted to their leader, while the other, which had relieved Exeter, was guided by Lord Russell, whom to gain over had been one of the first endeavours of the conspirators. Of this, too, the Protector was unaware, for after issuing his proclamation, he sent a despatch to Russell, whom he believed his true friend, requesting him to hasten with the army under his command "to the defence of the king's majesty." The reply he received at last opened his eyes to the greatness of the danger which had risen up before him. Lord Russell coolly informed the head of the government that he had "received advertisement from the lords," that is, the conspirators under Warwick, "that no hurt or displeasure is meant towards the king's majesty, and that it doth plainly appear that they are his highness's most true and loving subjects." A final sentence revealed the great cause at the bottom of the conspiracy. "Your grace's proclamation," exclaimed Lord Russell, "and billets sent abroad for the raising of the commons we dislike very much." These "billets for the raising of the commons" constituted the last and most daring effort to prolong the reign of the democratic Protector.

"Good people," ran the billets, mysteriously distributed all over England, "in the name of God and King Edward, let us rise with all our power to defend him and the Lord Protector against certain lords and gentlemen and chief masters, which would depose the Lord Protector, and so endanger the king's royal person, because we the poor commons, being injured by the extortion of gentlemen, had our pardon this year by the mercy of the king and the goodness of the Lord Protector, for whom let us fight, for he loveth all just and true gentlemen which do no extortion, and also the poor commonalty of England.

God save the king and the Lord Protector, and all true lords and gentlemen, and us the poor commonalty!" Rude as it was, this appeal to the "poor commonalty," was not without its effect, so as even to alarm Warwick and his friends. They sent in haste for Russell to come with his troops to London; and he, setting out instantly, reported that "the countries were everywhere in a roar that no man wist what to do." However, the dangers on this side were not great, for Somerset, with all his love for the poor, was not the man to head a popular insurrection. Not deeming himself and his royal charge safe at Hampton Court, he removed, in the night from the 6th to the 7th of October, to Windsor, attended by about five hundred armed men, most of them his own and the king's servants. Only two of his friends and associates in power had the courage to follow him to Windsor, namely Cranmer and Sir William Paget. Seeing the difficulty of maintaining himself under these circumstances, and wishing, above all, to avoid bloodshed, the Protector now sent an envoy to London to treat with the conspirators, telling them, in a letter, "Ye shall find us agreeable to any reasonable conditions that you may require, for we do esteem the king and the wealth and tranquillity of this realm more than all other worldly things, yea, than our own life." The envoy to whom Somerset intrusted the negotiation, Sir Philip Hoby, like many other friends, played him false, and instead of working for his interest, allowed himself to be employed by Warwick as the bearer of secret messages to the young king, as well as to Cranmer, both being urged to detach themselves from the interest of the falling man. He was not quite on the ground yet, and might have easily risen to his full height again, had he been as daring and as unscrupulous as his antagonists. While negotiating with them, there came news that ten thousand men had risen in Wilts and Hampshire, and were in full march towards Windsor, and that twenty thousand more of the "poor commons" were assembling in Kent, Sussex, and Surrey. But the Protector by this time had relinquished all notions of resistance, humiliating himself so far as to send an affectionate letter to Warwick, in which he brought forward their old friendship and the services he had rendered him as a plea for forbearance and mercy. To approach a man of Warwick's stamp with such sentimentalities was singularly childlike, but also singularly useless.

The crisis came at last, sadder to the Protector than he could have possibly expected. The secret messages of the traitor, Sir William Hoby, had the intended effect, and the last remaining of Somerset's friends, Cranmer and Sir William Paget, turned against him. On their persuasion, the conspiring lords, twenty-two in number, were invited by royal warrant to repair to Windsor Castle, the Protector's intention being to come to an agreement with them, but theirs to make him a prisoner. Warwick and his co-conspirators, accompanied by a large body of troops, arrived on the 12th of October, and, before twenty-four hours were gone, the Protector found himself a captive. Both Cranmer and Paget played an ignoble part in the arrest of Somerset, to which they actively contributed, taking credit for the same in a communication to the ruling powers. "Because," they reported, "his chan-ber was hard adjoining to the king's bed-chamber, he is removed to the tower, which is called the lieutenant's, which is the high tower next adjoining to the gate of the middle ward: a very high tower, and a strong and good watch shall be had about the same." The day after his arrest, the Protector was carried off to London, while the young king was led back to Hampton Court, whose Warwick intended taking up his quarters. Somerset had to enter the city in the midst of soldiers, like a prisoner captured on the battle-field, but with precautions which plainly showed the fear of the captors of a rescue. All the leading men of London came forward to keep the poor people in check; "the lord mayor," according to Holinshed, "Sir Ralph Warren, Sir John Gresham, master recorder, Sir William Locke, and both the sheriffs and other knights, sitting on their horses against Soper Lane, with all the officers with halberds, and from Holborn Bridge to the Tower, certain aldermen or their deputies, on horseback in every street, with a number of householders standing with bills as he [Somerset] passed." The householders and their bills effectually kept the houseless in the background; but they were unable to prevent the groans and murmuring of the people, who loudly declared themselves in favour of the prisoner, and against his enemies. However, no rescue was attempted, and the Protector was safely lodged within the dark walls of the Tower.

The earl of Warwick and his friends were now masters of the government and of the king, and all made anxious preparations to share the flow of wealth, honours, and dignities among them. Great in his hopes, above the rest, was the earl of Southampton, who, next to Warwick, had taken the lead in the conspiracy, with the bulk of the still powerful Roman Catholic party at his back. To become once more lord-chancellor and chief of the cabinet was the least he reckoned upon, and he was not without quiet expectations of filling Somerset's place, keeping Warwick at his feet, and restoring England to the Pope and the Pope to England. But the son of Dudley was more than a match for the wily ex-chancellor, who, with zeal enough to turn the rack upon women, lacked discretion in the management of his affairs. Warwick's keen eyes had watched the movements of the Roman Catholics, and, justly fearing that unless stopped in time they might become too strong for him, had made up his mind to throw them overboard at the earliest possible opportunity. The gates of the Tower closed upon Somerset on the 13th of October; on the same day, the letters patent for the custody of the king's person and the protectorship were revoked, and Warwick took possession of the royal power without further ceremony. All the more important places of the government fell to the lot of Warwick's friends, but the earl of Southampton got nothing. Vowing vengeance, he retired from court, and began plotting; but had not plotted long before he died—of vexation, as stated by some, or, more probably, as asserted by others, of vexation grimly assisted by poison. The Roman Catholic party, so far from reaping any benefit from the change of government for which they had desperately worked, soon found the tide turning against them more strongly than ever. Warwick was said to be popish at heart; yet he gave no proof of it when arrived at power, but, on the contrary, showed himself more Protestant than even Somerset. A man of no convictions whatever, and with no other guide of his actions but the greed of ambition, he could not fail perceiving that the zealous advocacy of Protestantism was a far safer mode of retaining the supreme power which he had grasped than the leadership of the opposite party. He was too far-sighted not to be aware that the great bulk of the nation was Protestant at heart, and he knew, moreover, that the young king was too deeply grounded in the new doctrines of religion, and had too much of the obstinacy of his father to leave the slightest probability of his ever changing his Lutheran principles. To encourage these now became his great object, carried out with much wisdom and still more energy.

The first measure of the new government was to call together a parliament, for the double purpose of trying the Protector and of passing various important measures of civil and ecclesiastical reform. It was no part of Warwick's policy to be hard upon his predecessor in power, as long as there were hopes of making him useful in the prosecution of his ambitious schemes, and his chief object for the moment consisted in humiliating him sufficiently to extinguish further rivalry. The faithful lords and commons met on the 4th of November, three weeks after the fall of the Protector, and, obedient as ever, at once passed a long bill of pains and penalties against the prisoner in the Tower. After this preliminary ceremony, Warwick sent a message to his old friend and patron, asking him to choose between the alternative of declaring himself innocent of the charges brought against him and having his head cut off, and that of declaring himself guilty and being released, as well as re-instated in a position near the throne. Somerset was not sufficiently fanatic to covet martyrdom for martyrdom's sake, and at once promised to do any reasonable thing to get again into the open air. This having been agreed upon, he was led, on the 13th of December, before the king and privy council, was made to fall on his knees, to declare himself a very great sinner, and to promise repentance and melioration. After this he was taken back to the Tower, something more remaining to be done. Somerset had a large fortune, and Warwick thought it would be fair that he should have a part of it, and accordingly parliament was once more set to work in its judicial capacity. The obsequious members of both houses quickly passed a bill, by which the whole of the ex-Protector's personal property was declared forfeited to the crown, and he was adjudged, besides, to pay the large sum of ten thousand pounds as a fine, on retaining his estates. Against the latter part of the judgment Somerset remonstrated, but with the only effect of being again threatened with the axe, which naturally made him quiet. On the 6th of February, he was at last released from confinement, and four days after a royal pardon, signed by his nephew, was placed in his hands. Warwick, by this time, had come to the conclusion that his great antagonist was sufficiently humbled, and fit to become a helpless tool.

There were indications of restless disquiet among the labouring population throughout the kingdom, and reasons to fear a general insurrection. To lay the threatening storm, Parliament passed a number of laws by which heavy penalties were inflicted upon all who should disturb the peace. It was made high treason for more than twelve persons to meet together for a common purpose, and to refuse dispersing upon proclamation of the magistrates, and it was made felony to break down fences or enclosures, or to destroy deer, or to damage dwellings. Even those who refused to assist the constituted authorities in their action against rioters were made liable to severe penalties—farmers to forfeit their leases, and copyholders their lands and houses; and any fifty persons meeting with the object of committing unlawful acts were to be held traitors. The severity of these statutes was but too likely to defeat the very object for which they had been enacted, and it was the knowledge of this, and of the growing animosity of the Roman Catholic party, which made Warwick anxious to enlist the popularity of Somerset in his service. The partisans of the old faith, indeed, had reason to be dissatisfied with the new government which they had helped to construct, for its first acts proclaimed a more severe warfare upon them than had ever yet been waged. By a new statute, passed during the imprisonment of Somerset, the whole of the images still remaining in the churches were ordered to be removed or destroyed, and all missals to be delivered up, while a body of thirty-two commissioners, presided over by Cranmer, was appointed to compile a new code of ecclesiastical laws. Several bishops, who stood out in opposition against these reforms, among them the occupants of the sees of Chichester, Durham, and Worcester, were committed to prison and deprived of their mitres, as a proof that the new rulers were thoroughly in earnest. But Warwick, although thus throwing the gauntlet to the party which had counted him as theirs, was not inclined to underrate the animosity arising therefrom, and, to strengthen his hands, resolved to call Somerset's influence to his aid. Towards the end of March, 1550, little more than a month after his release from the Tower, Somerset was invited to appear again at court, and on the 10th of April he was re-appointed to a seat at the privy council board, and his fine remitted. To gain him over entirely, Warwick next arranged a marriage between his eldest son, Viscount Lisle, and one of the daughters of Somerset, which was celebrated with great pomp, in the presence of the king, at Richmond, on the 3rd of June. The day after, there was another nuptial ceremony, graced by the royal presence, Warwick's third son, Sir Robert Dudley—better known, subsequently, as earl of Leicester—espousing Amy, the daughter of Sir John Robsart. The festivities attendant upon these joyful events extended over more than a week, and included various peculiar aristocratic amusements, such as foot-races between noblemen, and goose hunting. "There were," King Edward gravely entered in his journal, "certain gentlemen that did strive who should first take away a goose's head which was hanged alive on two cross posts."

England's influence abroad was very much weakened by the internal troubles of the kingdom. The army collected for driving the French from Scotland having been diverted from its purpose in the suppression of the Norfolk rebellion, and subsequent assistance given to the ambitious designs of Warwick, the preparations for invasion were given up altogether, and the English garrison at Haddington, maintained all along at a great sacrifice of blood and treasure, received orders to return home. To leave Scotland alone was decidedly the wisest plan, since there were fair prospects that the people themselves would drive away their French friends and masters, utterly disgusted as they had become with their presence. Even the queen dowager was uttering loud complaints against the insolence of her own countrymen, and although, through the effect of her remonstrances, General D'Esse had to give up his command to Marshal Ternes, affairs remained in nearly the same state, the country being treated in most respects as a dependency of France. His successes here emboldened Henri II. to assail the power of England in another direction, and, without declaring war, he suddenly pounced upon Boulogne, trying to take the city by surprise. He was unsuccessful in this attempt; but he drove the English garrisons from Ambleuse, Selaques, and other small fortresses near the coast, and then invested Boulogne by land and sea. Seeing that, in the existing state of weakness of the government, there was little chance of raising the siege, Warwick sent commissioners to the French king, with absolute power to treat for the cession of the place, on the basis of the treaty concluded between Henry VIII. and Francis I. The chief stipulation of this treaty was the payment of the sum of two millions of crowns, arrears of tribute due from the rulers of France to the kings of England, as a security for which Boulogne was supposed to be held. Warwick's commissioners, led by his friend Lord Russell, now created earl of Bedford, tried hard to obtain the signature of Henri II. to the fulfilment of this agreement, but found him immovable. As fully aware as Warwick himself of the impotency of the English government, he proudly declared that he did not acknowledge owing tribute to any nation upon earth, and that if Boulogne was not given up to him he would simply take it. But Bedford was persevering, and at length the French king allowed himself to be persuaded that it would be cheapest for him to pay a sum down to regain his city, instead of risking new lives in the attack upon it. Henri could not help seeing the force of these arguments, and thereupon agreed to give four hundred thousand crowns for the immediate restitution of Boulogne, one half at once, and the other half at the end of five months. The treaty of peace and amity on these conditions was signed on the 24th of March, 1550, and by an important stipulation attached to it, the English government bound itself to respect the independence of Scotland, or, in other words, to leave the kingdom in the possession of France. There was, moreover, a secret agreement, by the terms of which a marriage was arranged to take place between King Edward and Princess Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Henri II. The French monarch altogether had reason to believe that his four hundred thousand crowns were not ill spent.

The French treaty did not add to the popularity of Warwick, slight as it was before, and a strong opposition against him was manifested all over the country. There were many who demanded the re-installment of Somerset in the protectorship, and though the latter did nothing to encourage this movement, it was not the less alarming to the party in power. Warwick's hope of making a tool of his great rival gradually vanished in the course of the year 1550, and he came to perceive that there was too much influence left to Somerset to allow subordination. There were alternate quarrels and reconciliations; violent words, followed by festive banquets and expressions of everlasting friendship. Even the servants of the rival statesmen were affected by the jealousies of their masters, and open battles took place between them in the streets, with this significant ending, however, that while Warwick's retainers always went scot-free, Somerset's men were put into prison at every possible opportunity. It was not difficult to foresee that the silent struggle between the two great rivals would end in the same way. Both were ambitious; but the one being kind-hearted and somewhat timid, and the other bold and utterly unscrupulous in his ambition, the result could scarcely be doubtful. However, Warwick hesitated to strike for some time. He felt that his own footing at the giddy height of supreme power was by no means secure, and that one false step might prove his destruction; but while waiting he did not cease watching, keeping a steady eye upon all his supposed or real enemies. Somerset was surrounded and followed wherever he went by a host of spies, who reported the most insignificant of his actions, and every word that went from his lips. The ex-protector was anything but a cautious man, and often said things which, when reported and properly magnified by the paid tale-bearers, sounded very unpleasant in the ears of his successor, thus infinitely aggravating the mutual distrust. But there was one cause, stronger than all the others, which finally brought matters to a crisis. Somerset had long entertained a plan for drawing the relationship between himself and the young king stronger, by a marriage of the latter with one of his daughters, and even now that he had fallen from his high position he did not cease working in the execution of the scheme. It was naturally opposed by Warwick, who, to counteract the efforts of his rival, resolved to marry Edward to a daughter of the king of France, taking the first steps to this effect in the negotiations about Boulogne. Henri II. showed himself very anxious for the alliance, and in May, 1551, a splendid embassy, under the marquis of Northampton, was sent to Paris to invest the king with the order of the Garter, and to settle the preliminaries of the matrimonial union. The noble marquis was instructed to ask for a dowry of two millions of crowns for the princess, but this being refused, he obligingly accepted just one tenth part of it, with the proviso that the future queen of England, as yet in pinafores, should be sent across the channel "at her father's charge, three months before she was twelve, sufficiently jewelled and stuffed." This settled, another treaty of eternal peace and friendship between France and England was sworn to by the negotiators, and Henri II. despatched one of his great generals, the famous Marshal

St. André, to take to his expected son-in-law the order of St. Michael, in return for that of the Garter. Edward was much pleased with the decoration, and duly entered in his journal that he had received the order of Mon-seigneur, or My-lord Michael.

When Marshal St. André arrived in England, at the beginning of July, the "sweating sickness" had just broken out, and was making great havoc, to the intense consternation of the people. There was a belief spread far and wide that the plague was a punishment of heaven for the sins of the people, and that it attacked no other persons but natives of England. "The disease," according to a historian of the time, "followed Englishmen, and none other nations; only our Englishmen were sick thereof, and none other persons; the consideration of which thing made the nation much afraid thereof, who for the time began to repent and give alms, and to remember God, from whom that plague might well seem to be sent among us. But as the disease in time ceased, so our devotion decayed." One of the king's grooms, and a gentleman of the bed-chamber, having been carried off by the "sweating sickness," Edward was taken from Westminster Palace to Hampton Court, where the French ambassador was introduced into the royal presence, and afterwards entertained by a series of splendid fêtes. In the course of these, Somerset made himself rather conspicuous by constant attendance upon the young king, so much so that Warwick got alarmed, and hurried on his preparations for getting rid of his great rival. As a preliminary to this end he appointed himself, in September, Warden of the Scottish Marches, a place previously held by the marquis of Dorset, which placed at his disposal the most warlike portion of the country, and made him almost sole dictator of England. To a man more watchful of his own security than Somerset, this nomination, unexpected as it was, would have caused profound mistrust, but he seemed to feel none, and regularly took his seat in the privy council, placing himself at the free disposal of his enemies. Nor did he appear to lose his confidence when, a week after, it was announced that Warwick was to be raised to the dignity of duke of Northumberland, with grant of all the estates of this powerful family, forfeited by the attainder of the rightful heir. The young king himself communicated to the council, on the 4th of October, the news of this extraordinary elevation, which was made public on the 11th of the same month. Still Somerset, fearing nothing, and evidently ignorant of all the designs against him, made his regular appearance at the council table till the afternoon of the 16th of October, when he was suddenly arrested by Warwick's guards, and carried off to the Tower. A number of Somerset's personal friends were seized at the same moment, the young king, looking on very composedly at his uncle's and their arrest, and entering short notes of the matter in his journal. "This morning," Edward entered, under October 16th, "none was at Westminster of the conspirators. The first was the Duke [of Somerset] who came later than he was wont of himself; after dinner he was apprehended: Sir Thomas Palmer, on the terrace walking there; Hammond, passing by Mr. Vice-chamberlain's door, was called in by John Piers to make a match at shooting, and so taken. Newdigate was called for as from my lord his master, and taken. Likewise were John Seymour and Davy Seymour. Arundel also was taken, and the Lord Grey, coming out of the country." Thus, with one swoop, Warwick captured all whom he suspected were friendly to his rival, informing the young king that they were "conspirators." The notable sentence in Edward's journal about Newdigate, one of Somerset's retainers, being "called for as from my lord his master," clearly showed the conspiracy, if any, to be on the other side.

The charge upon which Somerset was arrested was that of having plotted with his friends, the earl of Arundel, Lord Grey, and others, to seize and execute Warwick, and stir up civil war in the northern counties. Not a tittle of reliable evidence was brought forward to substantiate this accusation, which rested chiefly, if not solely upon the deposition of the Sir Thomas Palmer, mentioned in Edward's journal as walking on the terrace during Somerset's arrest, doubtless to watch him. Palmer, an unscrupulous rogue and profligate, ready to lend himself to any crime for a substantial reward, swore that as far back as the month of April, Somerset had entered upon arrangements for overthrowing the existing government, and securing to himself once more the custody of the king and chief direction of affairs. The trial was a mere farce of justice. Warwick, acting the part of prosecutor as well as judge, went, with twenty-six of his adherents and dependents, including the marquis of Northampton, the earls of Derby and of Bedford, to Westminster Hall, on the 1st of December, and, sitting down under the cloth of estate, had Somerset brought up from the Tower. The depositions of Palmer and several other obscure individuals were read; but, though Somerset asked earnestly to meet them face to face, none of the witnesses were brought forward, and there was nothing for the prisoner but to give a general denial to the accusations of his enemies. So weak was the evidence, that the twenty-seven judges, creatures as they were of Warwick, found themselves unable to make out a case of treason against Somerset; however, they declared him guilty of the minor charge of felony, which was sufficient so far, as it was followed by the sentence that he should be hung. While these proceedings were going on, an immense crowd was waiting outside Westminster Hall, exhibiting their affection for "the good duke," as Somerset was generally called, in the most explicit manner. It was the custom at the time for condemned criminals who had been found guilty of treason to have the axe carried before them on their way back to prison, and when Somerset, after the trial, appeared without the axe, the crowd, thinking he had been acquitted, set up such a tremendous shout of joy that it was heard for more than a mile, beyond Charing Cross, and as far as Long Acre. A few minutes served to explain the mistake, and then there was deep and sorrowful silence among the vast multitude, not a few giving vent to their grief in tears. There still remained a hope with many that the young king would pardon his uncle; but those who expected it knew very little of the real character of the son of Henry VIII.

According to the entries in his own journal, Edward did not interfere to save Somerset, when lying in prison awaiting execution, making it appear that he rather wished his death, as he had openly declared some time before. But, wishing it or not, the young king did not express the least wish to save the life of one who, besides being his uncle, had been for years his intimate friend, guide, and companion. Edward, now past thirteen, began to feel pleasure in various kinds of amusements, and Warwick, having time to attend upon him after the condemnation of his rival, the Christmas of 1551 and new year of 1552 were spent in shows and theatricals, with boundless gaiety. The masqueradings were prolonged till the latter part of January, when, as quaintly recorded by John Stow, the antiquarian, "Christmas being thus passed, and spent with much mirth and pastime, it was thought now good to proceed to the execution of the judgment given against the duke of Somerset." King Edward entered the murder of his uncle thus drily in his journal: "January 22nd. The duke of Somerset had his head cut off on Tower Hill between eight and nine o'clock in the morning." The next entry was: "Sir W. Pickering delivered a token to the Lady Elizabeth—a fair diamond."

The great love, wonderfully touching in its intensity, shown by the people to Somerset, was once more manifested on the day of his execution. Warwick, fearing a riot, and perhaps a rescue, had issued strict orders that no persons dwelling in the city should leave their houses before ten o'clock; but, notwithstanding this prohibition, and unmindful of the consequences, an immense multitude assembled around the scaffold, to have a last look at the "good duke," and to brighten his dying moments with their expressions of affection. Somerset met his fate with extraordinary courage, gentleness, and serenity. Before laying his head on the block, he made a calm speech to the crowd, asserting his innocence; and while thus engaged an affecting incident occurred, showing that, to the very last, the people expected that the young king would save his great and good uncle from violent death. A horseman came galloping up in hot haste to the scaffold, and the multitude had no sooner espied him, when they cried, with one voice, "A pardon! A pardon!" tossing their caps and cloaks in the air. But Somerset at once perceived their error, and, a faint smile spreading over his pale features, he quietly disabused his friends. In the words of an eye-witness, "the good duke all this while stayed, and with his cap in his hand waved the people to come together, saying these words to their words of pardon: 'There is no such thing, good people, there is no such thing; it is the ordinance of God thus for to die, wherewith we must be content, and I pray you now let us pray together for the king's majesty, to whom I have always been a faithful, true, and most loving subject. At which words the people answered, 'Yea, yea, yea,' and some said, 'It is found now too true.'" John Fox, the martyrologist, furnished a pathetic description of the last moments of the "good duke," gathered from the lips of a nobleman who stood near the executioner on the scaffold. After Somerset had spoken to the people, the account says, "turning himself again about like a meek lamb, he kneeled down upon his knees, and Dr. Coxe, who was there present to counsel and advise him, delivered a certain scroll into his hand, wherein was contained a brief confession unto God; which being read, he stood up again on his feet without any trouble of mind, as it appeared, and first bade the sheriffs farewell, then the Lieutenant of the Tower and others, taking them all by the hand that were on the scaffold with him. Then he gave the hangman certain money; which done, he put off his gown, and, kneeling down again in the straw, untied his shirt strings; and after that, the hangman coming unto him, turned down his collar round about his neck, and all other things which did let or hinder. Then lifting up his eyes to heaven, where his only hope remained, and covering his face with his handkerchief, he laid himself down along, showing no manner or token of trouble or fear; neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were covered there began to appear a red colour in the midst of his cheeks. But this most meek and gentle duke, lying along, and waiting for the stroke, because his doublet covered his neck, he was commanded to rise up and put it off; and then laying himself down again upon the block, and calling thrice upon the name of Jesus, saying, 'Lord Jesus, save me!' as he was the third time repeating the same, even as the name of Jesus was in uttering, in a moment he was bereft of life, and slept in the Lord Jesus."

The execution of Somerset was not only a great crime, but a great political blunder. By it Warwick, or, as he was now generally called, the duke of Northumberland, deprived himself of the support of that great Protestant party on which, after thwarting the Roman Catholics, his power had mainly come to rest, and he created to himself, besides, such a mass of implacable hatred among the bulk of the population as all his astuteness, his governing talent, and his indomitable energy could not overcome. The earliest symptoms of the popular feeling towards Northumberland became visible in the attitude of the House of Commons. Parliament met the day after the murder of Somerset; and it had scarcely sat a week before it was seen that the spirit agitating the national mind influenced even its members, accustomed though they were to act as humble servants of any man, or knot of men, that had succeeded in grasping the supreme power. Almost for the first time in the course of half a century, the House of Commons now dared to enter into opposition, evidently encouraged by the extreme unpopularity of Northumberland, and quite regardless of the fact that the absolute power of the crown was resting in his iron hand as unlimited and quite as firmly as it had been in that of Henry VIII. Northumberland had acquired by various means, the nature of which may be surmised, an unlimited ascendancy over the young king; and in his name exercised the most undisguised despotism. It was, therefore, with as much surprise as anger that he saw the opposition of the despised House of Commons, which, to the living generation of Englishmen, was little else but a court for the registry of royal decrees. The opposition manifested itself in various ways, all more or less connected with the memory of Somerset. A bill brought into parliament for attainting Tunstall, bishop of Durham, on the charge of having assisted the

the late ex-Protector in a pretended attempt to raise an insurrection, was thrown out with little ceremony; and another bill for repealing an act of the preceding reign, by which the estates of Somerset were entailed upon his son, met with the same fate, notwithstanding that the unusual step had been taken of affixing the royal signature to the paper demanding the repeal. To leave still less doubt of the extreme ill feeling directed against Northumberland personally, the House of Commons entirely altered the provisions of a new statute of treason which had passed the lords, adding a clause to the effect that persons accused of treason should always be confronted with their witnesses. In the course of discussion upon this subject, there were voices bold enough to hint, or more than hint, that Somerset had not met with a fair trial, but fallen a victim to unprincipled ambition. This was more than Northumberland could bear to hear, and to rid himself of his new foes, he quickly dissolved parliament, before it had sat three months, and even before it had granted the usual supplies. The dictator clearly was not unmindful of the dark clouds which were gathering on the horizon, but he firmly believed in his strength to master the storm.

Before summoning another parliament, Northumberland launched into a career of the most high-handed despotism. To his already immense possessions in the northern and midland counties, he kept constantly adding new estates, seizing, whenever opportunity offered, and under the most frivolous pretences, the properties of great and little landowners. Commissions were likewise issued for the confiscation of all the remaining gold and silver plate and ornaments of the churches throughout the kingdom, with the single exception of chalices in use; and the whole proceeds of this vast robbery Northumberland appropriated to himself. In order to satisfy a personal spite, as well as to enrich himself still further, he had the bishop of Durham, whom parliament refused to attain, tried before a special court, composed of his own creatures; and the prelate having been convicted, as a matter of course, he sequestrated the revenues of the see, the richest in England, and added its vast domains to his own estates. With all the wealth and personal power thus obtained, he purchased as many adherents, nobles in preference, as he could lay hand on. His sons, brothers, and other relatives already filled the highest positions near the throne, and to extend his family influence still further, he elaborated a scheme of far-reaching matrimonial alliances, calculated to connect the new house of Dudley with some of the noblest blood in the land. The principal and most important of these matrimonial unions contemplated by him was that of his fourth and only natural son, Lord Guildford Dudley, to Lady Jane Grey, eldest daughter of the duke of Suffolk, and direct descendant of Princess Mary younger sister of Henry VIII. The object of Northumberland in preparing this marriage was peculiarly grand and simple, being nothing less than to transfer the succession to the crown of England from the royal race of Tudor to the line of Dudley.

The scheme, in reality, was very feasible, and by no means devoid of reasonable chances of success. By the will of Henry VIII., the crown was to devolve, in the event of the death of Edward, his only son, first, to Princess Mary, and secondly, to Princess Elizabeth; but against this arrangement there was the very strong objection that both Mary and Elizabeth had been declared illegitimate by acts of parliament, solemnly confirmed by the king. All the forms of law had been studiously observed in bastardizing these two children of Henry VIII., and the act, approved of by the highest ecclesiastical and judicial authorities of the realm, had never been repealed, so that, in strict adherence to law, the succession to the throne was to be sought in a different direction. But with Edward's death, and the accepted non-legitimacy of his two half-sisters, no other representatives of the royal house of Tudor remained but the descendants of the two daughters of Henry VII., Margaret, queen of Scots, and Mary, for a short time queen of France, and subsequently, wife of Brandon, duke of Suffolk. The descendants of Margaret, represented at this moment by the young Queen Mary of Scotland, eleven years old, had, beyond doubt, the best claim, and all that could be urged against it was that this succession was excluded by the will of Henry VIII., and, what was far more important, was antagonistic to the true interests of the nation, inasmuch as Mary was betrothed to the dauphin of France, and her accession, therefore, would bring England in subjection to its great continental enemy. It was clear that, in view of this possibility, all claims of birth, however strong, had to fall to the ground; and the right of succession, in consequence, could devolve upon no other claimant but the offspring of Mary, youngest daughter of Henry VII. Mary, by her marriage with the duke of Suffolk, left two daughters, the eldest of whom, Frances Brandon, married Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, subsequently created by Northumberland duke of Suffolk. Granting the premises of the illegitimacy of the two daughters of Henry VIII., and the political incapacity of the descendants of his elder sister, there then remained not the slightest doubt that the succession to the crown of England was vested in Frances Brandon, wife of the new duke of Suffolk. This was the very sufficient reason why Northumberland set himself to prepare the marriage of his fourth son, Guildford Dudley, to Jane Grey, eldest of the three daughters of the duchess of Suffolk. To complete the transaction, the duchess consented to sign a little paper, by which she made over to her daughter all her rights to the crown of England.

But the crown of England was not yet vacant, and to bring Northumberland's great scheme into operation, it was necessary that Edward should die, and die, too, before the projected marriage with a French princess could be carried into execution. The young king had never been very robust, and his intense application to study had not contributed to strengthen his bodily frame; however, he had always enjoyed fair good health, and it seemed that he was getting stronger after passing the age of thirteen. But, in the summer of 1552, he fell ill, and, though recovering for a while, his complaints soon after assumed an alarming character. There were dark rumours afloat among the common people that the young king was being poisoned by Northumberland, whom, after the execution of Somerset, they held capable of all possible crimes. But the dictator paid no regard to these accusing voices, either fortified by a feeling of innocence or hardened by obdurate wickedness; and, steadily following the path he had traced out for himself, he continued gathering within his grasp more and more of power and of influence. In view of all emergencies, he even sought to strengthen his hands by foreign alliances, placing himself on even terms with the crowned heads of the great European states. The cession of Boulogne had already brought him in friendly relation with the king of France; and to form, if possible, likewise an alliance with the first sovereign of the continent, Charles V., Northumberland sent an embassy into the Netherlands, in the autumn of 1552. The ostensible object of the embassy was to induce the Kaiser to make peace with France, with which power he was wrestling in the evening as much as in the morning of his eventful life. But the envoys were likewise instructed to offer the great monarch assistance against the Turks, a tussle which he contemplated as a diversion from other fightings, and, in fact, to do anything to gain his goodwill for the English government, which, Northumberland justly feared, would be endangered by the contemplated setting aside of the succession of Princess Mary. Northumberland's embassy, consisting of Sir Richard Morysine and one or two other high-born diplomats, and including likewise an obscure plebeian named Roger Ascham, unknown as yet to the world, but destined to be more famous in times to come than either of his noble superiors, found Charles at Bruges, where they had several interviews, which, however, led to little practical result. To humiliate France was all the Kaiser cared for, and as the ruler of England did not dare assist him in this one great object of his life, he seemed rather careless about his friendship. Nevertheless, the English envoys persevered, not disguising their great anxiety to win the favour of the Kaiser.

He was as strange a man, this famous Kaiser Charles, now that he was past fifty, as when, at twenty, with the diadems of four empires on his brow and unutterable ambition in his breast, he was hiding all his ambition under a little cloth of frieze mantle. Sir Richard Morysine, brilliant ambassador, fitted out regardless of expense, reported to his master, with evident surprise, that he found Charles V., the greatest monarch, without comparison, of the civilized world, at "a bare table, without a carpet or anything else upon it, saving his cloak, his brush, his spectacles, and his picktooth." Sir Richard Morysine had been particularly ordered to watch, in his interview with the Kaiser, his general expression of countenance, and even his tone and gestures, his exact temper, or, as stated in his instructions, his "passions of joy and grief," in order that conclusions might be drawn therefrom whether he was really well inclined towards the English dictator, and disposed to be on friendly terms with him. But poor Sir Richard sadly failed to solve the great human riddle before him, and was frank enough to acknowledge his failure. "The emperor's majesty," he wrote home, "hath a face as unwont to disclose any hid affection of his heart as any face I ever met with in all my life; for all those colours which, in changing themselves, are wont in others to bring a man certain word how his errand is liked or disliked, have no place in his countenance, and his eyes only do betray as much as can be picked out of him. He maketh me think of Solomon's saying, 'Heaven is high, the earth is deep: a king's heart is unsearchable.' The ambassador, further to explain his inability to search the unsearchable, added a curious portrait of the mighty ruler of Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, and the vast continents of the New World. "He was newly rid," reported Sir Richard, "of his gout and fever, and therefore his nether lip was in two places broken out, and he forced to keep a green leaf within his mouth at his tongue's end, a remedy, as I took it, against such his dryness, as in his talk did increase upon him." This "green leaf" was a great stumbling block to the poor ambassador, and, as he firmly believed, a chief cause of his diplomatic failure. "There is in his majesty," he lamented in his despatch, "almost nothing that speaks beside his tongue, and that at this time, by reason of his leaf and soreness of his lip, and his accustomed softness in speaking, did but so-so utter things, without great care given to his words." Thus the alliance between Kaiser Charles and England failed on account of a little green leaf.

From the Netherlands, the English ambassador proceeded to Rome upon some mysterious negotiations, which had no further result than that of affording a glimpse into the condition of the papal court under Julius III., only known as "the bishop" to good Protestants, such as Sir Richard. "Of late," he reported, under date of the 26th of October, 1552, "the bishop, meaning, as men guess, to enjoy his papacy, and live like a pope, hath wound himself out of all business, leaving the charge of his whole doings to five cardinals, with power absolute to do what they shall think good, only requiring them that, as occurrences happen, he may hear of them. Cardinal di Monte is appointed to oversee the bishop's revenues, and to take order for things of his holiness's chamber. Cardinal Pigghin is appointed to masters of judgment, for to appoint consistories, and such like. Cardinal Cicada hath in charge to look to the bishop's lands and castles, such as are not appointed to legates already. Cardinal Mignanelli, or rather, Mangiagnelli, is made superintendent, to see that religion amend in no place where he hath to do. But Cardinal Dandino is he that hath to do in matters of state, in things between the bishop and the princes of Christendom, and it is thought Dandino will do his best to deserve such pensions as the French king giveth unto him, and, full of that, he seeketh if he get not some more." According to this statement, bribery was as flourishing as ever at Rome, which was, probably, one of the reasons of Sir Richard's journey, seeing that wherever money was able to purchase friends, Northumberland was ready to come forward with a liberal hand. However, all his diplomatic negotiations proved failures, more or less; and even a special embassy to a lady supposed to exert some secret influence in the political affairs of the continent, the queen dowager of France, Eleanor, widow of Francis I., and sister of Kaiser Charles, was resultless. Roger Ascham was a member of this embassy, and wrote home from Brussels an amusing account of the grand personages to whom he was introduced. "The French queen," he told his correspondent, "came to mass clad very solemnly all in white cambric, a robe gathered in plaits wrought very fair as need be with needle white work, as white as a dove. A train of ladies followed her as black and evil as she was white. Her mass was sung in prick-song very cunningly." Roger Ascham had the honour of seeing the queen eat as well as pray. "Her first course," he reported, "was of apples, pears, plums, grapes, nuts; and with this meat she began. Then she had bacon and chickens almost covered with stale onions that all the chamber smelled of it. She had a roast caponnet, and a pastry of wild boar; and I, thus marking all the behaviour, was content to lose the second course, lest I should have lost mine own dinner at home." Honest Roger, very fond of a good dinner, came home greatly disappointed with the aspect of continental affairs. "Beef," he complained, "is little, lean, tough, and dear; mutton likewise; and a rare thing to see a hundred sheep in a flock; capons too, lean, and little; pigeons naught; partridges black, ill, and tough." And, summing up matters, he arrived at the conclusion, "there is no country to be compared for all things with England."

Northumberland was more fortunate in his home politics than in his foreign negotiations. After dissolving the parliament, which had sat during the whole of Edward's reign, he made great efforts to get another more fit to be an instrument in his hands, and, being utterly unscrupulous in the means employed, his endeavours were crowned with fair success. Previous to the election of the new House of Commons there were circulars issued, under the royal signature, to all the sheriffs of counties, enjoining them "to inform the freeholders that they were required to choose men of knowledge and experience for their representatives." In order that there might be no difficulty in finding the veritable "men of knowledge," Northumberland, in the king's name, further kindly promised to point them out to the electors. "Yet nevertheless," so ran the intimation, "our pleasure is that where our privy council, or any of them, shall in our behalf recommend within their jurisdiction men of learning and wisdom, in such cases their directions shall be regarded and followed, as tending to the same end which we desire, that is, to have this assembly composed of the persons in our realm the best fitted to give advice and good counsel." The plan worked exceedingly well, and, writs having been issued on the 18th of January, 1553, there assembled, on the 1st of March following, a parliament entirely devoted to the new ruler of the kingdom. It was highly welcome to Northumberland, greatly in want for the moment, not so much of fresh statutes as of fresh cash. He had spent, to the last penny, the produce of his great church spoiliations not only, and of his immense estates, but also the four hundred thousand crowns received from the King of France for Boulogne, and, over and above all this, he had run the crown into debt to the extent of nearly three hundred thousand pounds. It was, probably, this grievous want of cash which made his negotiations with Romish cardinals and French dowager queens less successful than they might have been otherwise; and it certainly impeded the execution of his all-important scheme for the change of succession. From these anxieties, Northumberland was relieved by the liberality of the new parliament, which at once granted him two tenths and two fifteenths, to be levied immediately; from the convocation of the clergy, likewise called together, he managed to extract six shillings in the pound in addition, thus satisfying the most immediate needs. Without losing further time, the usurper now set to work at once for the realization of his great enterprise.

The popular rumour which accused Northumberland of having poisoned the young king, seemed to be ill-founded for the present, for Edward threatened to die too soon. Attacked, successively, by the measles and the small-pox, he appeared to suffer, in the spring of 1553, from a complication of diseases, and at the opening of parliament, on the 1st of March, was so weak as not to be able to go from Whitehall to Westminster. It was evidently high time to commence operations, and Northumberland was ready for the emergency. He had erected for himself recently a splendid palace in the Strand, called Durham House, and all during the months of March and April, painters, gilders, upholsterers, and other artists were kept hard at work to prepare for the most magnificent wedding, or group of weddings, that had been seen for a long time in the metropolis. All being ready, the great event which was to transfer the crown of England to the house of Dudley came off on the 20th of May. On this day, the Lady Jane Grey gave her hand to the fourth son of Northumberland, her younger sister, Catherine Grey, was married to Lord Herbert, heir of Pembroke, intimate friend of the dictator; and, finally, Northumberland's youngest daughter, Lady Catherine Dudley, was made to wed Lord Hastings, eldest son of the earl of Huntingdon. There was one more marriage on this same day, likewise of a heiress to the crown of England, but it was not celebrated in the gilded apartments of Durham House. While the two first born children of the duchess of Suffolk, great grand-daughters of Henry VII., celebrated their nuptials with illustrious lords, expectant to move in the circle of royalty, her third and youngest child, Lady Mary Grey, gave her hand to one of the king's porters, a native of Kent, called Martin Keys. The duke of Northumberland was very angry at this unequal match, but unable to prevent it; and all that he could do was to exclude, with a show of pity, the sister of the intended queen of England from his own elevated sphere. The dictator was too full of schemes, and too much of an upstart, to judge things quietly; else might he have foreseen that, in these dangerous times of ambition, there was more reason to congratulate than to pity the humble descendant of King Henry VII., Mrs. Keys.

To complete Northumberland's great scheme, there now remained nothing but to gain the consent of the young king to a change in the succession. This was comparatively easy; and Edward not only obeyed the wishes of his guardian but assisted personally, and with extraordinary eagerness, in the execution of the plan. The poor lad knew by this time that he was dying, and having been educated in the strictest Puritan principles, he shrank back in horror from the idea of being succeeded on the throne by a ruler of such declared popish tendencies as Princess Mary. There had been many attempts made to induce her to relinquish the Romish faith at least in its externals, to give up mass and confession, and conform, if not in all, in some respects, to the ritual of the Church of England. But, a true child of her father in obstinacy, she resisted all these endeavours with great energy, and even violence, declaring to the Lord Chancellor and other high officers of state whom the king had sent to her, that she would rather lay her head on the block and suffer death than leave the faith in which she had been educated. The young king, under these circumstances, looked upon his half sister with a feeling akin to horror, and, when once the doctors had informed him that his illness was likely to end in death, manifested a vehement desire to destroy her claim to the throne. That he possessed the power to alter the succession there seemed little doubt, inasmuch as the statute of 28 Henry VIII., cap. 7, which had never been repealed, and was consequently still in force, had conferred upon the king the right to bequeath the kingdom to any person at his pleasure, without even reserving a preference to the descendants of former sovereigns. But Northumberland did not wish the young king to act upon this statute in nominating his successor, but directed him to follow the less arbitrary plan of simply excluding both the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth from the throne on the ground of their being illegitimate, and after that to allow the succession to take its natural course, under adoption of the will of Henry VIII., which eliminated the descendants of Margaret of Scotland. Edward was naturally unwilling to exclude his half-sister Elizabeth, whom he knew to be a good Protestant, together with Mary, but as he could not help seeing that bastardy could not be applied to one without the other, he submitted to this necessity. The young king accordingly drew up the will with his own hand, careful to put his signature at the top, sides, and bottom, and, heading the paper, folded like a school-book, "My device directing the succession."

DURHAM HOUSE.

While the great plot was proceeding, there was a little underhand plot being enacted in the royal council. Although in reality as unrestrained in his power as the most absolute monarch, Northumberland, fully aware of his extreme unpopularity, made it his principle to keep as much as possible in the background, assuming no high-sounding titles, or issuing decrees in his own name, but acting through the privy council and a couple of ministers, or secretaries of state. As the privy council was made up entirely of his own friends, or, at least, persons who professed to be such, so the ministers were little else but his own private secretaries, completely under his command. Notwithstanding this subordination, Northumberland had been fortunate enough to procure two very remarkable men for his secretaries, Sir William Petre, and William, afterwards Sir William Cecil. Petre had the reputation of one of the best scholars of the time, and Cecil gave early promise of having mastered more thoroughly the great arts of diplomacy and statecraft than any man of his age. William Cecil, born in 1520, the son of a master of the robes to Henry VIII., had been introduced into political life by Somerset, who, on becoming Protector in 1547, appointed him master of requests. He accompanied his patron in the expedition against Scotland, fought, and nearly lost his life, in the battle of Pinkie, and on his return to England was made a secretary of state. Passing for one of the warmest adherents of the Protector, he fell with him, in 1549, and had to spend a few weeks in the Tower, but suffering no harsh treatment. Northumberland, with his keen knowledge of character, soon perceived that this William Cecil, inborn diplomatist, loving mankind a little but loving office far more, was a person worth buying, and he thereupon took him out of the Tower and put him at his side. Cecil attached himself as warmly to his new patron as to his old friend, and not without reward, for Northumberland successively made him secretary of state, raised him to knighthood, and admitted him to the privy council. But though subservient in all things, Sir William was too far-seeing to follow his leader blindly, and when he beheld the latter advancing into a path which threatened to be beset with dangers, he cautiously drew back. Watching Northumberland narrowly, he early became aware of his great scheme for altering the succession to the throne, the success of which seemed to him extremely doubtful. There was one element against success which Cecil could not help appreciating in its full force, the hatred with which the people regarded Northumberland. There were none so blind, even among the lower classes, as not to see that the transfer of the crown to Jane Grey was a micro sham, and that the iron gripe of Northumberland would soon break through the flimsy mask. But there was scarcely a man alive who fully trusted him; who had faith in his being either a Protestant or a Roman Catholic; or who knew whether he would take the part of the ultra reformers in church and state, or of the priests and the old nobility. Cecil clearly saw that it was this profound mistrust of Northumberland which, in spite of all his great talents and boundless energy, would ruin his cause. This being settled in his own mind, Cecil, quietly resolved to desert Northumberland.

In the latter part of May, just after the celebration of the marriage between Lady Jane Grey and Lord Guildford Dudley, Sir William Cecil took a walk in Greenwich Park with a friend, a Mr. Roger Alford. The court had been removed to Greenwich, to the improvement of the king's health; and, talking over this important matter, Sir William informed his friend, in strictest confidence—subsequently given to the world in print—that he had got the information, not in his capacity as secretary, but from a private source, that his majesty was engaged in preparing a will in which the succession of princess Mary was set aside in favour of Lady Jane Grey. When the project was ripe, he said, he would very probably be called upon to give his advice; but he emphatically declared that, whatever might become of him, he “never would be a partaker in that devise.” However, Sir William Cecil altered his purpose very soon, at least outwardly. A few days after the memorable walk in Greenwich Park, Northumberland, as foreseen, ordered his secretary to make arrangements for passing a royal patent, altering the succession, through all the legal forms, and as Sir William showed resistance, he was quietly informed that unless obedient he would have to resign. Suing the action to the word, Northumberland at once summoned Sir John Cheke, one of the king's tutors, appointing him third secretary of State, with orders to be sworn into office the same day, the 2nd of June. This was too much for Sir William Cecil; he was prepared to lay down his life, but he was not prepared to give up his place. He now told his chief that he was willing to do his behest, and Northumberland accepted the offer—rather unwisely. He had always found it easy to curb small ambitions under his will, but he had yet to discover the danger of having a great servant unwilling to serve, and driven, through unwillingness, into falsehood, fraud, and deceit.

On the 11th of June, 1553, Sir Edward Montague, lord chief justice, received a letter from the privy council, signed by the three secretaries of state, Sir William Cecil, Sir William Petre, and Sir John Cheke, requesting him to attend the next day before the king at Greenwich, in company with the attorney and solicitor general, and the other judges. Montague, as in duty bound, repaired to Greenwich, and was ushered, with his brother judges, into the presence of Edward, who told them with much animation that his long sickness had caused him to think seriously of his duties as a ruler, and that feeling he was going to die, he had resolved in his own mind that the crown should not go to the lady Mary, who might alter the religion, but to his dear cousin, the lady Jane Grey, sincerely attached to the reformed faith. After these words, Edward handed to the chief justice his paper, headed “devise directing the succession,” commanding him to draw out a deed of settlement in conformity with the instructions therein. The communication did not come altogether by surprise to Montague and his colleagues, and looking around the room and finding that the duke of Northumberland was not there, they gathered courage, representing to the young king the difficulty of carrying out his orders. They felt, one and all, the poor judges, that there were hals at stake in the work before them; but not wishing to be selfish, or personal, they put themselves on constitutional ground, getting very eloquent upon statute law and settlements confirmed by acts of parliament. But Edward was peremptory in his command; and, after some discussion, the judges withdrew, promising diligently to consult the statutes once more. The next day, the 13th of June, Montague attended by summons before the privy council, and missing the dreaded chief of the government again, plucked up courage to speak somewhat too strongly about the danger of altering the succession, which, he affirmed, would be not only treason in him and all his brother judges participating in the matter, but also in the members of the council. The words had no sooner passed his lips when Northumberland, pale and trembling, rushed into the room, and calling the chief justice a traitor, swore a great oath that he would fight in his shirt with any man opposing the orders of the king. Before this argument, Sir Edward Montague at once gave way. Now past sixty, he had seen much of life, and in his long experience always found it extremely hazardous to oppose the wishes of kings. He well remembered how, when little more than thirty, he had made an eloquent speech in the House of Commons against supplies; and how he had been taken to task by Wolsey; and how he had been sent for by Henry VIII., and been addressed with a "Ho! will they not let my bill pass?" and how he had fallen on his knees, imploring mercy; and how he had been soothed by the royal words, "Get my bill to pass by twelve of the clock to-morrow, or else by two of the clock to-morrow this head of yours shall be off." And he remembered well how he wept for joy when the bill passed against which he had so eloquently spoken. Lost in memories of the past, the lord chief justice declared to Northumberland that he was willing to issue the document demanded by the king, on condition of receiving an order under the great seal to perform the act, and a pardon afterwards for having performed it. There was no objection to give the poor old man these little indulgences, and thereupon the royal letters patent altering the order of succession were drawn up according to all the forms of law.

The important document, bearing date the 21st of June, 1553, and signed by the king, the whole of the judges, all the members of the privy council, except one, and most of the great officers of state, one hundred and one persons altogether, set forth three principal reasons for the exclusion of the ladies Mary and Elizabeth from the throne. These were, first, that they had been declared illegitimate, both by decrees of the highest ecclesiastical tribunal and acts of parliament; secondly, that they were only of half blood by King Edward, and therefore not inheritable by ancient law, even if legitimate; and, thirdly, that there was a probability that they might marry strangers out of the realm, and thereby endanger the commonwealth. The second was an argument invented by the ingenuity of the crown lawyers, who held that the expression used in the royal letters patent of the ladies Mary and Elizabeth being "unto us but of the half-blood," and the Lady Jane Grey representing "very nigh of our whole blood on the part of our father's side," did not a little to fortify the case. Northumberland, on his part, showed less faith in legal arguments than in the numerical strength of his partisans, and besides compelling all the great personages within reach of his influence to set their names to the royal patent, he made the principal members of the privy council sign another document by which they engaged themselves "upon their oath and honour to adhere to and carry into effect all the articles contained in the king's settlement." This second deed was subscribed by twenty-four privy councillors, including Cranmer and Sir William Cecil. The latter throughout acted in a false and deceitful manner, ready to serve his patron as long as fortune should continue to smile upon him, but equally ready to desert him at a turn of the tide. For the moment the chances seemed rather in Northumberland's favour, and it was highly probable that one step more would secure to him the undisputed possession of the crown. The step absolutely dictated by the circumstances was that of arresting Mary and Elizabeth, and, having placed them beyond reach of a tumult or popular insurrection, to proclaim Lady Jane Grey as heir apparent, leaving to her youth, beauty, and gentleness to win that popularity which was for ever denied to him. Most unaccountably, Northumberland neglected these measures, and, as if absolutely blinded for the moment, spent all his time, not in energetic action, but in getting signatures to little bits of parchment, the uselessness of which, in great events, he of all men ought to have best known. It seemed as if the bold usurper, overcome by sudden giddiness, was trembling on the lofty heights to which ambition had led him, with no guide near to direct his faltering steps. William Cecil alone stretched his hands forward to lead his patron—but to lead him towards the precipice.

Immediately after the signature of the patent of succession the king fell very ill, and the rumours that he was being poisoned grew stronger than ever. People whispered, with bated breath, that his majesty's health had been declining ever since Lord Robert Dudley, Northumberland's youngest son—notorious earl of Leicester of a coming reign—had been placed near him as gentleman of the bedchamber. The suspicion, probably, was unjust; but it was notable, nevertheless, as showing the intense hatred of the population towards their ruler. In one respect, too, Northumberland laid himself open to the accusation of planning Edward's death. When it was seen that the king was rapidly sinking, his physicians were sent away, and he was placed, by special order of the privy council, in the hands of an old hag who undertook to cure him by her nostrums. The imputed poisoning now took place in dire reality. The poor youth began to feel the greatest difficulty to speak or even to breathe; his pulse failed, his legs swelled, his eyes got heavy, and the fresh colour of his face turned to a ghastly livid hue. Thus he kept lying on his couch at Greenwich palace during the first days of July, the spirit apparently loth to fly a body which had only seen fifteen summers. But when the evening of the sixth of the month approached, the face of the young king had become more livid, and the bright eyes more heavy; but by a sudden effort he raised himself upright and went praying: "O Lord God, save thy chosen people of England! O my Lord God, defend this realm from papistry, and maintain Thy true religion!" Then a sudden calm spread over his features. Edward, third king of England of the Tudor race, was no more.

SECTION IV.

MARY.

On Friday, the 7th of July, 1553, while the body of Edward VI. was lying stiff and stark at Greenwich Palace, a lady of middle age, apparently near forty, of short stature, keen eyes, and harsh and disagreeable features, went riding along the bridle-path leading from the small village of Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire, into the great northern road, or Roman Ermine Street. She, with her short train of male and female attendants, had just reached the town of Hoddesdon, at the junction of the high road, and was turning southward, when a courier came galloping up at full speed, and, jumping from his horse, knelt on the ground, handing her a sealed letter. The pale face of the lady got flushed on the instant with extraordinary excitement, and her hands seemed to tremble under the weight of the little piece of paper which the messenger had handed to her. For a minute or two she was speechless and motionless; then she turned the head of her palfrey to the north, riding away in great haste. The short letter had told the lady that she had inherited the crown of England the day before, and that if she did not seek safety in rapid flight, she would find herself a prisoner the day after. The choice between a throne and a prison was not difficult, and a sharp ride up the old Ermine Street, her face turned away from the capital, was the first act of the first queen of England.

Northumberland, seemingly demented, or mentally exhausted after the great effort of procuring the patent altering the succession, had at last awoken to a sense of his position when seeing the hand of death on the pallid brow of the royal youth whom he was accused of murdering. It was only then that the sudden thought rushed across his brain that unless he could lay hold of the first claimants to the crown, now hanging upon a feeble breath, all the parchments he had gathered would serve no other end but to pave his way to the block. That a man of Northumberland's stamp, and playing the game he did, should not have seen this at an earlier stage of his great scheme, was indicative of little less than dementia; and that, seeing it finally, he yet neglected to act with energy, was proof of his having lost all confidence both in himself and others. Climbing higher and higher, he seemed to feel more and more keenly that he was standing utterly alone, amidst the jealousy of friends, the contempt of enemies, and the bitter hatred of the mass of the people. Thus he acted like one in a dream, irresolute what to do next, or where to turn next. But even in his blindness it struck him at last that, if for nothing else, for sheer self-preservation, he ought to secure the two important personages whom he had excluded from the throne, so as to prevent them becoming the rallying points of the immense host of his enemies. As long as there was a glimmer of life left in that poor royal youth at Greenwich Palace, the forces of the kingdom were at his command; a word from his lips was sufficient to hurl troops of armed men away in all directions, to seize whomsoever he might order to be seized, and to kill whomsoever he might order to be killed. But once that child's breath was gone, all his power vanished into air, like the vision of a midnight dream. All this Northumberland knew, and yet forgot in his actions. When death approached the couch of the young king, a messenger was sent to Princess Mary, to lure her into his hands. A dozen halberdiers would have brought her safely from Hunsdon to the Tower, and she agreed to follow even the envoy who invited her to court, apparently without fear or suspicion of the fate awaiting her. But Edward died before she had set out, and another messenger, despatched by the earl of Arundel, Sir William Cecil's friend, had time to stop her on the way. The fate of England thus got changed in the turnpike road at Hoddesdon.

While the Lady Mary was spurring away towards the north, seeking shelter, in the first instance, at the castle of Kenninghall, Norfolk, which, confiscated from the attainted Howards, had been given to her by her father, Northumberland was still dreaming in London, evidently as yet unprepared for action. His chief aim for the moment seemed to be to hide the death of the king as long as possible, and while the great news was blazing forth in all directions, with Sir William Cecil and the whole privy council intriguing against him, and deliberating upon his destruction, he busied himself with drawing out fresh parchments and taking fresh oaths, neglecting even to proclaim the queen of his own making, Lady Jane Grey. The young lady, just sixteen, as yet remained entirely ignorant of the honour prepared for her by her father-in-law, and was living in retirement with her husband, about the same age as herself, at Sion House, near Brentford. Over-educated, pedantic, and timid, with a thorough knowledge of the languages and customs of ancient Greece and Rome, and an all but complete ignorance of the wants and aims of her native country, she promised to be an admirable puppet in the hands of Northumberland, her very unfitness for a ruler, her youth, her innocence and beauty, being wonderfully adapted to gain the enthusiasm of the multitude. But while Queen Mary was straining every nerve to snatch the crown from the hands of the usurper, Queen Jane, his tool, was left to read Plato on the banks of the Thames, within sight of Westminster Abbey. After losing two days in consultation with his insincere friends in the privy council, Northumberland, on the 8th of July, roused himself to some show of action by inviting the Lord Mayor of London, six aldermen, and twelve other citizens to Greenwich Palace, and, informing them of the death of the king and of the patent establishing the new succession to the throne, desired them to swear fidelity to Queen Jane. They took the demanded oath, being bound, at the same time, under heavy penalties, not to divulge the secret of Edward's death—a secret known already to the meanest London apprentice. The day after the lord mayor and aldermen had been sworn in, a letter arrived from Queen Mary, addressed to the members of the privy council, in which she expressed her astonishment that they had not proclaimed her, ordering them instantly to repair that omission. To this letter Sir William Cecil was ordered to write a reply, informing Mary that she was a bastard, and recommending her to be "quiet and obedient." Cecil, with usual prudence, turned the labour of writing this message over to a friend, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and after having assured Northumberland of his entire obedience to Queen Jane, organized a plot for delivering Windsor Castle into the hands of Queen Mary. All the colleagues of Cecil in the privy council, with scarcely an exception, imitated his example of double worship, awaiting further news to decide who, of the two queens, ought to be hung, and who to be crowned.

The suspense of the honourable members of the privy council was not destined to last long. Queen Mary, when flying along the Ermine Street towards her castle of Kenninghall had scarcely a friend in the kingdom; but she had not been many days in her refuge when promises of support and adherence came in from all sides. The report that Northumberland had poisoned the young king and wanted to raise himself to the throne spread rapidly all over the country, causing everywhere a determination to withstand the usurper, the hated murderer of Somerset, to the utmost. In the eastern counties especially, where Northumberland's cruel treatment of the poor rebels after the battle of Dussindale was far from being forgotten, the detestation of him was greater than almost anywhere in England, and to oppose him the whole labouring population was ready at any moment to rise in another insurrection. Queen Mary was all but unknown to the bulk of the people; and although many of the better informed classes, aware of her attachment to Roman Catholicism, looked upon her with great suspicion, yet her accession, even to them, seemed greatly preferable to that of the unscrupulous adventurer who had risen to power through falsehood and crime. That a woman, however bigoted or superstitious, could not but be better than this hated man, was the universal belief of the whole nation, a belief the stronger, as England had never yet enjoyed the luxury of being governed by a woman. Thus it happened that, while Northumberland was busying himself in petty scheming and the swearing-in of London aldermen, even neglecting to show the poor little puppet he meant to raise to the throne, the people kept moving in nearer and nearer circle towards Mary, as the rallying point of all hopes. In not more than a week after the poor middle-aged lady had fled up the old Ermine Street, scarce knowing whither to go, all England was ready to place the crown on her head.

It was only on the 10th of July, four days after the death of the king, that Northumberland brought his daughter-in-law by water from Brentford to the Tower, to proclaim her queen. The people at the river side looked on in deep silence, and not a sound was heard either of scorn or applause: the multitude clearly hated the usurper, and pitied the young and beautiful creature whom she was dragging along to the dark tomb and palace in the city. It was generally believed that she was unwilling to follow Northumberland and to be made queen, but that the entreaties of her father, and, still more, of her young husband, to whom she was passionately attached, had prevailed upon her to give her consent. She entered the Tower in state, accompanied by the whole court and all the members of the privy council, and the command went forth immediately to proclaim her queen throughout the realm. But it was too late, for Mary had been proclaimed already. Even the privy councillors, who now began to see clearly in what direction the tide was running, made men to run away to Mary; and Northumberland, to keep his friends faithful, shut them up in the Tower, giving strict orders not to allow them to leave its precincts. Sir William Cecil tried hard to get out, as well as his friend the earl of Arundel; however, Northumberland sternly refused, mistrusting them deeply, his eyes being opened at last to the fact that they were plotting against him. But the reports which arrived every hour were more and more unfavourable; on the morning of the 11th the news came that Queen Mary had been joined by the earls of Bath and Sussex, with a numerous force, and on the evening of the same day it was known that Sir Edward Hastings, who had been commissioned to raise troops for Lady Jane, had gone to Kenninghall at the head of four thousand men. Northumberland now was forced to throw off his lethargy, and to begin to act; and after a conference with his council, it was decided that the duke of Suffolk, the father of Queen Jane, should be placed in command of the royal troops, "to fetch the Lady Mary up to London." The resolution was quite senseless, Suffolk being known as a semi-idiotic old man, more unfit than a schoolboy to command an army; but Northumberland was driven to this expedient by fear of treachery, knowing that if he were to march to the north, he would have more enemies behind than in front. However, Queen Jane strongly interfered on behalf of her father, and giving way to her entreaties, North-

Northumberland finally decided to take the troops directed against Mary under his own command. Sir William Cecil and the members of the privy council were overjoyed at this resolution, inwardly determining also to seek Queen Mary—on their knees.

Northumberland left the Tower on the morning of Friday, the 14th of July, oppressed by bitter forebodings. On the eve of his departure, he assembled all the great officers of state and privy councillors around him, addressing them, according to the report off an eye-witness, in an excited speech. "My lords," he exclaimed, "I, and these other noble personages, with the whole army that now go forth, as well for the behalf of you and yours, as for the establishing of the queen's highness, shall not only adventure our bodies and lives amongst the bloody strokes and cruel assaults of our adversaries in the open fields; but also we do leave the conservation of ourselves, children, and families, at home here with you, as altogether committed to your truth and fidelities: whom, if we thought ye would through malice, conspiracy, or dissension, leave us, your friends, in the briars and betray us, we could as well sundry ways foresee and provide for our own safeguard, as any of you, by betraying us, can do for yours. But now upon the only trust and faithfulness of your honours, whereof we think ourselves most assured, we do hazard our lives; which trust and promise if ye shall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion, yet shall not God count you innocent of our bloods, neither acquit you of the sacred and holy oath of allegiance made freely by you to this virtuous lady the queen's highness, who by your and our enticement is rather of force placed therein than by her own seeking and request. Consider also that God's cause, which is the preferment of his Word, and fear of Papists' entrance, hath been, as ye have heretofore always known, laid the original ground, whereupon ye, even at the first motion, granted your good-wills and consents thereunto, as by your handwritings appeareth; and think not the contrary, but if ye mean deceit, though not forthwith, yet hereafter God will revenge the same. I can say no more, but in this troublesome time wish you to use constant hearts, abandoning all malice, envy, and private affections." The speech was a clear proof that Northumberland had come deeply to mistrust his friends; yet, in appealing to their honour and generosity, he showed that he was far from knowing them yet. When shaking hands with them, as a last farewell, the earl of Arundel, friend of Cecil, and greatest of all the hypocrites in the privy council, addressing Northumberland with tears in his eyes, "prayed God to be with his grace; saying, he was very sorry it was not his chance to go with him and bear him company, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his blood, even at his feet." At the very moment when making this profession of love, Arundel was in active communication with Queen Mary, promising to do all in his power to destroy Northumberland.

The duke, after mustering his men, some five thousand in number, at Whitehall, in the night from the 13th to the 14th of July, set forth from London at the dawn of next day. All the streets were crowded with people; but among the multitude there prevailed an anxious silence, the force of which was felt by Northumberland. Riding at the side of Lord Grey through the city, he remarked to him, with bitterness, "The people press to see us, but not one saith God speed us." But Northumberland was still far from seeing that the five thousand men at his back, many of them old veterans, hardened in battle, were now the last resource left to him. A bold dash with them at the undisciplined forces which had gathered round Mary, followed by a short and decisive victory, might have yet saved him, and given the crown to Lady Jane Grey. However, steeped as he was in intrigue, he still trusted to it more than to anything else, neglecting even the dictates of common prudence. To his coadjutors in the privy council to his cause and its dangers had become one of his main objects, and to accomplish it he pretended that he was only marching by their orders and under their instructions. These had been furnished to him on his express desire, to the grim satisfaction of Sir William Cecil, Arundel, and all his other enemies. They were pleased to lay down his route to the north in very slow stages, fully persuaded that every day spent on the march would be a gain to Mary and a loss to her opponent. The scheme proved as successful as calculated. Following the instructions of his supposed friends in the privy council, Northumberland spent four days on the road from London to Cambridge; and, when arrived at the latter place, on the 18th of July, he found that Mary had moved, on the 16th of July, from Kenninghall to Framlingham, where, surrounded by strong walls and deep moats, as well as an immense number of partisans, she was quite beyond the reach of the handful of troops under his command. On the day after his arrival at Cambridge, the 19th of July, late at night, news still more disheartening came to Northumberland from London. It was nothing less than that the privy council had proclaimed Mary, and declared traitors all who should be found in arms against the lawful queen.

The manner in which Cecil and his colleagues executed their design was very characteristic and very simple. As soon as Northumberland's back was turned, they expressed a desire to leave the Tower, under various pretences, the earl of Arundel, among others, asserting, truly enough, that the air did not suit his constitution. This was a movement foreseen by Northumberland; and to prevent it he had entrusted the keys of the fortress to the duke of Suffolk, charging him strictly not to let any member of the government or high officer of state pass beyond the gates. But the imbecile old duke was but a poor obstacle against the machinations of such men as Cecil and Arundel, and they brought him to the ground in a very short time. Early in the morning of the 19th of July, five days after the departure of Northumberland, and three days after the advance of Mary from Kenninghall to Framlingham, the privy council held a sitting under the presidency of the duke of Suffolk, in which the arrival of a French ambassador was discussed. It was said that the king of France was prepared to send a large army to assist Queen Jane, and that his ambassador had just arrived to conclude the treaty of alliance, but was prevented by the rules of etiquette to come to the Tower. The stock of ideas of Queen

Jane's father was very slight, but a belief in etiquette was among his most coherent notions, so that he had no sooner heard of the ambassadorial scruples when he urged Sir William Cecil to go and meet his French excellency in all haste. Thereupon Sir William, the earl of Arundel, Cranmer, and all the leading members of the council, went forth with much alacrity across the drawbridge of the Tower, and, proceeding straightway to Baynard's Castle, residence of the earl of Pembroke, they unanimously resolved to proclaim Queen Mary. The lord mayor and aldermen of London were summoned, ordered to change their oath for Queen Jane, rendered ten days previous, into one for Queen Mary, and to get all their flags and trappings ready for a brilliant show. Then they all rode together into the city, Garter king-at-arms in front, embroidered all over, and with sound of trumpet and under wild shouts of joy echoed by the populace, the herald proclaimed at every street corner that the Lady Mary, eldest daughter of his late majesty Henry VIII., of blessed memory, had become Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith. So great was the joy, and so loud the noise of voices and of trumpets, as to awaken even the sleepy duke, father of Queen Jane, representing her rule in the Tower. When told what was the matter, the poor idiot on a sudden got very lively, and, as stated in the letter of a contemporary, "he came himself out of the Tower, and commanded his men to leave their weapons behind them, saying that he himself was but one man, and proclaimed my Lady Mary's grace on the Tower Hill." Lady Jane Grey now was utterly alone in the Tower, a queen without subjects.

The behaviour of Northumberland at this sudden collapse of his power was anything but manly and brave. On the 20th of July, the day after the proclamation of Mary in London, he received a formal notification from the privy council, commanding him to lay down arms and discharge his troops on pain of treason; and a few hours later he found himself in the presence of his fervent admirer, the earl of Arundel, whose words of farewell in the Tower had been so loving and so eloquent, and who had declared himself ready to "spend his blood even at his feet." The noble earl had been quicker in his movements than any of his friends, and while they were proclaiming Mary in London, he went directly to the queen, so as to be first in the worship of the new light. Galloping in hot haste to Framlingham, Queen Mary graciously condescended to accept his fervent assurances of loyalty, to which was joined an offer of capturing her greatest enemy, and placing him in safe custody. It was on this errand that Arundel stood before his old patron early on the morning of the 21st of July, when scarce the sun had risen over the Cambridge lowlands. Northumberland was preparing to fly, when Arundel burst into his chamber, exclaiming, "my lord, I am sent hither by the queen's majesty, and in her name I do arrest you." Cowed and trembling, the duke fell on his knees. "For the love of God, consider," he exclaimed, "I have done nothing but by the consents of you and the privy council: I beseech you, my lord, use mercy towards me, knowing the case as it is." He knew the "case" but too well, the noble earl, to cease gloating over his fallen patron, not half so clever as himself. "My lord," he rejoined, haughtily, "ye should have sought for mercy sooner: I must do according to my commandment." With these words, he handed Northumberland over to a file of soldiers, who forthwith tied his hands, and led him away a prisoner. Two days after, the gates of the Tower, which he had only left a fortnight before in regal pomp, and at the head of an army, closed behind him, never more to open but on the short walk to the scaffold.

After the arrest of her great enemy, and the entire dispersion of his forces, Mary slowly proceeded on her journey to the capital, accompanied by some thirty thousand men, principally from the eastern counties, which had gathered around her. Most of the men were staunch Protestants; but among them were also great numbers of Roman Catholics, and crowds of priests who had come flocking into Framlingham, who were celebrating mass daily, and who talked openly of the reintroduction of popery into England. A few of the eastern counties men were bold enough to remonstrate with the queen on this subject, venturing to hint that the reformed faith was by law established: to which she replied, with much blandishment of manner, that she had not the least intention to change the religion of her people, but would allow freedom of conscience to others, as she claimed it for herself. This seemed satisfactory to Mary's new friends, as they were full of the first intoxication of female royalty; and the goodly news of the coming reign of liberty having spread in all directions, her progress to London soon became a triumph. At Wanstead, in Essex, where she arrived on the 1st of August, the queen was met by her half-sister Elizabeth, who, having watched the course of events with keen eyes from her retreat in Hertford, now came forward with great demonstrations of loyalty, bringing with her a thousand horsemen. Mary looked with some suspicion upon her affectionate sister, and still more upon her armed followers; but she received all of them graciously, and then set forth towards the capital, which she entered on the 3rd of August, amidst the most frantic shouts of welcome. Her first visit was to the Tower, to release the aged duke of Norfolk—prisoner since the death of Henry VIII.—as well as Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, Tunstall bishop of Durham, Bonner bishop of London, and several other zealous papists, who had been confined for their opposition to the established church. These prisoners not only obtained their freedom, but were at once raised to the highest positions near the queen, Bishop Gardiner taking the place of lord chancellor, and the duke of Norfolk that of chief confidential advisor of her majesty. The Pope, Julius III. shed tears of joy on receiving the report of these events, firmly believing that the lost flock of the British Isles was coming back for ever into the fold of Rome.

The fervent attachment of Mary to the Romish faith, and her determination to reintroduce it into England, became so evident in the very first weeks of her reign as to induce the great mass of court worshippers to trim at once their sails to the wind, and to gain favour by Catholic orthodoxy. Before even a single public act had passed, abolishing any of the tenets or ceremonies of the reformed religion, popish sermons were heard everywhere, mass was sung in many churches, and priests got snugly ensconced in most of the houses of the nobility and the upper classes. The movement was so rapid as to astonish honest Roman Catholics no less than true Protestants; and while the former saw in it one more proof of the hollowness of the new creed, there remained nothing to the latter but to hide their heads in shame and almost despair. Foremost among those who professed to have been suddenly convinced of the truth of the old faith was the duke of Northumberland. The wretched man, though clearly beyond the hope of being pardoned by a queen against whom he had stood up in arms, and, still worse, whom he had publicly branded as a bastard, conceived, nevertheless, a notion that religious hypocrisy might save his life, and determined accordingly to go through the act of conversion with such an amount of zeal as might touch the heart of his royal mistress. As yet, her hatred against him seemed profound, for the joyful acclamations with which she had been received by her subjects in the capital had scarcely died away, when she ordered that he should take his trial for treason, choosing as his judges the just liberated duke of Norfolk, together with Sir William Cecil, Cranmer, the duke of Suffolk, and others of his own partizans and presumed friends of the late privy council, who, to save their own lives, might be expected to be vindictive against their old master. In the interval of the preparation for Northumberland's trial, the obsequies of King Edward were solemnized at the Tower, in accordance with all the rites of the Romish church, mass being said in the mortuary chapel, and the dirge sung in Latin. This ceremony over, the other of the trial was gone through on the 18th of August. Northumberland, seeing most of his old colleagues sit on the judgment bench before him, asked, with some pluck, "whether any such persons as were equally culpable with him, and those by whose letters and commandments he was directed in all his doings, might be his judges?" The reply to which was that they had been forgiven, and he alone stood accused. To another question, "Whether a man doing any act by authority of the king and council, and by warrant of the great seal of England, and doing nothing without the same, may be charged with treason?" there was no reply at all. Northumberland had shown himself so cautious in all his latter proceedings, that, in strict law, he was certainly not guilty of treason; but he himself had been too long acting upon the doctrine that might was right to be able to make an appeal to law. Among his judges were not a few of the old friends of Somerset, by whom his murder was neither forgotten nor forgiven.

The verdict of guilty was duly recorded against Northumberland; but there seemed a chance of escape for him when, immediately after, Bishop Gardiner visited him in his prison vault in the Tower. Gardiner was not at all unwilling to extend a helping hand to his former foe, and even to save his life, since in him he felt not only sympathy of character, but could hope to gain such assistance as he stood in need of in the execution of his daring plans. His rise to power had been too sudden to make him feel safe on his giddy height; besides which he had a secret enemy in the duke of Norfolk, against whom the queen's esteem was not a sufficient safeguard, as she, too, was likely to remember at any moment that the name of her chancellor was on the document pronouncing the divorce of her mother. Bishop Gardiner, moreover, was getting old, with much work still before him; and feeling that he wanted support, and that it would be impossible to obtain a more experienced, bold, and unscrupulous partizan than the fallen ruler of England, he went to visit him in the condemned cell. The interview lasted a considerable time, and immediately after, Northumberland desired the attendance of a confessor, to whom he declared his great anxiety to renounce his heresies, and to be again admitted into the church of Rome. His execution had been appointed to take place on the 21st of August, two days after his trial; however, on the representation of his confessor, acting, probably, with the secret assistance of Gardiner, it was postponed, nominally for a day, but, as Northumberland fondly hoped, for a much longer time, to allow him to make a public renunciation of his faith. The scene, described by a resident in the Tower, was altogether extraordinary. "On Monday, the 21st of August," reported the eye-witness, "it was appointed the duke with others should have suffered, and all the guards were at the Tower; but, however, it chanced he did not, but he desired to hear mass, and to receive the sacrament according to the old accustomed manner. So, about nine of the clock, the altar in the chapel was arranged, and each thing prepared for the purpose, then Mr. Gage went and fetched the duke to mass, which was said both with elevation over the head, the peace-giving, blessing, and crossing on the crown, breathing, turning about, and all the other rites and incidents of old time appertaining. And when the time came to receive the sacrament, the duke turned himself to the people, and said first these words, or such like. 'My masters. I let you all to understand that I do most faithfully believe in the very right and true way, out of the which true religion you and I have been seduced these sixteen years past, by the false and erroneous preaching of the new preachers, the which is the only cause of the great plague and vengeance which hath light upon the whole realm of England, and now likewise deservedly fallen upon me and others here for our unfaithfulness. And I do believe the holy sacrament here most assuredly to be our Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ; and this I pray you all to testify, and pray for me.' After which words he knelt down and asked all men forgiveness, and likewise forgave all men. Amongst others standing by were the duke of Somerset's sons."

Northumberland gained nothing by this final apostacy. Although Gardiner was willing to save him, the queen in this instance refused to take his advice, preferring to follow the counsel given to her by her cousin, Kaiser Charles, who insisted that she should treat the principal of her enemies with severity. On the evening of the day on which he had made his public confession of heresy, the lieutenant of the Tower informed Northumberland that his execution would take place when another sun had risen, exhorting him to spend his last hours in prayer. The advice was not taken, and, instead of praying, he spent his last hours in writing an abject letter to the earl of Arundel, whose intervention with the queen he implored. "Alas, my good lord," he exclaimed, "is my crime so heinous as no redemption but my blood can wash away the spots thereof? An old proverb there is, and that most true, that 'a living dog is better than a dead lion.' Oh! that it would please her good Grace to give me life: yea, the life of a dog, if I might but live and kiss her feet, and spend life and all in her service." Even this last extreme humiliation was unavailing. Early on the morning of the 22nd of July, Northumberland was led out to the scaffold on Tower Hill, surrounded by an immense crowd of people, many of whom held up against him handkerchiefs which they had dipped in the blood of the duke of Somerset, executed on this same place exactly eighteen months before. The sight of the popular hatred thus exhibited did not nerve Northumberland, for he entertained still hopes of being saved at the last moment by a pardon. To deserve it, he made another public recantation of the reformed faith, speaking in the tone of a priest seeking to gain converts. "Good people," he cried, with the axe of the executioner over his head, "there is, and hath ever been since Christ, one Catholic church, which church hath continued from him to his disciples in one unity and concord, and so hath always continued from time to time until this day, and yet doth throughout all Christendom, only us excepted, for we are quite gone out of that church. For whereas all holy fathers and all other saints throughout Christendom, since Christ and his disciples, have ever agreed in one unity, faith, and doctrine, we alone dissent from their opinions, and follow our own private interpretation of the Scripture. Do you think, good people, that we, being one parcel in comparison, be wiser than all the world besides, ever since Christ? No, I assure you, you are far deceived." He kept on preaching in this strain for some time, hoping against hope that his anxious apostacy would bring forth the pardon of "her good Grace," in whose sight he was so anxious to lead "the life of a dog." But the pardon came not; and, the executioner lifting his glittering steel, there was an end of all hopes and fears in this world. Northumberland's headless trunk was buried in the chapel of the Tower, close to that of his victim, the duke of Somerset, and near to the remains of Queen Anne Boleyn and Queen Catherine Howard. The throne of England was strikingly represented in those four headless bodies.

The queen's inclination to follow the advice of her foreign relatives, rather than that of her own ministers and official councillors, which manifested itself first in the execution of Northumberland, soon after became more and more apparent; and one of the results of it was a division of the members of the government into two distinct parties, headed, respectively, by Bishop Gardiner and the duke of Norfolk. Gardiner's great aim was to restore all the ancient forms and ceremonies of the Catholic church, without, however, making England dependent upon Rome; while Norfolk, less national in his views, showed himself anxious to bring back not only popery but the pope. The duke was greatly assisted in his operations by the activity of his foreign friends. Immediately after the accession of Mary, Cardinal Davado, papal legate in Flanders, despatched one of the shrewdest priests of his suite, Francis Commendore — subsequently famous member of the Sacred College — to London, to concert measures for the restoration of the Romish faith. Commendore, arriving in the middle of August, before the execution of Northumberland, found some difficulty in getting access to the queen, his way being barred by Gardiner and the men of his party, Arundel, Paget, and Petre, all of them in watchful attendance upon Mary as privy councillors. But watchful as they were, they were not sufficiently so to keep a zealous servant of Rome, from gaining his ends; and, in less than a week after his arrival, Francis Commendore was secretly introduced to the queen by a near relative of the duke of Norfolk, a gentleman named Lee, performing ministerial duties without being sworn in the privy council. Mary assured the papal envoy of her inviolable attachment to the church of Rome, and her determination to restore its worship; but she, at the same time, entreated him to conceal himself, and to act with the utmost caution—a rather superfluous piece of advice to the subtle, serpent-like messenger who had found his way into the royal closet. But there was more important information for Francis Commendore. Mary, as yet ignorant of the wheel-within-wheel complication of European politics, told the eager priest, as a piece of good news, but to his intense surprise, that she was in secret correspondence with Kaiser Charles, and that the latter had offered her his only son, Philip, in marriage. The treaty, she said, had not yet been concluded, but she intended to have it signed in a few days, after the execution of Northumberland had taken place, when she would find an opportunity to inform him of it. Commendore anxiously waited for the spectacle of blood on Tower Hill; and, the day after, the 23rd of July, was summoned to another secret interview with the queen. Mary now informed him that she had concluded her league with Kaiser Charles, and was resolved to marry his son. She also repeated the assurance of her extreme desire to reconcile her kingdom to the Holy See, to facilitate which she requested the appointment of her relative, Cardinal Pole, as legate of the pope in England. Francis Commendore hurried back to his lodgings, and a few hours after was on his way to Dover. Travelling night and day, he reached Rome in little more than a week, finding time on the road for a hurried interview with Cardinal Pole, who had sought a quiet retreat in the convent of Maguzano, at the lake of Garda. On the 1st of September, Commendore threw himself at the feet of his master, Julius III., imploring him not to lose a minute to wrest the fair and noble realm of England both from the heretics and the all-devouring ambition of the worldly enemy of the church, Kaiser Charles. The pontiff smiled approvingly, and Cardinal Pole was ordered to set out immediately for the court of Queen Mary.

There was need for the pope to make haste in the conquest of England, for in the race between him and the Kaiser all the chances were in favour of the latter. Charles was not only first in the field, but the highest bidder, and had studied the character of mankind to infinitely more advantage than his poor friend Julius III. Battling all his life long for world dominion, attacking the French monarchy as a barrier in his way, using Rome as a war-engine, and treating Protestantism as a mere political enemy, Charles V. had not grown old in politics to allow such a splendid prize as the kingdom of England to be taken by others within his own reach. The grey-haired Kaiser by his first act showed that he understood his cousin Mary a great deal better than any of her bishops and privy councillors, and was fully aware that, aside of the religious fanaticism of her mother, she was still more strongly imbued with one of the most notable characteristics of her father. Some weeks before the quick-witted envoy of the pope had his secret interview with Mary, a private messenger from the Kaiser had brought her not only his warmest congratulations to her accession, but a portrait of his son Philip, heir of his vast dominions, aged twenty five, extremely good looking, highly accomplished, famous for his gallant adventures, and universally acknowledged the greatest match of the civilized world. Mary had no sooner seen the portrait, painted by an Italian master-hand, when, according to an old manuscript account, she "was so enamoured thereof, and so ravished that she languished for love, and was in a manner out of her wits." The feeling was not altogether unpardonable in a poor elderly woman of small brains and strong passions, who had spent thirty-eight years in kneeling before wooden saints, and who now found herself suddenly in the glare and flare of a throne, tempted to grasp the last rays of a lost spring and summer of life. For a full quarter of a century, the Lady Mary had been hawked about among the princes of Europe, from the time of Wolsey, who wanted to dispose of her, for private purposes, as an invaluable "pearl of the world," till the last days of the rule of Northumberland, who desired to get rid of her at any price, she had been successively offered to the king of France, to the dauphin, to Don Luis of Portugal, to the duke of Orleans, to a prince of Denmark, to the Herzog of Cleves, to the duke of Urbino, and to half a score of other princes. Refused by all, branded as a bastard, and scorned as ugly, she was beginning to feel the last bitter disappointment of heart and soul, when the crown was placed on her head, and the son of the greatest monarch of Europe, most dashing of cavaliers, and handsomest of men, came forward as a candidate for her hand. Thus, at the mere sight of his portrait, "she languished for love, and was in a manner out of her wits." It was the natural consequence of absolutist government that the English people should feel the full effects of these matrimonial yearnings of Queen Mary.

By the advice of Kaiser Charles, the queen kept her intended marriage for a time a strict secret, and in the meanwhile showed herself most gracious and affable to all her subjects, consoling even the Protestants with the solemn assurance that they should not be disturbed in the exercise of their religion. To gain additional popularity, she exhibited herself constantly in public, arranging fêtes and entertainments, and crowning all by a coronation spectacle, more splendid than any show seen in London since the days of Henry VIII. The festivities commenced on the 30th of September with a gorgeous procession, more than a mile long, moving from the Tower through the city to Whitehall Palace. Mary rode in a chariot of tissue, drawn by six horses, amid such magnificences as fairly to bewilder even the court chroniclers who had seen the splendours of her royal father. "She sat," as rapturously painted by John Stow, "in a gown of blue velvet, furred with powdered ermine, hanging round her head a cloth of tinsel beset with pearls and stones, and upon her head a round circlet of gold, much like a hooped garland, beset so richly with precious stones that their value was inestimable: the said caul and circlet being so massy and ponderous that she was fain to bear up her head with her hands." An innumerable train of guards, pages, knights, judges, bishops, and great lords, preceded and followed the royal chariot, the duke of Norfolk marching immediately in front, carrying the sword of state, with the lord mayor at his side, all in crimson velvet, bearing aloft the golden sceptre of the realm. Behind the queen's tissue coach came another covered with cloth of silver, in which sat Princess Elizabeth, together with a curious relic of older times, in the person of the Lady Ann of Cleves, official "sister" of King Henry VIII. of blessed memory. To be a fitting ornament of the show, the royal lady, as fat, jolly, and contented as ever, amidst all the storm of times and change of crowns, had been dressed up "in silver habit, according to the French fashion," which was also the costume of her serious and far less happy-looking neighbour, Princess Elizabeth. Thus the pageant passed along the crowded streets of the city, amidst the joyous acclamations of the multitude, who were liberally supplied with wine, which was kept running from all the fountains. On the next day, the 1st of October, the queen went, in a splendid barge, gilded all over, from Whitehall to Westminster Abbey, where she was solemnly crowned and anointed, with all the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic church. In the procession to the altar, Princess Elizabeth, walking near Count Noailles, the French ambassador, and carrying the crown of her sister, complained that it was too heavy. "Be patient, madame," whispered Noailles, "it will be less heavy when it is on your head."

The first parliament of Mary met on the 5th of October, a few days after the coronation. Although as yet there had not been the least alteration, in a legal sense, of any of the forms and ceremonies of the established church, both the lords and commons, with more than usual obsequiousness, behaved as if they had never known any other than the Roman Catholic religion. At the opening of the session, high mass was celebrated in the House of Lords as well as the House of Commons, and a few members who refused to fall on their knees at the elevation of the host were summarily kicked out of doors. The legislative proceedings which followed were carried on in the same temper. At the death of Gardiner, the whole of the acts bearing upon religion which had been passed in the preceding reign were repealed in one swoop, thus doing away with all trouble of wedding the statute book. The next measure of parliament was to annul the divorce of Henry VIII. and Queen Catherine, the double effect of which was to make the Queen legitimate beyond dispute, and to bastardize her sister Elizabeth. In this act there was involved, to a certain extent, the renunciation of the spiritual supremacy of the crown, which formed the basis of the divorce, the latter being absolutely beyond the power of revocation by parliament as long as the former was admitted. The queen was fully aware of it, and not only willing but anxious to renounce her supremacy and admit that of the pope; but this desire was so strongly opposed by Gardiner, who represented to her that the security of her crown depended upon the at least temporarily continued separation from Rome, that she gave her reluctant consent to retain, if only nominally, the title of head of the church. Probably the chancellor alone would not have been able to carry this important point with his bigoted royal mistress, but for the powerful assistance of Kaiser Charles. The great emperor cared very much less for Romish supremacy, pliant enough in his own hands, than for the queen's match with his son, which, he hoped, would add England to his dominions; and fearing that this great object might suffer by a too early display of religious fanaticism on the part of his zealous cousin, he strongly advised her to keep quiet, and to leave, as much as possible, the pope alone. The advice was equal to a command, Mary bending in childlike humility before the father of her coming husband, for whom she was yearning already with her whole heart. She had talked so much about him by this time that the report of her intended marriage had gone all over the country, creating intense dissatisfaction. Even the members of the House of Commons, with all their inborn humility before the throne, felt stirred by the rumour that it was to be occupied by a foreign prince, and commenced debating the matter, the discussion ending in the daring resolve to present an address to her majesty, praying her not to marry a stranger. The speaker, and a deputation of members, all bowing and slightly trembling, were ushered into the royal presence on the 30th of October, and became aware at once of the mistake they had made in interfering with the highest object of their sovereign. Mary had no sooner heard what her faithful commons had come to say, when she flew into a rage, and sharply reprimanded them for their insolence. As soon as they were gone, the queen sent for Charles's ambassador, and, as reported by Lingard, "bade him follow her into her private oratory, where, on her knees at the foot of the altar, and before the sacrament, she first recited the hymn 'Veni, Creator Spiritus,' and then called God to witness that she pledged her faith to Philip prince of Spain, and while she lived would never take any other man for her husband."

To prevent an elderly woman, possessed of absolute power, from marrying a handsome young man with whom she had fallen in love, was, the House of Commons soon found, a far more difficult thing than to change the religion of a kingdom. Notwithstanding its implicit obedience to all the demands of the crown, parliament was dissolved soon after presenting the petition against the Spanish alliance, the queen loudly declaring that nothing in the world should hinder her from becoming the wife of Prince Philip. Of the fact that the whole of her subjects, with singular unanimity, were opposed to the match, there could be no doubt in the mind of the queen. There came reports from all parts of the country that the people, most of whom had shown themselves very indifferent about the introduction of the mass and other religious changes, were in a high state of excitement at the news that the queen intended to give her hand to a great foreign prince, who would thus become ruler of the kingdom. This general opposition to the marriage was so strong as to assume, in many places, all the features of a revolt against the queen. Judicial proceedings were instituted in several instances against persons who gave vent too freely to their opinions, and brought to light some curious displays of popular feeling. One William Cotman, a smith in a Kentish village, declared before the magistrates that the son of a gentleman called William Ishley, "came to his shop to shoe his horse, where he tarried the making of a shoe, and there used those words, 'that the Spaniards were coming into the realm with harness and hand-guns, and would make us Englishmen worse than enemies and viler; for this realm would be brought to such bondage by them as it was never before, and be utterly conquered.' And, at his taking of his horse, he said, with a loud voice, that all the street might hear it, 'Smith, if thou beest a good fellow, stir and encourage all the neighbours to rise against these strangers, for they should have lawful warning.'" Master Smith was a timid man, and hearing his customer hold forth in such a treasonable manner, interrupted him with, "Why, these be marvellous words, for we shall be hanged if we stir;" to which the other replied, "No, ye shall have help enough." These and many similar demonstrations, reported from all parts of the kingdom, showed the heart of England to be more deeply stirred by the projected matrimonial alliance of the queen than by any event that had taken place since her accession.

The opposition of the English people to his great scheme soon became known to Kaiser Charles. His large experience always made him select the best ambassadors that could be got as his representatives in foreign countries, and one of the shrewdest of these diplomatic personages, a Frenchman, named Simon Renard, he had despatched into England a little before the death of Edward, when the political waters looked troubled enough to invite fishing. The worthy Simon Renard—"Fox" by instinct as well as name—had spent the earlier part of his life as bailie, or reeve, of a small town in France, from which humble position he was rescued by Charles, who soon discovered his higher qualifications, and enlisted them in his service. Before he had been many weeks in England, Renard got a very clear insight into the political state of the country, and lost no time to inform his master that the execution of his plans would require extreme moderation, and that it was far more necessary to rein in than to spur the zeal of the queen for the marriage with Prince Philip. Charles fully comprehended the wisdom of marriage, reports arrived in London that the people were rising both in Kent and in Devonshire, and that there was such a stir in the midland counties and in many other parts of England as to threaten a general revolt. All was confusion at court at this intelligence, the want of a great political or military leader being, for the first time, deeply felt. The queen herself was fully aware that she could not trust one half the men who had gathered around her as advisers, and who, as shown by their past career, would be as ready to desert her, and, if necessary, put her to death, as they had deserted and condemned her predecessors in power. Nevertheless, Mary, emboldened by her passionate love for the foreign prince against whom the revolt of her subjects was directed, got inspired by sudden courage, and resolved to risk her throne and her life rather than to rescind her matrimonial contract. Acting contrary to the advice of Gardiner, who recommended the employment of peaceful means for dispersing the riotous crowds, the queen called to her side several of the old officers who had seen service under her father, and giving them commissions for the enlistment of troops, ordered that they should forthwith take the field against the insurgents. The latter, after the first tentative east and to all popular risings, had leaders, Sir Peter Carew, west under two princes, and Sir Thomas Wyatt, an a Devonshire squire in the central districts of Kent. The attention of these leaders proved that the revolt was wholly directed against the contemplated foreign marriage, and due to the fear of "Spaniards coming into the realm with harness and hand-guns," for both Carew and Wyatt had given proofs of being warmly attached to Mary's rule, and anything but desirous to overthrow her administration. This was the reason why Gardiner counselled forbearance against the excited people, but also why the queen, to whom the coming husband was far dearer than her throne, would not hear of it, but insisted upon the immediate and unconditional suppression of the revolt. As the Kentish insurgents under Wyatt were more immediately threatening than those of the west of England, both by their number and their nearness to the capital, Mary sent against them the most trusted of her servants, the aged duke of Norfolk. He raised some thousand troops in great haste, among them the train bands of London, commanded by captain Alexander Brett, and without loss of time started for Maidstone, the head-quarters of the insurgents. The latter did not wait for the arrival of the royal army, but marched towards it, and at Rochester Bridge the two hosts met, to decide with their blood the question whether Queen Mary should be allowed to wed the son of Kaiser Charles.

It was on the 29th of January, 1554 that Mary's commander found himself face to face with the insurgents, numbering nearly ten thousand men. Wyatt had posted his men in a very advantageous position on the bank of the River Medway, leaning against the ancient ruin of Rochester Castle, with the bridge in front. To attack his opponents, Norfolk had to cross this steep and narrow bridge, strongly guarded by the rebels, and which they seemed determined to defend to the last man. Prepared for some hard fighting, Norfolk ranged his army in order of battle, with the London train bands in the vanguard, and, all being ready, the order to attack was given. The train bands advanced, but before they had gone far towards the bridge, Alexander Brett, the captain, turned round and addressing his men in a spirited harangue, told them they ought not to kill their countrymen who had taken up arms to resist the coming-in of proud and treacherous Spaniards. In reply to this appeal, the London people set up a loud cry, "A Wyatt! a Wyatt! We are all Englishmen!" and forthwith signified their intention to take part with the insurgents. Many of the royal troops followed their example, and Norfolk, seeing that three-fourths of his men had deserted from his standard, marched back hastily and in great disorder, accompanied only by some of the queen's guards. Wyatt, by following him immediately, and taking advantage of the first panic which the sudden rout of the royal forces could not fail to cause, might have easily entered London, the train bands ahead, and proclaimed a new government. But the leader of the rebels, a brave yet irresolute man, had no distinct plan of proceedings before him, and being too full of loyalty to venture upon anything decisive, he, instead of to the gathering up his success, kept loitering on the road one of tempo for nearly a week. The week was a confusion at court among the leading men of the government, many of whom commenced preparations for wheeling round once more, so as to be the first to salute success. To have their hands free, these shrewd politicians, among whom were the principal ministers, invited Mary to fly at once; and to get her off the more safely, she was awoken from sleep at two o'clock at night, and told that her life was in danger, and that to save herself she must instantly repair to a boat which was lying ready near the palace. But Mary absolutely refused, feeling instinctively that to fly would be to resign her crown, and that with her crown she would lose her coming husband, her worshipped ideal lord, dearer to her than all else upon earth. Full of this passion, Mary suddenly exhibited a boldness never before shown, and which won the admiration even of her enemies.

The day after she had been advised to fly, on the 1st of February, while all London was in consternation, wild rumours flying about that the men of Kent were standing at the gates preparing to attack the city, the queen, accompanied only by a few of her attendants, chiefly ladies, proceeded to the Guildhall, bent upon the extraordinary attempt of rousing the citizens by a personal address to the defence of her crown. She found the lord mayor and aldermen in steel coats, and even the barristers pleading in armour, all evidently prepared to fight, but with more general inclination to take the side of Alexander Brett and the train bands than that of the established government. When the queen commenced speaking, evidently unprepared, and giving vent only to what was uppermost in her mind, an immense crowd gathered round the steps on which she stood, listening in the deepest silence. "I am come," she exclaimed—as reported by John Fox, as near out of her own mouth as could be penned,—“I am come in mine own person to tell you what you already see and know, how traitorously and rebelliously a number of Kentish men have assembled against us and you. Their pretence was for a marriage determined by us, to the which, and to all the articles whereof, you have been made privy: but since we have caused certain of our privy council to go against them, the marriage seemed to be but a Spanish cloak to cover their pretended purpose against our religion, for they arrogantly demanded to have the governance of our person, the keeping of the Tower, and the placing of our councillors. Now, loving subjects, what I am ye right well know: I am your queen, to whom, at my coronation, when I was wedded to the realm and the laws of the same, you pronounced your allegiance and obedience. And that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown I take all Christendom to witness. My father possessed the same regal estate, and to him ye always showed yourselves most faithful and loving subjects; and, therefore, I doubt not that ye will so show yourselves likewise to me, and not suffer a vile traitor to have the governance of our person, and to occupy our estate." After some more words to the same effect, in which the queen very cleverly dwelt on the fact of most of the insurgents being very poor people, who would not keep their hands from the property of the wealthy citizens of London, she concluded, "Good subjects, pluck up your hearts, and like true men stand fast against these rebels, both our enemies and yours, and fear them not, for I assure you I do not fear them at all."

The effect of this speech, delivered in a voice deep like that of a man, was marvellous. Besides the extraordinary spectacle, never before witnessed in England, of a reigning queen addressing her subjects, the bold assertion she made that the true object of the insurgents was not to prevent her marriage but to grasp her estate and plunder the nation, made the deepest impression on all the assembled citizens, who on the spot determined to embrace her cause. They did not know that her majesty, in speaking about the privy councillors she had sent to the rebels and the answer she had received, had told a slight falsehood. She had, indeed, despatched two members of the privy council to Sir Thomas Wyatt, of whose loyalty she was well aware, but with instructions to speak to him privately, and to induce him to betray the people who had chosen him as their leader. This the Kentish knight refused to do, declaring at the same time that he was ready to argue the question of the queen's marriage, but that, wishing to be trusted as well as to trust, he should require four of the queen's ministers as hostages, and be permitted, moreover, for his own security, to garrison the Tower. Sir Thomas Wyatt was so little rebelliously inclined, and so poor a politician as to allow himself to be kept at bay by these negotiations, which were entirely dishonest on the part of the queen, and carried on only with the intention of gaining time, as well as throwing dissension into the rebel camp. While Mary was haranguing her subjects against him at Guildhall, Wyatt kept waiting for a final reply from her, loitering along on the road to London, and wasting his time in keeping down the impatience of his followers, who, with truer political instinct than himself, felt that if they wanted to succeed at all they must succeed at once. But their leader's hesitation proved his and their ruin. On Monday, the 29th of January, Wyatt had gained his bloodless victory at Rochester, and it was not till Saturday, the 3rd of February, that he arrived at Southwark, preparing to enter the city. The week had been sufficient to change the state of public feeling within the capital, and with it the state of the kingdom. London Bridge was shut against the insurgents, the gates on the southern side closed, and the drawbridge in the centre broken, while on the city side there stood fifteen thousand armed men, who had sprung from the ground by the magic of a queen's speech.

Arrived at the Surrey side of London Bridge, with barricades before him, and loaded cannon gaping at the other end, Wyatt for the first time perceived that his cause was lost, and lost, too, by his own inactivity. To finish her negotiations, the queen, at the day of his entry into Southwark, proclaimed him a traitor, offering a reward of a hundred pounds for his capture, dead or alive. This at last drove the rebel leader into fury, and, sticking his name in large letters to his cap, as a reply to the royal proclamation, he declared his absolute determination to enter London at any cost and at any risk. After personally inspecting the approaches to the bridge, scaling the gate-house, and looking down at midnight into the broad tataract dividing the thoroughfare, he found that it would be an utter impossibility to force his way in this direction, and he thereupon resolved to march up the river to the next bridge, at Kingston, and return from thence to the capital.

KING'S STONE.

The people of Southwark, who had received the rebels with great hospitality, were not at all displeased when they were marching away, for the big guns of the Tower had begun playing upon the suburb, and though little dangerous to Kentish lives, threatened to be considerably so to Surrey property. It was with the object of relieving his friends, who trembled for their goods and chattels, more than in hope of success, that Wyatt quitted Southwark on Tuesday, the 6th of February, resolved, if not to conquer, to die like a rebel, sword in hand. His followers, well aware of the desperate nature of the enterprise under the new aspect of things, had dwindled down to only fifteen hundred, and with this handful of men the Kentish knight rushed along towards Kingston, a good twelve miles of road, reaching the town at four o'clock in the afternoon. The bridge here was likewise broken, while a small body of royal troops were stationed at the other side; but Wyatt, nothing daunted, at once set to repair the structure, with a few of his immediate attendants, leaving the bulk of his men to refresh themselves in the town. There were no boats anywhere near, but a row of barges was seen lying at the opposite shore; these some sailors, good swimmers, fetched over at nightfall, and being covered with planks and beams, they were made to fill the thirty feet gap in the centre of the bridge. An hour before midnight all was ready, and without taking any rest or refreshment for himself, Wyatt stormed forward, dispersing the opposing troops on the left bank of the river at the first onset. Onward now tramped the small band of rebels, straight towards London. The wind was howling, the rain descending in torrents, and the roads so deep in mud that the stalwart men were scarce able to drag their weary limbs along. Forward they pushed, however, following their leader, who kept storming along, heedless of wind, and rain, and mud, of aching limbs, and of aching hearts. Wyatt's spirits rose with his sinking body; more than ever he was determined to conquer or to die.

But rapid as was the march of the men of Kent, the rumour of their arrival had flown more rapidly still through London. Three hours before daybreak the rolling of drums awoke all the sleepers in the city, and nobles, merchants, tradesmen, courtiers, lawyers, and doctors alike rushed to arms. The train bands were the first to muster, still inclined, if fortune should smile upon him, to march at the command of Wyatt; but they were closely watched by a strong detachment of the royal guards, commanded by the earl of Pembroke. Manœuvring skilfully, the earl brought his men in front of the train bands on the road to Kingston, so as to be the first to meet the shock of the advancing rebels, and prevent an immediate communication with their sympathising friends of the city. The latter, nevertheless, held an imposing position on the high ground west of Charing Cross, and had Wyatt arrived, as expected, a little before daybreak, before the guards were finally stationed, he might have joined them, and the fate of Queen Mary would have hung once more in the balance. But a trifling accident decided otherwise, destroying the last hope of success of the rebels. In the miry roads of Brentford, half-way between Kingston and London, the carriage of one of the brass guns, which the men of Kent had brought with them from Rochester, broke down, and Wyatt insisted that it should not be left behind, as he held it to be indispensable to force his way into the city. More than two hours were wasted to set the little piece of ordnance again upon wheels, and on marching once more forward, Wyatt found that a great number of his followers had left him, reducing his force to less than a thousand. Among the deserters were some of the principal men of the band: Sir George Harper, who acted next in command to Wyatt, and John Poynt, bishop of Winchester, representative of the Protestant element in the rebellion. Harper was base enough to hurry forward to the court, offering his services as an informer; while Poynt, more conscientious but not more courageous, stole away from his companions in the dark, giving them his blessing, and telling his intimate friend, Alexander Brett, the train-band captain, that he would pray God for his success. So far from being discouraged by this defection, Wyatt pushed onward with more impetuosity, advancing at a speed which left others of his Kentishmen, bold as ever, but whose weary limbs refused service, behind on the road. The bells in the city sounded nine, and the sun, breaking in fitful streams through the dark clouds, was standing high in the sky on the morning of Wednesday, the 7th of February, when the straggling band of rebels at last reached the hill near Knightsbridge, with the steel armour of the guards glistening in front of them. The men of Kent were not more than eight hundred in number, worn and weary and faint with hunger and fatigue, and yet the throne of England trembled at their approach.

Queen Mary had not enjoyed much more rest than the rebels during the night. They were marching upon London. The news that Kingston Bridge had been repaired by Wyatt, and that he had forced his way across into Middlesex, arrived soon after midnight, producing immense consternation at court. Again Mary was intreated to fly, but again she refused. Gardiner himself—secretly against the Spanish match, and preferring to quench the matrimonial desires of her majesty by a marriage with a healthy orthodox Englishman rather than a dissipated foreign prince, more master than subject of the Holy Catholic Church—was persevering in his endeavours to persuade the queen to leave Whitehall, where she would be at the mercy of the insurgents, and to take shelter at Windsor Palace. But with a stubbornness characteristic of the Tudor blood, she would not listen to these entreaties, and, as a final reply, declared that if her life was really in danger she would put herself at the head of her guards, and would die a queen. At daybreak she went forth on the balcony of the palace, watching the progress of events. The din of the conflict soon came near enough. Arrived at Knightsbridge, Wyatt made preparations of attacking the royal troops; however, Pembroke, instead of accepting battle, retreated to the further end of Hyde Park, putting his cavalry in ambush behind a thicket, close to the road along which the rebels were compelled to pass on their way to the city. When Wyatt, storming on, more wildly than ever, at the head of his men, arrived near this ambush, he was allowed to pass, but no sooner had he and about one half of his band gone by, when Pembroke's light horse dashed across the road, cutting the small rebel army into two. Wyatt scarcely perceived the loss, but kept hurrying along the road as if driven by demons. Looking neither to right, nor to left, nor behind, but gazing forward and tramping onward, silent and sullen like a battering ram, followed by less than four hundred men, gradually sinking to a hundred and loss, the rebel leader kept breaking his way for a length of two miles, over ground occupied by more than ten thousand troops. At his approach, the train bands fell back, the horses stood still in their gallop, and the men ceased firing. A single poleaxe stretched forth from the dense ranks of the soldiers would have been sufficient to end his career; yet not a man lifted his finger, and not a sword was pointed to his breast. More representative of the national will, even in this last mad race, than the queen on her throne, Wyatt passed through the dense hedge of armed men unhurt, as if bearing a charmed life, every eye looking upon him in sorrow more than anger. Thus he speeded along, his followers vanishing at every step, to Charing Cross, up the Strand, through Temple Bar, and along Fleet Street, not resting a moment till reaching the city entrance at Ludgate. The gate was open when he approached, but it was shut in his face, Lord Howard keeping watch at the entrance with a party of guards from the Tower. Wyatt looked round, and saw that only twenty-four of his men had followed him, all the rest having fled or been taken prisoners. Knocking at the gate with his sword, he muttered to himself, "I have kept touch," and then sank down, utterly exhausted, upon a bench against the wall. The rebel army of twenty-five men seemed dangerous even now to the commander of the royal troops, who sent a flag of truce against Wyatt, asking him to surrender. "Sir, ye were best to yield," exclaimed the herald, "the day is gone against you: perchance ye may find the queen merciful." Wyatt faintly smiled, as if struck by the absurdity of a merciful queen; however, he made no further resistance, handing his sword calmly to a royal officer, Sir Maurice Berkeley, who was standing near on horseback. His twenty-four followers, among them Alexander Brett, did the same, and all were carried in triumph to Whitehall, where the queen, still standing on her high balcony, saw them embark, with an air of triumph, for their last grim lodging in the Tower. Mary duly felt that if her antagonist had shown half the pluck exhibited this day a week earlier, she might have been at the Tower, and he at Whitehall Palace.

A reign of terror, more violent and more hideous than even that of the last year of Henry VIII., followed immediately in the wake of the Kentish rebellion. Combining all the fanaticism of her mother with the sensual passion of her father, Mary had been driven into madness by the movement which aimed to deprive her both of her religion and her husband, and her rage vented itself in the fury of murder. The risings in the midland counties and the west of England, never of any great importance, having been suppressed before Wyatt had finished his career at Ludgate Hill, there was no want of prisoners, and upon their heads fell the first burst of Mary's tiger-like revenge. Among the most important personages implicated in the midland insurrection was the duke of Suffolk, father of Jane Grey, which furnished an opportunity to annihilate not only him but his whole family. Jane Grey, poor sovereign of ten days, had been hitherto treated with great forbearance, and although sentence of treason had been passed against her, she was allowed the liberty of the Tower, and had thus virtually been pardoned. But no sooner was the insurrection suppressed when Mary determined to bring her to the block, so as to begin her new reign of despotism with the execution of a queen. The only pretence for this act, little less in itself than murder, was that the father of Jane had taken part, in a semi-idiotic manner, in an attempt at insurrection near Coventry. As soon as he heard that Sir Peter Carew, one of his friends, had placed himself at the head of a large band of rebels in Devon, he conceived the silly notion of making himself famous by playing a similar part in Leicestershire, where he possessed large estates. He had imbibed a great hatred against Queen Mary for the singular reason that she had treated him too leniently, her government having not even thought it worth while to put him on his trial for treason, on the plain ground of his not possessing sufficient mental capacity to be answerable for his deeds. To exhibit his political abilities, the duke rushed off to Coventry as soon as Wyatt had risen at Maidstone and Sir Peter Carew on the coast of Devon, and although he heard of the failure of Carew's undertaking and his flight to France before he had fairly commenced revolting on his own account, he pursued his career like a man absolutely bereft of sense. After raising the standard of insurrection and spending much money, he became faint-hearted on seeing the unwillingness of the people to range themselves under his leadership, and at the end of less than a week took refuge in the cottage of one of his gamekeepers. The royal troops in the meanwhile kept advancing, and getting dreadfully frightened, Suffolk fled from the cottage and made himself a nest in the hollow of a tree, not far from Astley church. He stayed in his tree for two days without food or drink, till getting exhausted by cold and hunger, he crawled away and sought another hiding-place in the chimney-corner of a labourer's hut. Here he was found by the troops who had taken the trouble to search for him, and carried off to the Tower. It was the erratic course of this poor idiot which had to serve as a pretext for inaugurating the reign of terror.

Mary began her career of murder by devout prayers. On the Sunday after Wyatt's capture, the 11th of February, Bishop Gardiner, acting upon instructions, preached a sermon before her, in which she was entreated, in the name of religion, to "cut off and consume the rotten and hurtful members of the commonwealth." Great numbers of people listened to the sermon, and all, according to a contemporary chronicler, "did gather there should follow sharp and cruel execution." The worshippers were not mistaken in their belief. As soon as the sermon was over, the queen despatched one of her chaplains, John de Feckenham, to the Tower, to inform Jane Grey that she was to be executed the following morning. Though not prepared for the terrible news, she heard it with great fortitude, telling the reverend messenger that she was ready to die, but refusing his proffered services to spend her few remaining hours in prayers with him. However, Feckenham, anxious like all priests to add a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, insisted on remaining near her, and the weary night passed on in theological discussion. Early in the morning Jane received a message from her husband, stating that he was to be led to the scaffold before her, and asking for a last interview. This she refused, exhibiting wonderful strength of mind—too much almost for a young girl of seventeen. She calmly looked out of the window when he was taken away by the executioner, and calmly saw his headless corpse return in the dead cart. Immediately after, Sir John Brydges, lieutenant of the Tower, entered her room to lead her to the block. She followed without hesitation, and, addressing the priest, who still clung to her side, cried, "Go now; God grant you all your desires, and accept my own thanks for your attentions to me, although, indeed, those attentions have tried me more than death can now terrify me." A moment after she sprang up the steps of the scaffold, and, entreating all around to bear witness that she died a true Christian woman, advanced towards the dread figure holding the axe. "The hangman," narrates the chronicler, describing the final scene, "kneeled down and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he willed her to stand upon the straw, which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, 'I pray you despatch me quickly.' Then she knelt down, saying, 'Will you take it off before I lay me down?' and the hangman answered, 'No, madam.' She tied a kerchief about her eyes; then feeling for the block, she said, 'What shall I do; where is it?' One of the bystanders guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and stretched forth her body, and said, 'Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' And so she ended." There was a rumour among the people that Queen Jane was pregnant when being murdered, and that Queen Mary was aware of the fact.

Before the day which had seen the heads of Jane Grey and her husband roll in the dust had come to an end, scores of gallows were set up in every street of London. All the prisons, and even churches converted into prisons to suit the necessities of the hour, were full to overflowing with poor wretches who had been captured in the eastern and western rebellions, and upon whom the pious queen determined to execute summary justice. The work of hanging went on rapidly, and by Thursday evening, three days after the execution of Jane Grey, a hundred bodies were seen dangling from the tall gibbets in St. Paul's Churchyard, on London Bridge, in Fleet Street, and in all the main thoroughfares of London, from the Tower to Westminster Abbey, and from Southwark to Cripplegate. Batches of other unfortunates were sent down to Kent, and the streets of Rochester and Maidstone were studded even more thickly with gallows than those of the capital. It was the queen's intention not to remove the gibbets, nor even the fleshless corpses therefrom, till her sweet husband had come into her arms. Of him she kept dreaming day and night, and for his sake, to remove any dangers that might threaten his path, she went on killing with diabolical rage. Mary went forth to prove to the world, which stood aghast at the atrocities committed in her father's reign, that lust in a man has not half as much in it of the fury of hell as lust in a woman.

The envoys despatched by Kaiser Charles to negotiate the marriage of his son, had quitted England during the Wyatt insurrection, and to bring them back and complete the nuptials, Mary moved heaven and earth, promising to place herself entirely under subjection to her husband, so he would but come to her at once. This was more than Prince Philip was inclined to do, being fully impressed with the value of his own life; but to show his good intentions, he promised to go through the marriage ceremony by proxy, and to come to England as soon after as the state of the country would allow. The queen consented to everything, and awaiting the arrival of her beloved one with the most intense eagerness, trembled at every obstacle that might delay his journey. As yet the idol of her heart had not sent her a single letter, nor the slightest verbal message of love, in answer to her many protestations of affection, and all the intercourse on his part had been managed by Simon Renard, the imperial ambassador. This was enough to make the latter the most important person in the realm, far above, in the estimation of Mary, all her ministers and councillors. Renard's policy, faithfully representing that of Charles, had been at the beginning to advise moderation, and he was still inclined to do so to some extent, provided his interests should not suffer under it. These interests were of a twofold nature, namely, to gain England to the imperial household, what was more important, to retain it. The infatuation of the queen in regard to Philip, and the increased strength of her rule after the failure of the insurrection left little doubt as to the accomplishment of the first object, so that the chief aim of the Kaiser got directed towards the second portion of his great scheme. Keeping this steadily in view, Renard could not fail perceiving that the frantic despotism of the queen, the cause of which he knew so well, would have the probable effect to strengthen her hands, but, at the same time, to beget a hatred against her person, from which all not directly implicated with her, and especially her coming husband, would be free. It was clear that the more unpopular Mary made herself, the more easy it was for her successor to the throne to gain popularity—even if the successor should be a Spanish prince. Simon Renard, therefore, thinking it would be best to settle the great question of succession before all other things, said not a word against the crop of gallows which had suddenly sprung up before his eyes, but quietly hinted to the queen that there were other enemies of her betrothed husband besides those who had risen against him in open insurrection, and one in particular whose right to the throne he might affect. To Mary the hint was a command, and she forthwith gave orders for the arrest of her sister, Princess Elizabeth.

While the work of murder was briskly going on in London, crowds of ghastly corpses swinging in the wind at every street corner, some royal commissioners, accompanied by a troop of soldiers, went down to Ashridge, in Buckinghamshire, the retreat of Elizabeth. She was lying ill, and unable to move, but her house was broken into at night, and she was told to prepare for her departure to the capital early the next morning, the order of the queen being that she should be brought "quick or dead." Not to kill her at once, she was carried to London in slow stages of seven or eight miles a day, arriving on the 23rd of February, just while the duke of Suffolk was being led to the scaffold on Tower Hill. Her entrance into the capital as a prisoner created immense excitement among all classes of the population, which caused the queen not to send her at once to the great dungeon in the city, but to accommodate her provisionally in a wing of the royal palace. Simon Renard watched her arrival here from Mary's window, reporting it to his imperial master. "The Lady Elizabeth," he wrote, on the 24th of February, "arrived yesterday, clad completely in white, surrounded by a great assemblage of the servants of the queen, besides her own people. She caused her litter to be uncovered, that she might show herself to the people. Her countenance was pale, her look proud, lofty, and superbly disdainful—an expression which she assumed to disguise the mortification she felt." In a previous letter, Renard had spoken of the rumour of Elizabeth leading a dissolute life, and being with child, to which he alluded in this remark about her "mortification." Probably, the princess was not aware of the full amount of danger threatening her when entering her sister's palace, otherwise she would have scarcely looked so "superbly disdainful." In the execution of the Kaiser's plans, now coming nearer and nearer to realization, Elizabeth was the greatest obstacle, and her death, therefore, was determined upon. The ambassador of Charles, every inch a diplomatist, went to work with great caution, well aware of the difficulties of his task, but not the less resolved to execute it. Elizabeth had powerful friends at court, among them the lord chancellor himself, it being not unknown to him that the queen's physical health was weak, and her mental state on the brink of insanity, so that the crown might suddenly fall to her half-sister. At heart, neither Gardiner nor any of his colleagues in the privy council liked the Spanish match, and submitted to it only by the overbearing will of their mistress, resistance to which involved destruction. But they disobeyed as far as possible, and when told to take Princess Elizabeth under examination, so as to discover proofs of her complicity in Wyatt's insurrection, which had been the ostensible ground for her arrest, reported as the results of their labours that the charge was unfounded. It was in vain that Mary insisted upon the necessity of fresh inquiries; the result was the same, and at the end of a fortnight the queen was compelled to discharge her sister from confinement, and to allow her to return to Ashridge. Simon Renard saw that he was beaten for the moment, but, nothing daunted, determined upon another course to recover his game.

On the 2nd of March, a new matrimonial embassy arrived in London, headed as before by Count Egmont, but much more numerously attended, and still more liberally than before supplied with gold. The count brought the pope's dispensation for the marriage—necessary by the law of the Roman Catholic church, on account of too near consanguinity—and brought likewise a mandate from Prince Philip for going through the nuptials by proxy; but he carried also secret instructions from the Kaiser, insisting upon the necessity of establishing an undisputed succession by removing Princess Elizabeth. The matrimonial envoy was presented by Simon Renard to the queen on the 3rd of March, and, according to the report of the latter to the Kaiser, did not hesitate to inform her that it was part of his mission to resort to wholesale bribery for winning over her councillors to his cause. "We held with her majesty," Renard wrote to his master, "a discussion of the entertainment to be given to such as she deemed most worthy, observing that your majesty, to gain them to his highness [Prince Philip], had charged us to use some liberality towards such as she thought best. I took, moreover, her judgment as to those who should be pensioned, and of such as she and the council might select for the household and service of his highness. Mary answered that your majesty did far more for her or her kingdom and her subjects than they deserved; nevertheless, your majesty's proposals, she said, were well judged." It was a great source of satisfaction to the Kaiser's ambassadors to find that nearly all the honourable privy councillors showed extreme eagerness to get their bribes. "On Monday," Simon Renard continued his report, "we visited in turn the chancellor, Arundel, the comptroller, Pembroke, the privy seal, Paget, and the admiral. To each, separately, we showed your majesty's letters, and informed them of your intentions, according to our instructions." All accepted the proffered cash, with many thanks, promising, moreover, to hand in further lists of friends who would not object to receive the high and mighty Kaiser's liberalities. "Paget," the same report continued, "having consulted with his mistress, sent us the enclosed note, with the names of such as should have pensions and claims. Without, however, at once embracing his opinion, we, to give satisfaction to the other councillors, communicated with the chancellor and comptroller, who also furnished us with a list of names, adding to them the proper sums." The Spanish gold went off more rapidly than expected; however, Kaiser Charles, thinking that the kingdom of England would be cheap even at a million of golden ducats, forwarded fresh supplies to his envoys, punctilious of paying in all cases the "proper sums." The effects of this diplomatic activity became visible with astounding rapidity.

A week after the arrival of the embassy, there was a great meeting of the privy council, at which the queen as well as both the imperial ambassadors were present. Simon Renard, now secure of his audience, began by declaring that it was of the utmost importance that all the enemies of the prince of Spain, notably the Lady Elizabeth, ought to be made harmless before the arrival of his highness, as otherwise it would not be safe for him to come to England. Thereupon the queen, getting into a high state of excitement at the idea that her bridegroom might be kept away longer, broke forth, crying, "that she had neither rest nor sleep for the anxiety she took for the security of his highness at his coming." To her great relief, the lord chancellor, who had hitherto presumed to take, with more or less warmth, the part of the heir-apparent to the crown, now gave it as his deliberate conviction that, "as long as the Lady Elizabeth was alive, there was no hope that the kingdom could be tranquil." There was no opposition to this remark, the bribes having done their work, and, seeing this, Gardiner immediately issued a fresh order for the arrest of Elizabeth. The princess was brought, with much less ceremony than before, from Ashridge to Whitehall, the new accusation being that she had received a letter from Wyatt and been in correspondence with the French king; and after rapid examination before the council, the lord chancellor proposed that she should be sent at once to the Tower. It foreboded a grim resolution to finish matters quickly, from which, won over though they were to the Spanish interest, several of Gardiner's colleagues shrunk in fear. But to his ambiguous question, "Will any of you be responsible for the safe keeping of her person?" there was no reply, and the warrant for the committal of Elizabeth was made out without further opposition. A detachment of soldiers was stationed immediately around the apartments of the princess at Whitehall, and early the next morning, the 17th of March, two members of the privy council, the earl of Sussex and the marquis of Winchester, informed her that they had orders to take her to the Tower immediately, in a barge ready at the foot of the garden. It sounded like a death-knell in Elizabeth's ears, the terrible command to go to the Tower; and bitterly wailing, she entreated the two privy councillors to take pity upon her, and to allow her at least an hour longer to write a note to her dear sister the queen, who had given her a solemn promise always to listen to her supplication. Winchester hesitated, well aware that the appeal to the "dear sister" would be utterly useless; Lord Sussex, however, touched by infinite pity at sight of the doomed young girl, in whose destruction he was to participate, consented at last that she should write the letter, promising even to carry it to the queen. Then the princess, somewhat relieved, sat down in great fear and trembling, to pen her humble petition, while the lords stood waiting at the door.

"If ever any one," Elizabeth commenced, addressing her sister, "did try this old saying that a king's word was more than another man's oath, I most humbly beseech your majesty to verify it in me, and to remember your last promise, and my last demand, that I be not condemned without answer and due proof, which it seems that now I am, for that without cause proved I am by your council from you commanded to go unto the Tower, a place more wanted for a false traitor than a true subject; which, though I know that I deserve it not, yet in the face of all this realm appears that it is proved. But I pray God that I may die the shamefullest death that any died afore I may mean any such thing; and to this present hour I protest, afore God, who shall judge my truth, whatsoever malice shall devise, that I never practised, counselled, nor consented to anything that might be prejudicial to your person any way, or dangerous to the state by any means. And I therefore humbly beseech your majesty to let me answer afore yourself, and not suffer me to trust to your councillors: yea, and that afore I go to the Tower, if it is possible, if not afore I be further condemned. Nowbeit, I trust assuredly your highness will give me leave to it afore I go, for that thus shamefully I may not be cried out on, as now I shall be, yea, and without cause. Let conscience move your highness to take some better way with me than to make me be condemned in all men's sight, afore my desert known. Also, I most humbly beseech your highness to pardon this my boldness, which innocency procures me to do, together with hope of your natural kindness, which, I trust, will not see me cast away without desert: which what it is I would desire no more of God than that you truly knew; which thing, I think and believe, you shall never by report know, unless by yourself you hear. I have heard in my time of many cast away for want of coming to the presence of their prince; and in late days I heard my lord of Somerset say, that if his brother had been let to speak with him he would have never suffered; but the persuasions made to him were so great, that he was brought in belief that he could not live safely if the admiral lived, and that made him give his consent to his death. And though these persons are not to be compared to your majesty, yet I pray God, as evil persuasions may persuade one sister against the other, and all for that they have heard false reports and not hearken to the truth known: therefore, once again, kneeling with all humbleness of my heart, because I am not suffered to bend the knees of my body, I humbly crave to speak with your highness, which I would not be so bold to desire, if I knew not myself most clear, as I know myself most true. As for the traitor Wyatt, he might peradventure write me a letter, but on my faith I never received any from him; and for the copy of my letter sent to the French king, I pray God confound me eternally if ever I sent him word, message, token, or letter by any means; and to this my truth I will stand to my death, your highness's most faithful subject that hath been from the beginning and will be to the end—Elizabeth." With a postscript: "I humbly crave but one word of answer from yourself."

The letter of Princess Elizabeth showed that she was singularly ignorant both of the feeling of the queen towards her, and of the motives dictating her persecution. To get her young husband into her arms Mary was ready to sacrifice, without the slightest hesitation, a hundred sisters, and everything upon earth. Only a few days before she had said to Renard, as reported by him to the Kaiser, "Whatever happens, I will be the wife of the prince of Spain: crown, rank, life, all shall go before I leave him." The earl of Sussex could not be possibly unaware of this state of things; but he faithfully carried the letter written by Elizabeth to the queen, delivering it into her own hands. For all reply, she stormed at him in great fury, asking how he dared to neglect the order he had received to carry a prisoner to the Tower. "For your life you durst not have acted so in my father's time," she ejaculated, and then commanded Sussex to return to his duty without further delay. But the hours spent in writing and delivering Elizabeth's letter, had made her conveyance by water impossible for the day, the tide on the river having turned so as to put a stop to the passing of the rapids under London Bridge. At the same time Gardiner, fearing popular commotion, was opposed to send her through the streets of London, underneath the rows of gallows still crowding all the thoroughfares; and by his advice the queen consented to postpone the shutting up of her sister in the Tower till the next morning. This was Palm Sunday, the 18th of March—exactly eighteen years, by a day, after the head of Elizabeth's mother had fallen on Tower Hill. At nine o'clock in the morning, she was hurried through Whitehall Garden to the barge, accompanied by Lords Sussex and Winchester, who told her that there was no reply to her letter of the previous day. The boat halted in a storm of rain under the Tower arch known as the Traitor's Gate, an entrance reserved for prisoners doomed to death. Elizabeth knew it well, and knew, too, that her mother had passed this road on her way to the scaffold. Trembling all over, she refused to land; but threatened with force, she suddenly threw herself out of the boat and on the damp ground. Recovering a little, and seeing a great number of soldiers standing around, she exclaimed, "Are all these harnessed men for me?" "No, madam," replied the lieutenant of the Tower. "Oh, yes, I know it is so," she continued, wailing; "it needed not for me, being but a poor woman: I never thought to come in here a prisoner." Then, turning to the soldiers, she cried, as if clutching to a faint hope of gaining friends somewhere, "I pray you all, good fellows and friends, bear me witness that I come in no traitor, but as true a woman to the queen's majesty as any is now living, and thereon will I take my death." The lieutenant of the Tower now tried to raise her from the ground, the rain still pelting down fiercely, but she refused to move. "Better sitting here than in a worse place," she lamented; "I know not whither you will take me." At last she gave way; yet her heart failed again when she saw the long tomb-like vaults before her, and heard the heavy iron doors barred behind. Even Sussex, who, interceding with Gardiner, had been promised that the princess should be placed in honourable confinement, felt startled at the surroundings. "What mean ye, my lords?" he exclaimed, addressing the lieutenant of the Tower and the commander of the guards, who were marching in front of the prisoner. "What mean ye, my lords, and what will you do? She is a king's daughter, and is the queen's sister: go no further than your commission which I know what it is." The words passed unheeded in the clang of iron heels along the dark passages, which in themselves furnished a reply. The guardians of the great state prison knew far better than Sussex the nature of the queen's "commission."

That Mary, in sending her sister to the Tower, meant to take her life, by fair means or foul, there was little doubt. Whatever scruples she might have on the subject vanished before the conviction that she ought to secure, by all possible means, the welfare of her adored prince, whose legal wife she considered herself already. In the week previous to her sister's arrest, on the 6th of March, she had gone through the proxy marriage rite with Count Egmont, in the presence of Simon Renard and the chief members of the privy council. According to Renard's report to the Kaiser, the lord chancellor, as bishop of Winchester, performed the ceremony, and "the words and promises dictated by him were repeated very clearly and distinctly by Count Egmont and the queen." Previous to the performance of the nuptial rite, Renard further stated, Mary "fell on her knees before the blessed host and called God to witness that this marriage was not in her the result of any carnal affection, that it did not originate in ambition, or any motive except the good of her kingdom and the repose and tranquillity of her subjects." If other instances were wanting, this solemn declaration alone would prove Mary as daring and unblushing a hypocrite as her royal father, whose memory she was constantly calling up. Half-crazed though she was by her yearnings after the handsome prince with whom she hoped to share her bed, she could not be but fully aware that this marriage would be conducive to anything but "the repose and tranquillity of her subjects," who had protested and continued to protest against it, even at the peril of their lives. Simon Renard himself, best bred of ambassadors, felt so startled at the assertion that Prince Philip was to come over for "the good of the kingdom," without any regard to individual "carnal affection," that he interrupted Mary's declamation, asking whether she had any message for the prince. "Give him my affectionate love," the queen burst forth; "tell him that I will be all to him that a wife ought to be. But tell him also to bring his own cook with him, for fear he should be poisoned." The hint about the cook was delightful, coming from a love-sick woman of thirty-eight, more than plain in features, and with the temper of a hyena.

It was settled at the proxy marriage that Philip should come to England in a month, or, at the latest, two months; but there was an implied condition, insisted upon by the imperial ambassador, that Princess Elizabeth should be put out of the way before his arrival, so as to secure the succession. This was not very easy, since the proofs of her complicity in Wyatt's insurrection were absolutely wanting, and all that could be brought forward against her was her having been on terms of considerable intimacy with Courtenay, earl of Devonshire, a young noble of considerable abilities, who, after spending the greater part of his life as a political prisoner in the Tower, had been released at Mary's accession, and suddenly became intoxicated with ambition. Courtenay was found to be indirectly implicated in the Kentish revolt, and, on proof of it, was sent once more to his old home in the Tower; yet even this, and the knowledge that Elizabeth had been friendly to him, added no facts to the charges against her, and left them mere unfounded accusations. In his despair to extort further evidence, and anxious to earn his Spanish pension, the lord chancellor finally addressed himself to Wyatt, who was lying under sentence of death in the Tower. The rebel leader was promised a full pardon if he would come forward as a witness against Elizabeth, and threatened with torture if he refused to do so. Fear of the rack brought from him some vague admissions that, had the rebellion been successful, the princess would have had the crown offered to her; but whether this was with her consent, he would not or could not say. As this last confession did not implicate Elizabeth more than any previous charges or surmises, Wyatt was told that he must prepare for death, not without hopes that he might offer himself as an informer at the last moment. But the Kentish knight was made of better stuff, and so far from saying anything that might be turned in evidence against Elizabeth, resolved upon an act which contributed greatly to save her life. When taken to the scaffold on Tower Hill to suffer for his revolt, or rather its failure, he addressed the immense crowd which had assembled in an earnest speech, concluding with the solemn assertion that the princess, accused of participation with him, was entirely innocent of this charge. "Whereas it is said," he shouted forth so that all the multitude could hear it, "that I should accuse my Lady Elizabeth's grace, and my Lord Courtenay; it is not so, good people, for I assure you neither they nor any other now yonder [pointing to the Tower] in hold or durance were privy of my rising or commotion before I began." When he had come thus far, Wyatt was interrupted in his speech by one of the minions of the lord chancellor, a priest named Weston, who was standing near the executioner. "Believe him not, good people," the priest screamed, "believe him not, for he confessed otherwise before the council." To which Wyatt replied, solemnly, "That which I said then I said, but that which I say now is true." The words had no sooner escaped his lips when the hangman approached: a bright flash and a heavy stroke, and the head of the great rebel was rolling in the dust.

Wyatt's dying speech made the deepest impression among the thousands who had heard it, the rumour having been industriously spread for weeks before, ever since Elizabeth's imprisonment in the Tower, that she was deeply implicated in the Kentish insurrection. The whole accusation now fell to the ground at once; and although there were not efforts wanting to alter and qualify Wyatt's declaration, the lord chancellor going so far as to condemn several respectable citizens to the pillory merely for repeating to others the exact words spoken on Tower Hill, it soon became evident that the prosecution against the princess could not be sustained. An extraordinary incident, which occurred about a week after the execution of Wyatt, strikingly showed the effect of his last words. Among the prisoners in the Tower charged with having taken part in the insurrectionary movement was Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, a military officer of some note, and a zealous Protestant. He had not gone so far as to take up arms against the government, but had compromised himself sufficiently by correspondence and personal intercourse with the leaders of the rebellion to make his condemnation for treason appear a certainty. Accordingly, on the 17th of April, six days after Wyatt's execution, he was put on his trial before a jury at Guildhall for having been a party to the insurrection. Several witnesses swore to his connection with the rebels; but notwithstanding this, and a strong exhortation of the lord chief justice, Sir Thomas Bromley, against the accused, the jury returned the immediate verdict of "Not Guilty." It was a verdict which, in the actual state of political affairs, amounted almost to rebellion, and audience and lawyers alike stood aghast on hearing it pronounced. Recovering from his surprise, Sir Thomas Bromley thought it his duty to tell the jury to reconsider their verdict. "This business," he cried, "concerns the queen's highness; take good heed what ye do." The foreman of the jury replied, with great dignity, that they had found according to their conscience, such being their sole duty and obligation. Thereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton claimed his release, but the lord chief justice refused to let him go, and, addressing the lieutenant of the Tower, exclaimed, "Master lieutenant, take him back with you, for there are other things to be laid to his charge." Stretching his high-handed despotism still further, Sir Thomas Bromley likewise ordered the jurymen into prison, regardless of their repeated and earnest assurance that they had simply done their duty. But the crowds outside raised shouts of joy when they heard of the verdict, and a vast assemblage of people accompanied Throgmorton back to the Tower, with such demonstrations of gladness as if they had won a victory. It was a victory in many respects, although it cost the poor jurymen six months imprisonment besides heavy fines. The queen got into such a passion on hearing of the verdict that she fell ill. "She has been in bed for three days," Simon Renard informed his master, on the 22nd of April, "and has not yet got the better of it."

It was clearly impossible, after these events, to place Elizabeth on her trial with the slightest chance of success, and without risking a popular commotion, and Gardiner therefore advised the queen to bond before the necessities of the hour and to liberate her sister. But before this was done, a last attempt to fulfil the hopes of the prince of Spain came to be made. Elizabeth had been followed to prison by her own servants, who not only waited upon her, but prepared her food, but suddenly, towards the end of April, the lieutenant of the Tower interfered with this arrangement, insisting that all the attendants of the princess should be discharged, and her meals be sent from his own kitchen. Happily for Elizabeth, before this order could be carried out, she found an influential friend in Lord Howard of Effingham, brother of the duke of Norfolk, and high admiral of the English navy. Although a strict Roman Catholic and firm adherent of the cause of Mary, he was nevertheless greatly opposed to her match with Philip, and the efforts that were made to bring England within the grasp of the despotic rulers of Spain, Italy, and the Netherlands. Having been one of the commissioners ordered to arrest Elizabeth at Ashridge, he had got acquainted with some of the designs against her, and had come to the determination that, whatever might happen, she should not be secretly made away with. His power as lord high admiral was great, and became greater as the time for Philip's arrival in England approached, the fleet which was to bring over the prince being entirely under his command, and all the sailors enthusiastically devoted to him. It was enough, therefore, that he should interpose his influence to save Elizabeth from the last and greatest danger which had yet threatened her, and which, as shown by the remarks of Lord Sussex at her entrance into the Tower, her friends feared most of all. There was no difficulty for the admiral to get the orders withdrawing Elizabeth's servants changed at once, for by his attitude towards Gardiner and his partisans he had already become a dreaded man at court, and Mary herself was all but ready to kneel at his feet as one to whom the life and safety of her idol was to be entrusted. To guard still more against treachery, Howard, with sailor-like energy, went to the Tower accompanied by a naval guard, and abusing the lieutenant for his attempt to alter the mode of confinement of the princess, told him that his head should be responsible for her safety. The lieutenant fully appreciated the warning, well aware that the lord high admiral had become a power in the state overawing chancellor, queen, and council.

Like all despotisms, that of Mary was internally weak and feeble, and liable to be disturbed by the slightest political movement. Though murdering her subjects in a furious manner, and setting up gallows at every street corner, the queen was in reality possessed of very little power, having no standing army at her command, no trustworthy servants, high or low, and not even a sufficiency of cash to pay for the most necessary expenses of her court. To raise a little money, she had to pawn her jewels immediately after her accession, and the very expenses of her coronation had to be provided by Jews in the city, who, keenly watching the political horizon, thought she might be safely trusted with small sums—at good interest, deducted beforehand. In November, 1553, Lazarus Tucker lent her fifty thousand pounds at fourteen per cent., but would go no further in speculation, even at twenty-five, so that Christians had to be appealed to for a loan at thirty per cent. In January, 1554, just before the breaking out of the Wyatt insurrection, the Jews, scenting the storm in the air, got clamorous to have their cash returned, and the queen was fain to appeal to Thomas Gresham, a rich city merchant, to find her a hundred thousand pounds, “at low interest or high.” Kaiser Charles, who received about the same time five millions in gold from his possessions in the New World, was kind enough soon after, while bribing the councillors, to make her a handsome present; but all this vanished soon among a crowd of harpies, including an army of priests and monks, hanging about the court, and towards the end of the spring of 1554, while anxiously expecting her lord from over the seas, Mary found herself more poor and more helpless from want of cash than ever. Prince Philip was expected to bring large sums, but the necessities in the meanwhile increased, for a fleet had to be fitted out to receive him, and convey him and his cash safely to the English shore. This was the more difficult, as the navy of England had been allowed in the preceding reign to dwindle down to the lowest proportions, while the power of France at sea, in constant struggle with the fleets of Kaiser Charles, had gone on increasing until it had become more than a match for Spain. Count Egmont's matrimonial embassy had to steal over from Calais to Dover in the dead of night, and even then scarcely escaped the crowd of French men-of-war which kept hovering in the channel, ready to pounce upon any vessel bearing the flag of the Kaiser. All this was done, as the French government declared, out of sheer friendship to England, and paradoxical as it seemed, the assertion was not without truth.

The feeling with which England was looked upon on the continent, during the preparations for the Spanish marriage, was strikingly illustrated by a remarkable conversation which took place between Mary's ambassador at Paris, Dr. Nicholas Wotton, and the prime minister of Henri II., the great Constable Montmorency. The conversation, as reported by Wotton, was extremely cordial on the part of Montmorency, exhibiting his friendly feeling towards England no less than his political sagacity. “I have used to talk ever frankly with you,” the constable began, “and I cannot but say unto you as I think, that I do much lament your state of England.” “Why so, sir?” interrupted Wotton. “Why so?” exclaimed the constable; “you are a man that hath travelled abroad, and you know in what state all countries are where Spaniards bear any rule. Sicily, Naples, Lombardy, Sienna when they had it, and all other places where they have had any authority, do you not know how they are oppressed by the Spaniards, and in what bondage and misery they live? Even so you must look to be in England, for at the beginning, as they do everywhere, they will speak fair and gently unto you, till the time they have made themselves somewhat strong in the realm, and won to them some of the great men of the realm, and then will they begin to get your ships into their hands, and likewise those few forts which you have, yea, and will build new in places meet for their purpose; and so a little and a little usurp still more, till they have all at their commandment.” The reply of Wotton was not bad, for he told the constable he feared that, should the Spaniards “take too much authority upon us in England,” the people would take the law into their own hands and kick them out. “But whatsoever I said therein,” Wotton continued, “the constable still persisted that we should feel his words to be true within a while.”

The fleet which was ordered to bring Prince Philip to England got ready at Plymouth, at the beginning of May, but before starting a mutiny broke out among the sailors. They declared themselves obedient to Lord Howard and his officers, yet refused to obey the orders of the privy council, which, they said, was in league with the foreigners, who were coming into the country. Simon Renard, as soon as he heard of the insubordination of the crews, declared to the queen that it was impossible that Prince Philip should trust himself on board the English fleet, and that his departure from Spain, therefore, would have to be postponed until a sufficient number of his own vessels could be got ready to serve as an escort. Mary stormed and cried, threatened to hang all her sailors, and to die under the weight of her own misery, but was compelled in the end to sign an order to the lord high admiral not to go to Spain, but to remain with his fleet in the English Channel. This was all that Howard wanted, and the mutiny of the sailors, not got up without his knowledge, was instantly suppressed, while a revolt of a different kind, and scarcely less serious, became visible in the queen's privy council. From the commencement of Mary's reign, the members of the government had been divided in two factions, a majority, headed by Gardiner, representing absolutism in politics and intolerance in religious matters, and a minority, led by Sir William Paget, advocating more liberal forms of administration both in church and state. Backed by the queen, the majority at first was all-powerful and overbearing; but gradually, with the fear of Spanish despotism, which even ultra-conservative papists did not desire, becoming stronger and stronger, there was a marked change, until at last Paget got so far as to be listened to with some attention in the council. The liberal party now gained daily in influence, Pembroke, Arundel, Sussex, and other nobles joining it, and finally also Lord Howard. In him was vested for the moment the command of all the material forces of England, and the promise of his assistance emboldened Paget and his friends to attempt a palace revolution. As soon as the order had been issued that the fleet should remain in the channel, a secret meeting was held by the liberal members of the government, and the decision was come to of throwing Gardiner into the Tower, of putting a stop to the Spanish match, and of entering into an intimate alliance with France.

The plot was well laid, and might have succeeded but for the extreme vigilance of the lord chancellor. His spies were everywhere, and he had no sooner received notice of the designs against him, when he hurried to the queen, imploring her aid and assistance. Hearing that her marriage was to be prevented, Mary naturally suggested at once the gallows as the proper remedy, and Gardiner had some difficulty in showing her that this would not do under the circumstances. After a lengthened discussion—carefully reported to his master by the over-wakeful Renard—it was resolved “for the present to dissemble with Paget, Arundel, and their friends, and to look narrowly into all they do.” It was further decided by Mary and her chancellor, “that no gentleman shall bring to court more than two servants, that the earl of Sussex shall be sent into Sussex, the earl of Huntingdon into his country, the earl of Shrewsbury to the north, the earl of Derby to his country, and all others belonging to the party hither and thither under some pretence of employment.” To prevent a sudden arrest of Gardiner by his enemies, the queen also sent an order to the lieutenant of the Tower not to receive him in case he should be delivered there under warrant of the privy council, and together with this, notice was given him to convey the Princess Elizabeth quietly by water to Richmond, and from thence to Windsor Castle, where she was to be left in safe custody. It was the fear that Elizabeth might be proclaimed queen at a sudden rising in the city and change in the government, which caused this order; nevertheless, Mary had the mortification of seeing that, even as a captive, her sister was far more popular than she. Under the impression that the princess was set at liberty, when she was only transferred from one prison to another, the people broke forth in joyful acclamations on seeing her issue from the Tower; and the German merchants in the Steelyard, all good Lutherans and somewhat of democrats in the bargain, had the boldness to fire salvoes of artillery while her barge was passing up the river. True to the arrangement entered into with Gardiner, “for the present to dissemble,” the queen kept down her rage, reserving it for future explosion. Love and hatred alike kept waiting for the prince of Spain.

As the time when the Prince was to come drew nearer, Mary's brain seemed to turn in a culminated of love-sick frenzy. She set about wandering day and night, tormenting herself by imagining dangers that might befall her adored bridegroom, and all the perils from which he would have to escape before he could come to her embrace. There were the storm-launched waves of the wild Bay of Biscay, the French ships of war hovering all over the Atlantic, and even her own ships and sailors, commanded by a mutinous lord, all in league against the life and liberty of the beloved one. A thousand deaths appeared to lie in wait for him; a million of enemies seemed to stand around him. To ease the fearful excitement of her mind, Mary sought refuge in prayers. For days she kept lying outstretched before the images of saints, imploring their assistance, and moistening the ground with her tears; and again for days she walked in procession around Westminster Abbey, with files of priests and monks, preceded by flags and banners and bishops in gilt slippers. But it was all in vain; the heated blood refused to be calmed by prayer, and fierce passion remained unsubdued by the solemn chants of monks and priests. Unable to bear the torments of her heart any longer, the queen at last fled the court, and buried herself in the solitudes of Richmond Palace. Yet the demon-spirits would not fly, and new apprehensions, new anxieties, and new terrors continued to lay hold of her enfeebled brain. A thought more overwhelmingly distressing than any other now took possession of her—the thought that the many sufferings she had undergone had made her prematurely old and ugly, so that she would never be able to win the affection of the noble being whom she loved to distraction. She startled her maids of honour in the dead of the night by wild hysterical shrieks, ending in bursts of tears and long wailings of utter misery and despair. The last sparks of reason were fast vanishing, when at length the news arrived that the bridegroom was on his way.

Prince Philip felt scarcely less unhappy than the elderly queen who was dying for love of him. Cold, cruel, and selfish, of measureless pride, yet wanting in ambition, he was most reluctant to give his hand to a bride nearly old enough to be his mother, and for whose royal dowry even he entertained contempt. Philip had nothing of his great father but the outward traits, the grey eyes, yellow beard, and broad Tentonic forehead; in all his mental qualities, in manners, habits, thoughts, and sentiments, he was not a German but a Spaniard, possessed of nearly all the vices but scarcely any of the virtues of that nation. Brought up under the eye of fanatic Jesuits, destitute alike of knowledge and of wisdom; united at an early age to a Portuguese princess as ignorant and bigoted as himself, but who soon left him a widower, Philip had grown, by the time that his father commanded him to marry the queen of England, a low sensual hypocrite, the absolute tool of priests, and the slave of his own disordered passions. As such he was naturally unwilling to enter into matrimony with a very plain elderly person; but to disobey the order of his imperial parent, despot to his son as much as to his subjects, was out of the question, and all he could do was to protract his time of departure to the obnoxious bride and the hated barbarian country in which he was to be king, as long as possible. Under various pretexts he delayed his journey for several months; all, however, came to an end in the month of June, when the great Kaiser, laid up in the Netherlands with gout and ill-humour, sent the command that his son should start immediately, in company with six thousand Spanish infantry, urgently required in the war against France. Philip, very miserable at the dreary prospects before him, embarked at Corunna in the beginning of July, his retinue and troops filling one hundred and fifty ships. The voyage did not contribute to cheer the spirits of the handsome bridegroom for whom a queen was waiting night and day, for he got dreadfully sea-sick, and wished himself at the bottom of the Atlantic. The whole of the courtiers, nobles, and six thousand fighting men felt equally disturbed by the motion of the waves, and their sufferings were increased by the terror of French men-of-war, known to be on the look-out for the sea-sick armada. To escape them, the order was issued to fire no guns whatever, and to make no more noise than absolutely indispensable for the working of the ships. Thus in gloom and silence the big fleet crept over the sea, till, on the 19th of July, the stately cliffs of the Isle of Wight refreshed the eyes of the unfortunate prince and his companions. At the Needles the navy of England was drawn up in battle order, to receive Philip with all the respect due to his exalted rank and position. The lord high admiral, grimly looking at the detested visitors, was prepared to honour the the Spanish prince, as ordered; he expected, however, that the first compliments should be paid to his own flag, in accordance with naval usage. But the Spaniards neglected to lower their topsails, whereupon Howard, without further ceremony, gave order to fire into their fleet. A hissing bullet was the first salute greeting the husband of the queen of England.

Philip landed at Southampton on Friday, the 20th of July, and his reception soon showed him that the nobility of England were ready to make amends by crawling humility for any want of deference shown by the lord admiral. When stepping from his barge on to the landing-place in the harbour, the whole assembly of nobles, gentlemen, and courtiers including nearly all the peers of the realm, fell on their knees, while the earl of Arundel, likewise kneeling presented him with the order of the Garter. Notwithstanding this undeniable proof of respect, the prince felt shy and uncomfortable. To be prayed at, after all, seemed but a poor compensation for the chance of being shot at; and to guard against further accidents, Philip had put a shirt of mail, of fine texture, bullet and dagger-proof, under his silken doublet. Behind and around him walked a crowd of Spanish musketeers, disguised as pages, lackeys, and footmen, while in front the way was cleared by other soldiers, personating chaplains, heralds, and trumpeters. Thus prepared for residence in England, the prince with great solemnity bestrode a horse, richly caparisoned, which his bride had sent him as a present, and went to pay his devotions at Holyrood church. The next two days were spent in banquets and festivities, all of a dreary and dismal kind. The excessive pride, reserve, and marvellous complication of etiquette to which Philip was accustomed, prevented any, even of the greatest nobles, to get near him, besides which all conversation was made impossible by his utter ignorance of both English and French. He could speak a little Latin, but the Spanish pronunciation differing altogether from that taught at Oxford and Cambridge verbal intercourse proved a failure, too, by this medium; and what little communication of ideas there was, had to be carried on either through interpreters or by means of signs or grimaces. However, the hospitable lords, if they could not talk with the husband of their queen, insisted on feeding him well, and on the Sunday afternoon, the third day of his sojourn at Southampton, Philip had to go through the torture of a grand public dinner, with English waiters, English roast-beef, and English ale. The prince tasted the beef of old England, and, to be polite, emptied a tankard of ale; after which he suddenly retired. That night his imperial highness felt worse than when sailing across the Bay of Biscay.

It rained heavily when Philip arrived at Southampton, and it rained still more heavily when he left it, on the Monday following. He would have gladly stopped a day longer, not being in the least anxious to meet his elderly bride, who was expecting him with passionate longing at Winchester; but his own etiquette was peremptory, allowing no changes on account of the elements. After waiting till nearly noon, he had to set out in a raging storm, the tempest howling from over the sea, the rain pouring down in torrents, and the roads filled with bottomless mud. But there was nothing but to brave it; so he jumped on his grey gelding, wrapped himself tight in his scarlet coat, and spurred on towards the old cathedral city. It took full five hours to get over the twelve miles of mud, and evening approached before Winchester was reached. Never neglecting, under any circumstances, his devotions, Philip at once hurried to the cathedral to kiss the crucifix and say his prayers, and then retired to seek some rest at the deanery. But this was too much for the patience of the excited queen, who had taken up her quarters near the deanery, at the bishop's palace, and banishing all considerations of female modesty, she sent a message to Philip, begging he would come to see her. He was conducted into her presence by torch-light, and gave her the bridal kiss; after which he threw etiquette so far aside as to kiss all the maids of honour, thus liberally interpreting an English custom of which he had heard. The next day there was a grand public reception, when Mary took no trouble to disguise her amorous feelings, careful, however, to keep her maids at a long distance, beyond reach of Philip's politeness. Simon Renard, who had remained close to the heels of the prince from the moment he set foot on English soil, was gratified on seeing him "converse with the queen for nearly two hours," which fact he at once communicated to the Kaiser. What were the strange subjects talked of in this two hours' conversation, Simon Renard neglected to inform his imperial master; but he did not forget to report that the queen, getting more and more excited and overwhelmingly loving, at length "ordered wine to be brought and drank to the prince," which, explained the diplomatist, "is the custom here in England."

Philip led his haggard bride to the altar on the 25th of July, the festival of St. James, patron saint of Spain. Crammer having been in prison for months previous, there was no archbishop of Canterbury to perform the ceremony, and Gardiner had to fill his place for the occasion in his own cathedral, representing at the same moment, as he had good cause to do, the highest political and ecclesiastical dignities of the realm. The bridegroom's dress, minutely described by Renard, was superb. "His breeches and doublet," the ambassador informed his master, "were white, the collar of the doublet exceeding rich, and over all a mantle of rich cloth of gold, a present from the queen, who wore one of the same; this robe was ornamented with pearls and precious stones. And thus dressed, wearing the collar of the Garter, and attended by many noblemen in rich apparel, he proceeded to the church, where, on his entry, there struck up a joyous concert of trumpets, clarions, and other sorts of music." The poor old bride, anxious to appear as good-looking as pearls and jewels could make her, lost overmuch time in dressing. "The prince," reported Renard, "waited more than half an hour for the queen, who came splendidly attired, and attended by the nobles and ladies of England, as well as by many of the lords of Spain. They were then betrothed; and, entering farther into the body of the church, surrounded by the nobility and six bishops who were present, the marquis de Figueroa delivered to the prince, on the part of the emperor, a parchment scroll, making at the same time a speech. After reading the document, the prince presented it to the queen, who handed it to the chancellor of England, and he, likewise perusing it, publicly proclaimed that the emperor had made a present to his son, the prince, of the kingdom of Naples. At the same time they sent for a sword of state, there being none there except the queen's sword of state, which having come, it was delivered to the earl of Pembroke, who carried it before the prince, while the earl of Derby bore the queen's sword. Having arrived further up in the body of the church, the bishop of Winchester married them with great ceremony, as the case required, and a solemn mass was sung, which lasted from twelve to three. Coming out of the church, the queen and her husband walked hand-in-hand back to the palace." At the banquet which followed, the earl of Arundel presented the ewer, and the marquis of Winchester the napkin, "none being seated," according to Renard, "except the king and queen"—a rather startling introduction of Spanish etiquette. From the moment of his marriage Philip assumed an excessive pride and haughtiness, surrounding his august person with a network of absurd ceremonies, which excited the ridicule of nobles as well as the people.

The Spanish fleet and army which had brought the queen's husband did not leave the shore of England at once after his arrival, but remained more than a month in Southampton harbour, for the evident purpose of watching the course of events, and the mode of reception accorded by the people to Philip. As far as he himself was concerned, there was not the slightest show of hostility—impossible, in a manner, as he kept carefully aloof from all society, shutting himself up in the inner recesses of regal pomp and ceremony, like a god in the clouds. It was much easier for his attendants to gauge the public feeling, and they did not find it altogether pleasant. They were shouted after in the streets, and greeted with coarse abuse by the mob, while in many instances they could only save themselves from bodily ill-treatment by precipitate flight. Under these circumstances, Gardiner and Renard, who had now become virtually invested with supreme power, thought it prudent to postpone the entry of their majesties into London for a while, and they were moved in slow stages from Winchester to Windsor Castle, and from thence, in the second week of August, to Richmond Palace, the queen all lost in bliss, but Philip full of weariness, not hiding from Renard his desire of going back to Spain at the earliest opportunity. It took all the eloquence of the indefatigable envoy to prove to him that his departure before the end of a decent six months was altogether impossible; to amuse the idol of the queen in the meanwhile, a splendid reception in the metropolis was planned and duly carried out. The spectacle took place on the 18th of August, the gallows on which the bones of the Kentish insurgents were rotting in the wind having been removed a day or two previously, to the great joy of the citizens, who now resolved to do their utmost in the display of plaster, paint, and cloth of gold. Mary and Philip had rested the previous night at Southwark, and made their entry over London Bridge, at the corners of which the two London saints, Gog and Magog, were stuck up as warders. An immense crowd had congregated to stare at the royal procession, and though there was no enthusiasm of any kind, the greeting was more cordial than expected, the women in particular, who had fancied to behold some frightful monster in the Spanish prince, exhibiting agreeable surprise in seeing him a very good-looking young man. Among the spectators who stood looking at the gorgeous train as it swept through the city, was one John Elder, surnamed the Redshank, or the Highlander, who furnished his friend, the bishop of Caithness, with a good description of the personal appearance of the queen's husband. "Of visage," wrote Redshank, "he is well favoured, with a broad forehead and grey eyes, straight-nosed, and manly countenance. From the forehead to the point of his chin, his face groweth small; his pace is princely, and his gait so straight and upright as he loseth no inch of height, with a yellow head and a yellow beard. And, to conclude, he is so well-proportioned of body, arm, leg, and every other limb to the same, as nature cannot work a more perfect pattern." The sun shone down his hottest rays while the yellow-bearded Spanish prince and his elderly bride went riding, in all the pomp of royalty, from London Bridge to Whitehall, and nothing disturbed the splendour of the scene but a slight incident in the heart of the city, which upset the equanimity of the most important personage in the procession, Bishop Gardiner. He beheld with horror, on arriving at the great conduit in Gracechurch street, which had been newly painted, the figure of King Henry VIII. presenting a book to his son and successor, on which was written "Verbum Dei." The artist was summoned immediately before Gardiner, and being threatened with prison, humbly apologized for his error of taste, promising that his brush should make amends at once. That same day, the Bible which Henry held in his outstretched hands was painted over, and the king had given to him instead—a pair of kid gloves.

The marriage festivities over, both Gardiner and Renard had to think of forwarding the great objects for which they had been working all along. To reconcile England to the orthodox faith of Rome was the principal aim of the lord chancellor, while the ambassador of Charles was bent solely on establishing the power of his master on a firm basis, and on securing it for the present as well as for future generations. Now that his alliance with England had become an irrevocable fact, the Kaiser showed himself less jealous than before of the interference of Rome, and at the enticements of Gardiner, who had been gained entirely to his cause, consented to allow Cardinal Pole to continue his journey as papal legate. However, it was necessary before the cardinal could fulfil his mission that a parliament should be called together to revoke the attainder passed against him in the reign of Henry VIII., and the meeting of the legislature being desirable for various other purposes, it was resolved upon by the government. There remained, however, the great difficulty of getting a parliament sufficiently pliable to do all that both the pope and the Kaiser wished to be done, that is, to consent to the religious as well as the political dependency of the kingdom. The House of Commons which had been summoned three months before Philip's arrival, had shown such a spirit of insubordination as to be not only useless but dangerous to the executive, and Gardiner was not without fears that its successor would follow in the same course. After long debates in the privy council, and more important conferences with Renard, the lord chancellor came to evolve a great scheme for procuring a legislative assembly entirely after his liking, and the writs thereupon were issued on the 6th of October. Rather more than a week before, the hearts of the good people of London had been delighted by the view of twenty enormous cars, containing fourscore and seventeen chests of the purest silver, which went rolling through the narrow streets of the city into the Tower, to be coined into lawful money of the realm. It was a loan of the ruler of all the Indies to his beloved daughter-in-law, and the news of it was received with great and general enthusiasm, creating numerous friends to the Spanish alliance. To encourage the loyal feeling which had thus arisen, the lord chancellor issued circulars to the mayors of all towns, to sheriffs, and other influential persons, entreating them to use all their influence in the forthcoming elections for parliament to get members, "such as being eligible by order of the laws, were of a wise, grave, and Catholic sort; such as, indeed, meant the true honour of God and the prosperity of the commonwealth." The effect of these injunctions was all that could be desired, and the city of London having commenced the elections by returning four members "of a wise, grave, and Catholic sort," the example was followed throughout the provinces, and before the month was over, Gardiner knew that he had become possessed of a new lever with which to turn back the course of English history.

Parliament met on the 12th of November, and, after an opening speech by the lord chancellor, in which he stated his intention to bring forward several measures "for the establishment of religion," proceeded at once to repeal the attainder of Cardinal Pole, which was done without a dissentient voice. Thereupon two members of the privy council, Lord Paget and Sir William Hastings, accompanied by Sir William Cecil, who had read the signs of the times and become a good Catholic, started at once for the continent to bring the papal legate into England with all the honours due to his exalted rank. They were introduced at Brussels by Sir John Mason, the English ambassador, to Kaiser Charles, to whom they tendered their humble request "that it might like his majesty to license Cardinal Pole to depart as shortly as might stand with his pleasure, and to give him also at his departing such good counsel and advice as might seem to his great wisdom fit and convenient." Charles granted the request immediately, receiving the envoys with the greatest affability, and telling them that, "among many great benefits for which he thought himself much bounden unto God this was one of the greatest, that it had pleased him to hold his blessed hand over the realm of England." Quitting the imperial presence, the envoys went straightway to Cardinal Pole, who seemed overcome with joy and gratitude at the prospect of realizing the great dream of his life, and becoming an instrument in bringing his native country back to the fold of the universal church. "His gladness at our coming," Paget reported to the queen and her husband, "we cannot in words describe to your majesties, nor yet what speech he used to set forth how much he was bounden unto your majesties for your gracious disposition towards him, and how much both you and he were bounden to Almighty God for the bending of your hearts this ways." But, enthusiastic as he felt at the great mission before him, Pole was yet unable to drag his feeble body forward as fast as he would have wished. A life of rigid asceticism and constant severe study, had prematurely broken his strength, and though only fifty-four years, he was overcome already with the decrepitude of extreme old age. Under these circumstances, the English envoys, whose train, together with the cardinal's household, amounted to one hundred and twenty horses, had to proceed homeward in slow stages of four or five miles a day, at the pace of a funeral procession. The journey from Brussels to Calais took a whole week, but the cardinal found himself amply repaid for the fatigue of this exertion by the manner in which he was received at his arrival within the English pale. He was met in state at Calais by the governor, Lord Wentworth, and made his entry into the city under the ringing of bells, the firing of salutes, and the joyous acclamations of the multitude. The watchword of the garrison in the night after Pole's arrival was, "God, long lost, is found."

On Tuesday, the 20th of November, the cardinal legate set foot on the shore of England, prepared to tie the kingdom once more to the rock of Rome from which it had been adrift for twenty years. Moving slowly towards London in regal magnificence, and received everywhere, and particularly at the doors of churches or cathedrals, with the greatest enthusiasm, the cardinal did not doubt for a moment the willingness and even anxiety of the people to return to the spiritual rule of the pontiff. At Canterbury, the archdeacon addressed him in a passionate oration, exclaiming, "Thou art here, and thou art our Polar star, to light us to the kingdom of the heavens. Sky, rivers, earth, those disfigured walls, all things long for thee. While thou wert absent from us, all things were sad, all things were in the power of the adversary. At thy coming all things are smiling, all glad, all tranquil." From Canterbury the cardinal moved slowly onward to Gravesend, where a fleet of vessels was waiting to convey him to Whitehall. In front of all was a splendid barge, distinguished by a large silver cross upon the bow, and entering it, Pole ordered his legatine insignia to be displayed, so as to enter the capital of England openly as representative of the pope. At noon on Saturday, the 24th of November, the barge with the silver cross was carried by the upward tide under London Bridge, the banks of the river filled by excited crowds, and a few minutes after the cardinal landed at the palace stairs of Whitehall, received by Gardiner and all the lords of the privy council. Mary and her husband had sat down to dinner, not expecting the cardinal till the afternoon, but as soon as they heard of his arrival they hurried away from the table to meet him. The queen met Pole at the head of the grand staircase, and in a paroxysm of hysterical joy threw herself into his arms, covering him with kisses, and telling him that his arrival was greater happiness to her than the possession of a kingdom. The cardinal legate, with corresponding exultation, drew himself to his full height, exclaiming, "Ave Maria, gratia plena, Dominus tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus"—"Hail Mary, thou highly favoured, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women." The queen at these words began to feel faint, and retired; but sent a message to the cardinal, informing him that at his salutation she had felt that "the babe leaped in her womb."

Mary had been for some time under the impression that she was pregnant, her disordered brain creating fancies harmonising with the ill-regulated desires of a weak body. There was not the least foundation for her hope of possessing offspring; nevertheless, she persevered in it to the extent of ordering prayers for her safe delivery. On the 27th of November, three days after the pious parody of Holy Writ enacted at Whitehall Palace, the lord mayor and aldermen of London assembled, by command, at St. Paul's Cathedral, to be present at the commencement of a long course of prayers and thanksgivings. There was a thick fog spread all over London, and the fathers of the city felt very chilly and uncomfortable in their scarlet gowns, they were kept, nevertheless, for the greater part of the day at their posts, to listen to strange sermons and more strange proclamations of the queen. There were ten bishops seated in the choir, in whose presence Dr. Chadsey, one of the prebends of St. Paul's, delivered an oration on the text of the first chapter and thirteenth verse of Luke, "And the angel said unto her, 'Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God.'" After the sermon, which was of great length, and full of announcements of miracles to come, there was a grand procession around the cathedral, and the service finished by the whole circle of bishops invoking heaven to let the expected offspring of the queen be a male child, well-favoured, healthy, and witty, and with strength and valour sufficient to keep down all the enemies of the Holy Catholic Church. The devout prelates would have been horrified had heaven answered their prayers by a revelation of the truth, to learn that the queen was not pregnant at all, but only suffering from dropsy.

The arrival of Cardinal Pole was immediately followed by events of extraordinary gravity. On Wednesday, the 28th of November, the two houses of parliament were summoned to appear before the queen and her consort at Whitehall, to meet the papal legate, and to hear a statement from his lips. Few members failed to appear, and all having taken their seats, with a vast circle of lords and courtiers around them, the queen, splendidly dressed, swept into the room accompanied by Philip, and, as noticed by everybody, throwing out her person in such a manner as to justify the prayers of her loyal subjects. As soon as the sovereign and her husband had taken their seats under the cloth of state, with the cardinal legate at their right hand, Gardiner rose, and amidst general attention, commenced addressing the representatives of the nation. "My lords of the upper house," he exclaimed, "and you my masters of the nether house: here is present the right reverend father in God, the Lord Cardinal Pole, come from the Apostolic see of Rome, ambassador to the king's and queen's majesties, upon one of the weightiest causes that ever happened in this realm, and which pertaineth to the glory of God and your universal benefit; the which embassy it is their majesties' pleasure that it be signified unto you all by his own mouth, trusting that you will accept it in as benevolent and thankful wise as their highnesses have done, and that you will give an attent and inclinable ear to him." After this short introduction, the chancellor resumed his seat, and all eyes were fixed upon the old man, with long flowing beard hanging down upon his chest, who sat at the right hand of the queen, and now came forward with faltering steps. The vast assembly was hushed into deep silence when Cardinal Pole, last descendant of the royal race of the Plantagenets, commenced his address.

"My lords all, and you that are the commons of this present parliament," he began, in a voice so feeble that, notwithstanding the stillness of death which prevailed, it scarce was audible; "as the cause of my repair hither hath been wisely and gravely declared by my lord chancellor, so, before I enter into the particulars of my commission, I have to say somewhat touching myself, and to give most humble and hearty thanks to the king's and queen's majesties, and after them to you all, who, of a man exiled and banished from this commonwealth, have restored me to be a member of the same, and of a man having no place either here or elsewhere within this realm, have admitted me to a place where to speak and where to be heard." After dwelling at some length on the history of religion in England since its disavowance from the church of Rome, Cardinal Pole came to the main purport of his speech. "No church can be built," he exclaimed, his voice growing louder in the excitement of the moment, "no church can be built unless universally, in all realms, we adhere to one head, and do acknowledge him to be the vicar of God and to have power from above. For all power is of God, according to the saying, 'Non est potestas nisi in Deo.' And all power being of God, he hath divided that power into two parts here on earth, which is into the powers imperial and ecclesiastical; and these two powers, as they are several and distinct, so have they two several effects and operations. Secular princes be ministers of God to execute vengeance upon transgressors and evil livers, and to preserve the well-doers and innocents from injury and violence, and this power is represented in these two most excellent persons, the king's and queen's majesties here present. The other power is of ministration, which is the power of keys and orders in the ecclesiastical estate, which is by the authority of God's word and example of the apostles, and of all holy fathers from Christ hitherto, attributed and given to the Apostolic See of Rome by special prerogative: from which See I am here deputed legate and ambassador, having full and ample commission from thence, and have the keys committed to my hands. I confess to you that I have the keys—not as mine own keys, but as the keys of him that sent me; and yet cannot I open, not for want of power in me to give, but for certain impediments in you to receive, which must be taken away before my commission can take effect. But this I protest before you, my commission is not of prejudice to any person. I am not come to destroy, but to build; I come to reconcile, not to condemn; I am not come to compel, but to call again; I am not come to call anything in question already done. My commission is of grace and clemency to such as will receive it; for touching all matters that are past, they shall be as things cast into the sea of forgetfulness."

Pole's address made a powerful impression upon the whole assembly. Its eloquence touched some, but its substantial promises converted many more to the doctrine preached by the legate. There were few either among the lords or commons who cared very deeply whether the new liturgy or the old mass formed part of the church service; whether priests had wives or lived unmarried; whether it was or was not the law of the land to believe in transubstantiation. But what they all took an intense interest in was to retain their estates—estates formerly belonging to the church, but now in the hands of the very class which professed to represent the nation in the two houses of parliament. There was not a single member among the lords, and very few among the commons, not possessed of church property, and all were ready to a man, rather than give it up, to risk their heads, or to make a revolution, and drive queen, bishops, and priests out of the land. But the soft and eloquent speech of the cardinal legate made any opposition unnecessary, and his firm assurance that "all matters that be past" should be "as things cast into the sea of forgetfulness" was received with the greatest applause, giving universal satisfaction. Gardiner spoke the sense of the august assembly, after the queen and Philip, together with Cardinal Pole, had retired, in exclaiming, in a sort of frenzy, "A prophet has the Lord raised up among us from among our brethren, and he shall save us." No time was lost to carry the saving process into execution. The day after the assembly at Whitehall, Thursday, November the 29th, the two houses of parliament met at Westminster, and the chancellor in the lords and the speaker in the commons both put from the chair at the same time the question whether England should return to obedience to the Holy Apostolic See. An alteration in the duty upon sheep's wool would have provoked a long discussion; but the spiritual independence of the kingdom was too trifling a matter to honourable members to detain them more than a few minutes. The lords voted the return of England to popish servitude without a single dissentient voice; while among the commons, in a full house of three hundred and sixty members, there were just two men possessed of sufficient religious conviction, or sufficiently honest, to give a negative vote. Of these two representatives of the English nation, one, Sir Ralph Bagenall, recanted the next day, so that there remained only a single individual, a nameless being to all the old chroniclers of Mary's reign, unwilling to sacrifice the spiritual gains of a generation for court favours or Spanish gold. Simon Renard scarcely calumniated the governing classes with whom he was in contact by telling his master that riches were all they aimed at, "it being otherwise not only difficult but well nigh impossible to foresee what these English may do, whose natural character is inconstant, fickle, and faithless." Count Micheli, ambassador of the republic of Venice at the court of Mary, a very shrewd diplomatic gentleman, informed his government about the same time, in playful irony, that the English were so loyal as to be ready to turn Jews or Turks if it should please their sovereign to issue the command. The observant Italian could scarcely arrive at any other conclusion, remembering the parliament of 1534, which, with wonderful alacrity, overthrew the supremacy of Rome, and contrasting it with this parliament of 1554, which, with still more marvellous haste, voted popery back into England. The spectacle would have been of the saddest, but for the great fact—great and stupendous, although invisible to diplomatic gentlemen, lord chancellors, ministers, and privy councillors—that the mighty body of the English nation, toiling and thinking, but not voting, was Protestant long before the Yeas of the parliament of King Henry, and remained Protestant in spite of the Noes of the lords and commons of Queen Mary.

The parliamentary vote of the 29th of November was followed, the next day, by a grand and impressive ceremony, in which the return of England to the supremacy of the pope was celebrated with all the pomp of the Roman Catholic church. On the morning of the day, high mass was said at Westminster Abbey, in the presence of Philip, surrounded by six hundred Spanish cavaliers and all the knights of the Garter in their gorgeous costumes, together with the chief representatives of the English nobility. The queen, however, was not at the service, the fear of her supposed pregnancy, kept up with the greatest strictness, forbidding any exercise whatever. High mass being over, Philip and his immense suite returned to Whitehall Palace, in the great chamber of which a throne, covered with cloth of gold, had been erected, with a number of benches in front, sufficiently large to accommodate the members of both houses of parliament. It was late in the afternoon before all the preparations had been finished, and then the doors were thrown open, and the faithful lords and commons invited to take their seats, the bishops in a circle to the right of the royal chair, the lay peers in an opposite circle to the left, and the commons on diagonal cross benches. Immediately after, Mary and Philip ascended the steps of the throne with the cardinal legate; the queen walking very slowly, indicating her supposed condition with painful exactness. All being seated, Gardiner stepped forward, and, kneeling before the queen, informed her that the two houses of parliament had declared by a simultaneous vote the earnest desire of her subjects to return to the allegiance of the head of the Catholic church, and that the vote of the national representatives had been embodied in the form of a petition. Then, turning round to the lords and commons, Gardiner, speaking slowly, in tones reverberating through the vast hall, exclaimed, "Will you that I proceed in your names to supplicate for your absolution, that we may be received again into the body of the Holy Catholic Church, under the pope, the supreme head thereof?" "Yea!" the assembly cried, as with one voice. Again the chancellor knelt down before the queen, presenting her a parchment scroll, which she handed to Philip, who looked at it for a moment, and returned it to Gardiner, motioning that it might be read. Bowing to the ground, the chancellor proceeded to obey the order.

"We, the lords spiritual and temporal," he read aloud, "and we, the commons of the present parliament assembled, representing the whole body of the realm of England and dominions of the same, in our own names particularly, and also of the said body universally, in this our application directed to your majesties, with most humble suit that it may, by your gracious intercession and means, be exhibited to the most reverend father in God, the Lord Cardinal Pole, legate, sent specially hither from our most holy father Pope Julius the Third, and the See Apostolic of Rome—we do declare ourselves very sorry and repentant for the schism and disobedience committed in this realm against the said See Apostolic, either by making, agreeing, or executing any laws, ordinances, or commandments against the said See, or otherwise doing or speaking what might impugn the same." After further expressions of deep penitence and sorrow, the petition continued: "We most humbly beseech your majesties, as persons undelivered in the offences of this body towards the Holy See, to set forth this our most humble suit that we may obtain from the See Apostolic, as well particularly as universally, absolution, release, and discharge from all danger of such censures and sentences as by the laws of the church we be fallen in; and that we may, as children repentant, be received into the bosom and unity of Christ's church, so that this noble realm, with all the members thereof, may in unity and perfect obedience to the See Apostolic serve God and your majesties, to the furtherance and advancement of his honour and glory."

It was nearly dark before the chancellor had concluded the reading of this document. Faint rays of light only came flickering through the hall, showing the throne, and the pale features of the queen, disturbed by unutterable agony. All on a sudden, she sank on her knees, Philip and the whole assembly following her example. Then, in darkness and in silence, the low voice of the cardinal legate came floating through the air. "Our Lord Jesus Christ," rang the unseen voice, "who with his most precious blood hath redeemed and washed us from all our sins and iniquities, that he might purchase unto himself a glorious spouse without spot or wrinkle, whom the Father hath appointed head over all his church—he by his mercy absolves you. And we, by apostolic authority given unto us by the most holy lord, Pope Julius the Third, his vicegerent on earth, do absolve and deliver you, and every one of you, with this whole realm and the dominions thereof, from all heresy and schism, and from all and every judgment, censure, and pain for that cause incurred. and we do restore you again into the unity of our mother the Holy Church, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." "Amen! Amen!" cried the whole assembly. Again there was dead silence, broken only by the sobs of the queen, who continued prostrate, wailing and moaning, burying her face in the golden cushions of the throne.

High masses in all the churches, illuminations, bonfires, and immense processions through the streets of London, with Cardinal Pole riding between the queen and Philip, blessing the people, followed in the wake of the impressive ceremony of Whitehall. This occupied about a week, and then came sterner work. The essential feature of Roman Catholicism, that of suppressing antagonistic opinions by brute force, instead of attempting conversion by arguments, had to be brought into play, and parliament having been found slavish enough to sanction any form and amount of religious despotism, the victorious champions of Rome began their task without delay. Knowing that the only opposition possibly to be expected among the lords and commons would be about the plunder of the church, the lord chancellor and his coadjutors commenced their proceedings by bringing in a bill "for the establishment of all spiritual and ecclesiastical possessions and hereditaments conveyed to the laity," which was passed with the greatest enthusiasm, leaving a disposition on the part of both houses to do all else that was required of them. An act for repealing the whole of the statutes, articles, and provisions made against the supremacy of the "most holy lord" the pontiff of Rome, since the 20th of Henry VIII., was next voted, with scarcely any discussion, while new statutes of treason were passed against all who should preach or speak against the authority or the title of the queen and her husband, as well as of that of their expected issue. It was likewise made high treason "to pray for the death of the queen." Finally, and to crown all, the lords and commons voted a short bill, entitled, "An act for the renewing of three statutes made for the punishment of heresies, and for the eschewing and avoiding of errors and heresies which of late years have risen, grown, and much increased within this realm," by which all the ancient sanguinary laws against Lollards and other dissenters from the church of Rome, which priestly fanaticism and bigotry had brought into the statute book, were renewed and put in force again. "Be it ordained and enacted," the act ran, "by the authority of this present parliament, that the statute made in the fifth year of the reign of King Richard the Second, concerning the arresting and apprehension of erroneous and heretical preachers, and one other statute made in the second year of the reign of King Henry the Fourth, concerning the repressing of heresies and punishment of heretics, and also one other statute made in the second year of King Henry the Fifth, concerning the suppression of heresy and Lollardy, and every article, branch, and sentence contained in the same three several statutes and every of them, shall, from the 20th day of January next coming, be revived and be in full force, strength, and effect, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, for ever." There was ample power in the act thus worded to murder every creature within the realm differing in religious views from the queen and her advisers; and the inclinations of the clerical prime minister and his coadjutor, the papal legate, coinciding with their true Romish opinions as to the necessity of annihilating their antagonists, they set about at once to inaugurate a reign of terror and fierce persecution of Protestants.

Parliament having fixed the 20th of January, 1555, as the legal commencement of the persecution, Gardiner and his friends began work the very same day. The chancellor associated with himself in the mighty task of murder five other prelates, the most notable of them Bonner, bishop of London, bloodhound by nature as well as education, and Tunstal, bishop of Durham, who owed his life to Protestant toleration, and was unable to forgive his enemies the great glory of not having put to death, in the whole of the preceding reign, a single popish fanatic. To simplify their task, the six bishops established themselves as a court of inquisition in the church of St. Mary Overy, at the Southwark side of London Bridge, conveniently situated for bringing up prisoners by water and silently despatching them the same way. The first victims brought before them were Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, and Rogers, a canon of St. Paul's, both notable leaders of the reformed church, and distinguished alike for their high scholastic acquirements and the purity of their lives. They were asked to make their submission to the head of the Roman Catholic church, and on refusing were at once condemned to be burnt. The sentence against Rogers, inaugurating the new reign of popery in England, was carried out on the 4th of February at Smithfield, while Bishop Hooper was burnt five days after at Gloucester, not far from his own cathedral. Both died with heroic fortitude, proclaiming their religious conviction in the midst of the flames, though suffering frightful tortures. The bishop, an old man of sixty, weak and suffering, was treated with hellish cruelty, being fastened to the stake almost naked, with an iron hoop around his waist, and wet faggots piled at his feet. The low smouldering wood, scorching his body and causing horrible pain without inflicting death, made him undergo the most excruciating torments for more than three quarters of an hour. His face was wholly burnt, and his lower limbs charred to ashes, before death released him, the frantic beating of his breast with his half-burnt hands all the while showing his agony, yet his undaunted spirit possessing still strength to cry, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" Twice he cried, more and more faint, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit!" then all was silent, and the flames went circling up into the air.

The six bishops at St. Mary Overy did not sit idle while their first victims were being prepared for death, but continued their work with uninterrupted energy, ordering the faggots to be lighted in all parts of the country. On the 8th of February, a zealous Protestant, named Laurence Sanders, was burnt at Coventry, and on the following day, another heroic, Rowland Taylor, accused of the crime of reading the Bible, was chained to the stake and set fire to at Aldham Common, in Suffolk. Two days later, the inquisition tried and condemned together six London Protestants, four of them working men, the fifth a merchant, and the sixth a preacher, for denying the doctrine of transubstantiation. All behaved with the greatest fortitude, eager to face death rather than deny their religion; the working men in particular exhibiting a courage which astonished even the fanatic priests.

One of them, Tomkins, a weaver, on being sneeringly asked by Bishop Bonner whether he thought he could endure the flames, calmly replied, "I will show you!" and, stretching forth his right hand over a lighted taper, had it burned to the bone without uttering a sound. Such marvellous exhibitions of heroism could not fail to make the greatest impression upon the people, giving to the Protestant faith a halo of glory which it had never before possessed, and encouraging its disciples to persevere more than ever in the assertion of its truth. The persecuting priests, however, got only more enraged at the visible effects of popular sympathy, and continued their task of murder with hideous zeal. The six London heretics were burnt at various places in or near the capital; after which the inquisition laid hold of another man of note, Robert Ferrars, bishop of St. David's. A quiet man, holding no extreme opinions, and of great uprightness of character, Ferrars, after having been tried and sentenced to death by the priestly tribunal at St. Mary Overy's, imagined that he might save his life by an appeal to Cardinal Pole, to whom he addressed a modest although dignified petition for mercy. The only reply was an order to despatch the bishop with all haste, and he was burnt in front of his own palace at Caermarthen, so that his wife and child might see his sufferings. It showed a singular innocence in this poor martyr to hope for a moment that a papal legate, possessed of no more important function than that of extirpating heresy by fire and sword, would interpose to save him from the stake.

Cardinal Pole was not naturally a cruel man, but acted solely upon the guiding principle of his faith in letting loose and encouraging by all means in his power the persecution against English Protestants. A church based entirely on blind belief, acknowledging one irresponsible and infallible chief, and opposed absolutely and in its very essence to the assertion of spiritual independence in its members, could, he was perfectly aware, do nothing else with Protestantism than blot it out from the face of the earth. To try the effects of persuasion on church reformers was to leave the platform of strict faith and go over to that of reasoning, which in itself was a negation of the fundamental truth of Roman Catholicism, involving its earlier or later destruction. These were motives quite sufficient to influence the cardinal legate in setting out upon the crusade against the church reformers; but, besides these, he had two more worldly reasons in encouraging his zeal. The first was his ambition to grasp the papal tiara, only to be won by unflinching orthodoxy; and the second his desire to please the queen, so as to be at least one of the rulers of England until he might become dictator of the Christian world. Mary's brain was too weak to understand the subtle reasons of the Romish church hierarchy for keeping the hangman at work, and treating murder as a high art; but the fierce lust of blood inherent in her animal nature was gratified by the roasting of heretics all through the kingdom, and Cardinal Pole knew as well as Bishop Gardiner, that to keep the faggots burning would be the service most appreciated by her majesty. Those shrewd observers could not fail to see, too, that the love of blood was developing itself more and more in Mary as time went on, and the weight of new sorrows came crushing upon her. Handsome Philip, at whose feet she crawled with dog-like affection, openly showed that he did not care for her and could not reciprocate her passion; and while he was running after other women, she was left the prey of the deadliest jealousy. To aggravate it, Philip expressed a constant desire to quit the kingdom, and the idea that he might leave, and never return to her arms again, was enough to drive her into wild despair. Only one hope was remaining in the expectation that the pride of paternity would retain him at her side, even if his other feelings would be against it. To this hope the queen clung, and maddened by fanaticism, jealousy, and lust, she more and more firmly imagined that she was going to have a child. Her asseveration after a while became so strong that even Philip began to believe it, and he and all England commenced looking forward to the birth of an heir, probable ruler of some of the fairest realms under the sun.

On the 20th of April, 1555, while preparations were being made to burn a monk in front of Westminster Palace, Mary quitted her town residence and withdrew to Hampton Court for the expected lying-in. She had settled not only the day on which the baby was to be born, but the sex; and in all the pulpits of all the churches of the kingdom it was announced, in the form of solemn prayers, that God intended blessing the queen and her husband with a son. Fervent thanksgivings were offered up everywhere, and long files of bishops and priests went promenade through the streets of London, filling the air with psalms and litanies. Philip himself, heading an immense band of priests, dressed up in cloth of gold and tissue, walked in procession all around Hampton Court Palace, with faithful Gardiner at his side, and Mary watching them from the window, very weak and very pale. A few days later, early in the afternoon of the 30th of April, the queen returned to her room; physicians, nurses, and midwives were sent for instantly, and couriers went flying away to London announcing to the members of the privy council, the lord mayor and aldermen, that the pains of childbirth had commenced, and that, in a couple of hours more, the prince would see the light of day. Thereupon the bells were set ringing from one end of London to the other; the fathers of the city put on their scarlet robes; the vessels in the river commenced firing salutes, and tables were laid out in the streets to feast the whole of the population. When night set in, there was a general illumination; all the inhabitants came out of their houses with torches; and priests, clerks, canons, bishops, and nobles once more formed themselves in procession and went marching up and down the chief thoroughfares singing litanies and prayers. They marched all the evening and all the night long, till after the sun had risen once more over the city, and they were borne down by fatigue, and could march no more. All felt sorely disappointed as well as tired, and when the news at last arrived from Hampton Court that the birth of a prince had been adjourned sine die, there were many who exhibited indignation, regarding the non-appearance of the baby as a personal affront. One of these enraged citizens, looking out of the window and seeing a file of priests still marching and chanting, rushed forward with a string of sausages in his hand, and swung it over the neck of the fattest of the lot, to do duty as a rosary. He got no blessing for his mince-meat, but a good thrashing; nevertheless, the chanters took the hint and went to their homes. For a day the sausage-maker was the most popular man in London.

The disgust of Philip with his spouse naturally increased with the failure of her imaginative hopes, which he could not help looking upon otherwise than as absolute insanity; and this, together with the feeling that he had become an object of ridicule by his participation in the imposture, made him more than ever think of leaving England. Kaiser Charles, who had hitherto strongly opposed the departure of his son as upsetting all his political expectations, now showed himself far less anxious on the subject, rightly judging that want of offspring would be fatal, in any case, to the succession of his race to the English crown. Simon Renard urged this point very strongly with his master. "The entire future," he wrote to Charles, in June, more than a month after the false alarm about the queen's delivery—which had spread even as far as Brussels, and brought the poor Kaiser, still pinched by the gout, out of bed at two o'clock in the morning—"the entire future turns on the accouchement of the queen, of which, however, there are no signs. If she still gives birth to a child, the state of feeling in the country will improve; but if, as I fear, she suffers under a hallucination, I foresee disturbances and convulsions such as no pen can describe. The succession to the crown is so unfortunately limited that it must fall to the Princess Elizabeth, and with her accession there will come a religious revolution. The priests will be put down, the Catholics persecuted, and there will be such revenge for the present proceedings as the world has never seen. I do not know whether King Philip's person is safe, but certainly the scandals and calumnies which the heretics are spreading about the queen are beyond conception. Many assert that she has never been pregnant, while others repeat that there will be a suppositious child, and that the delivery would have taken place long ago if a babe could have been found that would answer the purpose. The looks of men are grown strange and impenetrable, and those in whose loyalty I had most dependence I have now most reason to doubt. Nothing is certain, and I am more bewildered than ever at the things which I see going on around me. There is neither government, nor justice, nor order; nothing but audacity and malice."

Renard's letter, which hinted more even than it told, had its due effect upon the Kaiser. He not only permitted his son to return to the continent, but declared his intention of making over to Philip at once his splendid heritage, so that he himself might carry out his long-cherished plan of descending from the zenith of earthly power, and spending the remaining years of his life in absolute retirement from the pomp and grandeur of the world. Philip eagerly, though quietly, at once began his preparations for leaving the haggard old wife whom he had begun to loathe; but before quitting Mary, or telling her of his approaching departure, he made her assist in laying the ground work of a new ambitious scheme. The remark of Renard, that the succession of the crown would have to fall to Princess Elizabeth, contained matter upon which he had well pondered, until the idea had settled in his mind that a marriage with her would be a speculation in every way desirable. A most important point in the matter was that Elizabeth was twenty-two, and generally admitted to be beautiful. With an ugly spouse even the crown of England seemed dear to Philip, but he fancied that with a pretty partner he would like to keep it. The first step in the execution of his scheme was to see Elizabeth, for which purpose nothing more was needed than to bring her to court. After her release from the Tower, and a short stay at Windsor Castle, the princess had been carried to Woodstock, where she was allowed a moderate amount of liberty, the queen, however, losing no opportunity to express the hatred and jealousy she felt against her sister. This hatred Philip, too, had to overcome in desiring Elizabeth's attendance at court; but to him it was an easy matter, as the queen was crouching at his feet, entirely unable to withstand the least of his wishes. Towards the end of June, therefore, when Philip felt absolutely sure not only that his wife was not pregnant, but that there were no hopes of her ever becoming pregnant, the order went down to Woodstock to set the princess at liberty, with an intimation to present herself before the queen. Elizabeth obeyed the command, and proceeding to Hampton Court, was received, after some delay, by her sister, who addressed her with great harshness and some degree of malignity. Philip did not show himself at the audience, but silently watched the princess from behind a screen, taking a careful survey of her form and features. The result was so satisfactory that he made the queen give her solemn promise never to hurt Elizabeth; and, not trusting her alone, exacted the same promise from all the leading men of the government, bound to him by golden ties. Thus having been settled, Philip at last announced to his spouse that his father wished to see him, and that he would have to quit her for a fortnight, or three weeks at the longest. With this lie on his lips, he bid Mary farewell on the 28th of August, leaving her on the steps of the palace in a swoon, more dead than alive.

The departure of Philip had the effect of still increasing the horrors of the religious persecution. Bigoted as he was, the son of Charles always placed his political interest higher than his theological opinions, and clearly foreseeing the unpopularity which a connivance in the murderous fanaticism of the priests would bring upon him, he placed himself steadfastly against it, or, at least, against its excesses. When he had left, therefore, Cardinal Pole was sole master of the field, able to continue unchecked his great task of extirpating heresy. No time was lost, and on the 1st of September, three days after the queen had bid farewell to her husband, the cardinal appointed a new commission, consisting of three rabid papists, Holyman bishop of Bristol, Brookes bishop of Gloucester, and White bishop of Lincoln, for the trial of all individuals denying the authority of the supreme pontiff. To strengthen the hands of the papal legate, the city of Oxford, distinguished for its adherence to Rome, sympathy with ancient forms of belief, and general tendency to worship spiritual authority and discountenance reasoning, was fixed upon as the seat of the new tribunal, and on the 7th of September, the inquisitors met there, before the altar of St. Mary's church. The proceedings commenced with the trial of the three foremost champions of Protestantism in England, Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury, Ridley former bishop of London, and Latimer bishop of Worcester. The archbishop was brought up first, and requested to answer the charge of heresy to his judges, who told him that they were sitting in the name of the pope. "My lord," replied Cranmer to Brookes, president of the tribunal, "I mean no contempt to your person, but I have sworn never to admit the authority of the bishop of Rome in England, and I must keep my oath." Ridley and Latimer made the same simple reply to all the accusations fulminated against them; the latter, moreover, taking a bold stand on the subject of transubstantiation, which the papal commissioners introduced into their examination. Scorning to fence with words, like some of his brethren, to gain a little favour, Latimer quietly rehearsed his belief that bread was bread and wine was wine; there was a change in the sacrament, he said, but it was not in the nature but the dignity. Corrupt as they were, even the inquisitors shrank from the earnest gaze of the majestic old man, nigh eighty years of age, who stood before them in a threadbare gown of coarse frieze, tied with a leather belt, to which was fastened a Bible. He only smiled when his judges told him that he was to be burnt, looking down upon them, not with contempt but with infinite pity. Cranmer and Ridley, too, heard the same announcement with calmness, long prepared for their doom.

Ridley and Latimer were burnt on the 16th of October, Cranmer's execution being postponed, his vacillating nature allowing a hope that he would turn apostate. It was ordered by the cardinal legate that the two bishops should suffer at the same stake, which was fixed outside the north wall of Oxford, a stone's throw from Balliol College, and in sight of Cranmer's prison. The illustrious martyrs were led forth on the morning of the 16th of October, Ridley first dressed with some elegance, and after him Latimer, in his old frieze gown, with a common handkerchief tied round his venerable head, but looking greater and nobler than ever in these coarse garments. Arrived at the stake, Latimer threw off his gown, and was seen standing bolt upright in a linen shroud, ready for death, his eyes illuminated by heavenly brightness. The executioner now stepped forward, and placing the martyrs back to back, passed a chain round both their bodies; then the faggots were lighted, and the dull flame went creeping round their feet. "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley," Latimer cried, encircled by fire; "be of good comfort; we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out." "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum," exclaimed Ridley.

"Father of heaven receive my soul!" rejoined Latimer, drawing his last breath, the red flame licking his face. Ridley suffered longer, the thick wood at his feet burning slowly, charring his body under frightful tortures. "Lord have mercy on me! Let the fire come to me! I cannot burn!" the sufferer cried, his contorted limbs expressive of excruciating pain. Now faggots were thrown forward, yet still the wood refused to burn, till at last a bystander lifted the pile with a hatchet, when a tongue of flame went leaping up into the air. Then a last fierce writhing of agonised limbs, and Rome's vengeance could go no further.

While the fires of the inquisition were blazing all over England, Queen Mary, first author of the great persecution, was devoured by torments wilder than those of fire and flame. After the departure of Philip she sank into deep melancholy, from which she was roused into fits of frenzy by the report that he was living with mistresses, and that he intended staying away from England for a long time, if not for ever. Overcome by despair, she now broke forth into alternate fits of deepest grief and of fiercest passion. For hours she would sit upon the floor, with her knees drawn up to her shoulders, with haggard face, speechless and motionless, staring into vacant space; then again she would rouse herself into fury, rushing through her gilded apartments, and grasping the air with her withered arms, as if in search of invisible phantoms. She refused to see any human being except Pole, who brought comforting news about the number of heretics burnt already, and the greater number preparing to be burnt for the everlasting glory of the Holy Catholic Church. Generally, after these interviews with the legate, she became more calm, and sat down to write long and passionate love-letters to her husband, entreating him, in the name of God, of religion, of heaven and earth, to return to her embrace. Philip never replied: he had weightier matters to attend to than the amorous wailings of a detested, crack-brained old wife. Having left England behind, and set foot on the shore of the Netherlands, part of the great realm of his father soon to be his own, new dreams of ambition arose in his breast, and all the intoxication of unlimited power took possession of his mind. Little more than a month after his arrival, on the 25th of October, 1555, a grand and gorgeous ceremony took place at Brussels, the whole civilized world looking on with awe and astonishment. In the throne-room of the imperial palace sat Kaiser Charles, the crown on his head and sceptre in hand, and around, in vast circle, stood the nobles, high dignitaries, and representatives of the Low Countries. Speaking to them, the Kaiser said: "From the seventeenth year till now that I am fifty-five, I have devoted all my thoughts and attention to public objects, reserving no portion of my time for indulgence or ease, and very little for the enjoyment of domestic happiness. I have visited Germany nine times, Spain six times, France four, Italy seven, Flanders ten times, England twice, and Africa twice, and I have made eleven voyages by sea. I have never shunned exertion, nor repined under fatigue; but now that my health is broken, and my vigour exhausted by the rage of incurable distempers, my growing infirmities tell me that it is time to retire from the labours God has imposed upon me. Vain-glory was never my own, and the highest of my aims has ever been to do my work. But I can do it no more, and have resolved, therefore, that my impotent hands shall no longer retain the sceptre." Then, bending to his son who was kneeling at his side, and offering him some paternal advice, Charles took the crown from his head, placing it on that of Philip. Soon after, in like solemn manner, before a splendid assembly of princes and grandees, the crowns of Spain and the Indies were made over to the husband of Mary. Charles himself embarked for Spain, to close his eventful life as the inmate of a monastery, asking nothing else in return for the vast realms he had given to his son but a very small annual pension. Philip forgot to pay his father's pension, in like manner as he forgot to answer his wife's letters.

Up to the departure of Philip the belief had been general in England that he was the main cause of the Protestant persecution, with Bishop Gardiner acting under his immediate orders. The groundlessness of this suspicion became apparent not only at the accession of Philip to the throne of Spain and the Netherlands, which was followed by the withdrawal of all Spaniards from the English court, but in the death of Gardiner. The latter event took place on the 13th of November, 1555, and, so far from diminishing the fury of the proceedings of the inquisition, seemed to increase them, if possible. Gardiner had shown great inclination to spare the most illustrious of his religious opponents, the archbishop of Canterbury; and it was through his interference that, after due condemnation, the execution had been postponed, efforts being made in the meantime to persuade Cranmer into recantation. These endeavours were crowned with the most complete success, and the unfortunate prelate, gifted with far less strength of mind than Latimer, Ridley, and other of his friends who had passed the fiery ordeal of truth, was brought to sign a degrading submission, in which he prayed the pope to pardon him, prayed the queen to pardon him, and prayed God Almighty to pardon him, calling himself a blasphemer, a sower of pernicious doctrines, and the most wicked wretch that ever lived. He solemnly acknowledged the pope as head of the church, expressed his belief in transubstantiation, the mass, and purgatory, and anathematized the heresies of Luther, Calvin, and all the Protestant reformers. It was on the most elaborate promises that his life should not only be spared, but that he should be reinstated in his honours and dignities, that this base recantation was obtained from Cranmer; but it availed him nothing, after all. Gardiner, who in spite of his bigotry was not without some nobler qualities of heart, and mind would probably have insisted that the main conditions of the bond should be kept; his death, however, left all in the hands of Mary and the cardinal legate, who were both resolved on Cranmer's execution, the queen from sheer love of blood and fanaticism, and Pole from the more sordid motive of obtaining the see of Canterbury, the administration of which he had taken in hand since his arrival in England. To pardon a heretic, and to evacuate Lambeth Palace at the same time, required more greatness of soul than the papal legate possessed, and the archbishop, accordingly, had to prepare for the stake, in spite of his absolute and entire recantation. Cranmer was burnt at the same spot where Latimer and Ridley suffered, on the 21st of March, 1556, bitterly repenting, at the last moment, his weakness in having sacrificed truth, if only for a day, to the false allurements of his enemies. On the faggots being lighted, he stretched forth his right hand into the fire, exclaiming, "This is the hand that wrote my shame, therefore shall it suffer first punishment." The red flame leaped up in an instant, rapidly ending all earthly pain. On the day after Cranmer's execution, Cardinal Pole was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury.

A dreary continuation of foul murder, unrelieved even by the excitement of great passions or distinguished victims, now began to reign from one end of England to the other. The miserable woman entrusted with the supreme power of the realm kept sinking fast into the condition of a blood-thirsty maniac, her sceptre becoming a mere torch to light faggots. Neither old nor young were spared, neither rich nor poor; neither learned nor ignorant. Grey-haired men with one foot in the grave, and boys not escaped from school; venerable matrons, and sprightly girls, and even infants at the breast of the mother, were thrown into the flames. And not only against the living, but against the dead themselves, the fires of persecution were let loose; in several instances the bones of Protestants were dug up from the ground, torn from their coffins, brought to trial for heresy, and publicly burnt. The ludicrous and the horrible came struggling for mastery in these frightful displays of bigotry; but the horrors were too great and towering not to keep the upper hand. There was stillness of death all through the shuddering realm; many suffered; many fled abroad; and many more conformed outwardly to the behest of the murderous despotism swaying the land. Among those who conformed, with more than ordinary zeal, was Princess Elizabeth. She set up a private chapel; had the mass said regularly; went to confession; had an immense crucifix stuck over her bed; and manufactured with her own hands petticoats for male and female saints. Her example was extensively followed by the nobility of the kingdom, and nearly all the leading statesmen, foremost in the number Sir William Cecil, shrewdest of politicians, who not only punctiliously attended to the outward forms of Romanism, but took great pains in gaining the favour of the cardinal legate. The great bulk of the people, meanwhile, with that dumb instinct which distinguishes masses, remained faithful to the dictates of their conscience, instinctively feeling that the storm of persecution would be smothered in its own fury, and that it was far beyond the power of any queen or papal legate to alter the faith of a nation.

The confidence of the people in better times to come was not shared by many of the bolder spirits of the middle and upper classes, who, utterly disgusted with the horrible despotism under which the kingdom was suffering, kept harbouring in their minds ideas of changing the government by revolt. However, the failure of the Wyatt insurrection had furnished clear proof that a rising could not be attempted by the more or less convulsive efforts of a few energetic men supported by regular troops; and that it was absolutely necessary, in order to obtain the latter, to seek some foreign alliance. France naturally suggested itself, as the great power opposed to the queen's husband, and there were not wanting indications that the sovereign of that country would be willing to render the desired aid. Many of those compromised in the Kentish and West of England insurrections, among them Sir Peter Carew himself, the leader of the Devonshire rebels, had fled across the channel, and were received with much friendliness at the court of Henri II., and they, and numbers of religious fugitives which followed, were given to understand that the time would come when a French army would help them to overthrow the throne of the hated queen. The promise was vague; but the chances of its being kept increased greatly on the abdication of Kaiser Charles and the accession of his son. To fight the old lion had been all along tough work for Francis II.; with the accession of Philip, however, his courage rose, and he determined to try one more struggle for supremacy in Italy. A great inducement to it was a new change in the pontificate; Julius III., a rather mild man, submitting willingly to the commands of Spanish generals, had died in 1555, and his successor, Paul IV., or John Peter Caraffa, a fighting priest of wildest ambition, declared himself at once ready to throw the gauntlet to the mighty lord of Italy. The consequence was a secret alliance between France and Rome, for the purpose of humiliating Philip and compelling him to loosen his grasp on the fair peninsula. But though neither a general nor a politician, Philip was a good match for both the pope and the king of France, and before they had been well able to agree upon a plan of campaign, he had made preparations for crushing their alliance in the bud. The duke of Alva, greatest of Spanish generals, was sent into Italy as soon as Philip heard of the secret treaty, and, marching an army from Naples towards Rome, at once took the supreme pontiff in his grasp. It now remained only to deal with France, and speculating upon the best mode of annihilating his great antagonist, Philip's thoughts once more reverted to his ancient wife. If she could give him a few stout legions with which to invade the country of his enemy, he fancied he might bear the overwhelming caresses of the haggard old woman for a few weeks, looking upon them as sufferings entailed by war. Roused by these heroic considerations, King Philip set out for the land and the spouse he had hoped never to see again.

Mary was in ecstasy of joy at the news that her beloved husband was coming to her again, and, having gone to meet him, she brought him into London in triumph in March, 1557. His wish to get an English army for the invasion of France was laid at once before the privy council, the queen intimating that she insisted upon war being declared immediately. But the difficulty was to find a cause for war, and there was painful hesitation among Mary's advisers, when an unexpected event cleared all the difficulties. A few of the English refugees in France, more impatient than the rest to deliver their country from the despotism of a mad woman, resolved to attempt an insurrection in the northern counties, and having equipped two small vessels, they sailed from the mouth of the Seine in the middle of April, about three weeks after the arrival of Philip in London. The leader and soul of the invasion was Sir Thomas Stafford, grandson of the duke of Buckingham, murdered by Henry VIII., who was inspirited to the wild attempt by the notion that his name and illustrious descent would suffice to raise the country in arms. Having induced thirty of his countrymen to follow his fortunes, he landed at Scarborough, surprised the castle, and issued a summons inviting the people to rebellion. But not a soul stirred, and at the end of only two days Stafford and all his companions were seized, carried to London, and duly handed over to the hangman. The affair, unimportant though it was in itself, was sufficient to give Mary the much sought pretext for war, the plea being that it was not so much Sir Thomas Stafford, but King Henri II. who had launched the army of thirty upon the shore of Scarborough. A declaration of hostilities against France was issued immediately, the queen calling her people to arms to punish the perfidy of the foreign invaders. This was all that Philip wanted, and the necessary arrangements for the co-operation of the English troops with his own army having been made, he bid once more farewell to his consort, solemnly promising that he would come back in a very short time. Mary accompanied her husband to Dover, clinging to him with an affection which made him shudder. With burning tears she bid her final adieu on the 6th of July, never to see him again.

The preparations for war with France went on very languidly, notwithstanding the immense exertions made by the queen to raise the greatest possible number of troops. Throughout the country the projected contest was highly unpopular, being looked upon in its true nature, as nothing but a service to a foreign ruler and against the real interest of England. It was evident, moreover, that the kingdom was not in a position for war, all its strength having been and continuing to be wasted in grim internal convulsions, in strife arising from priestly vanity and murder under the guise of religion. After great trouble, Mary got together about five thousand men, who, imperfectly equipped and still more imperfectly trained, were sent to Flanders at the end of July, under the command of the earl of Pembroke. Philip at once incorporated the English soldiers with his own army of fifty thousand—a strange host of adventurers collected from all the corners of Europe, from the straits of Gibraltar to the mouth of the Danube, and from the Alps to the North Sea. Marching straightway from Flanders into Picardy, Philip's troops met with no resistance until they arrived before the fortress of St. Quentin, defended by a small garrison under Admiral Coligny. He could not hope to hold out, but Montmorency, constable of France, was hurrying up to the rescue with twenty thousand men, and on the 10th of August the latter troops, quite unexpectedly, came into contact with the army of Philip. There was a panic on the part of the French, ending in a complete rout, one fourth of them being killed or taken prisoners. The English legion took no part in this battle and victory; nevertheless the queen, at the news of it, ordered a general illumination, and set the priests to walk about the streets with all their flags, banners, and figures. It was a strange proceeding; considering that the pope, whose devout pupil Mary professed herself, was on the side of France, and had openly declared his participation in the struggle against Philip, thereby making it a holy war. To show the queen how deeply she had sinned in thinking more of her husband than of him, Paul IV. at once withdrew the legatine power from Cardinal Polo, thus leaving him to murder only in the name of Canterbury instead of Rome. Mary deeply felt the insult aimed at her dearest friend, and broke forth in indignation. There seemed but little wanting to induce her to give another turn to the wheel by throwing off the supremacy of the pope.

Though not participating in the easy victory against the French, Philip allowed his English allies to do some of the subsequent hard work, and they were ordered to take the fortress of St. Quentin by storm. They accomplished the task, but disgraced themselves by the subsequent sack and plunder of the place, not behind in savage cruelties to the Croats of Philip's army. The loss of St. Quentin greatly alarmed the king of France, and he sent immediate orders to the duke de Guise, who was staying with the bulk of his army in Italy, to return over the Alps, so as to oppose the advance of Philip. The duke obeyed promptly, notwithstanding the strong opposition of the pope to his departure; and striding northward in forced marches arrived at Paris in the beginning of December, ready to stem the advance of the invading Spanish army. It required no great effort for the moment, inasmuch as Philip, notwithstanding the brilliant victory he had obtained before St. Quentin, seemed afraid of moving forward, not trusting either to his own generalship, or to the continued discipline of the crowd of all nations which he was leading into battle. But it was necessary that the valiant army which Guise had brought back with him from Italy should achieve something worth the long march they had undertaken, and at a council of war held at Paris, under the presidency of the king, a new and great enterprise was decided upon. It was nothing less than the conquest of Calais, detached since the year 1347 from the crown of France, and looked upon after the lapse of two centuries and its concomitant changes as part of the realm of England. The rulers of France had never given up entirely the hope of regaining Calais; but its realization seemed vague, for the place was generally held to be impregnable, and being inhabited entirely by an English population, and defended, moreover, by a long line of military strongholds, two of them, Hammes and Guisnes, considered fortresses of the first rank, the mere attempt to take it was looked upon as madness. Nevertheless Henri II. and his able general, after mature deliberation, resolved upon the attempt, fully aware that if ever there was a chance of taking Calais it offered itself at this moment. Never for centuries had England fallen so low as under the priest-ridden government of Mary; never had its noble population been more wretched, its national life been more feeble, its material resources been more neglected, and its very name been more despised among the peoples of Europe. All this was known to the king of France, not only through his political agents, but from the lips of hundreds of brave, intelligent, and chivalric Englishmen who had fled their country, preferring to eat the bitter bread of exile rather than witness the horrors perpetrated by a mad woman and a team of fanatic priests. Henri saw that now was the time to take Calais—now or never.

The ordinary garrison of Calais consisted of three thousand men, a force not more than sufficient to cover the extended fortifications; but since the accession of Mary it had been gradually reduced, and in December, 1557, when Henri and the duke de Guise were sitting in war council at Paris, the total number of troops was not more than five hundred. Even this handful of men was badly fed and badly paid, the queen's government had no time nor wish to attend to the defenders of the country as long as there were heretics to be burnt. The five hundred troops at Calais were under the command of Lord Wentworth, a brave and efficient commander, who did his best to attend to the wants of his men, and to guard the important place under his charge. From the moment that war had been declared by England against France, his position had become precarious, surrounded as Calais was by French territory and troops infinitely better armed and cared for than his own. He at once applied for reinforcements, for supplies of food and ammunition, but received neither, his urgent letters being scarcely attended to. The queen was too anxious to despatch every soldier she was able to raise to her adored husband, to allow her to think of any other subject; and even when at last Lord Wentworth informed her that positive news had come of an intended attack of the French army upon Calais, her apathy remained the same. The news, however, was but too true. Silently and swiftly the French army under Guise coiled itself around the English territory; its right wing stretched out towards Flanders, to amuse Philip with a simulated attack on some villages in his own dominions, but the left grasping all the more firmly the much-prized jewel on the Straits of Dover. On the morning of the 31st of December, 1557, twenty thousand French troops took up a strong position on the heights between Boulogne and Calais, and on the afternoon of the same day Lord Wentworth despatched one more messenger across the channel with a last piteous cry for help. It was a cry into empty air, and would have been utterly useless, even if not too late. New Year's Day was celebrated by the French in an advance upon Newnham Bridge, the strongest outwork of Calais on the south-west, which they took with little trouble, after which the conquest of the town itself and the inlying fortifications became a question of hours, the small garrison being in the greatest want both of food and ammunition. Guise had made preparations for bringing a number of heavy guns from Boulogne to besiege and bombard the town, but found it quite unnecessary, seeing that bastion after bastion fell into his hands in succession, the stream of his soldiers floating onward almost without opposition. The harbour of Calais and the whole of the sea side fortifications were taken possession of by the French on the 4th of January, and on the 6th they stormed the castle, barely escaping the tremendous danger of a powder train, laid for their destruction, but which had been made useless by damp. There now remained nothing for Wentworth and his handful of men but to lay down their arms, the French commander promising to allow all the inhabitants of Calais to retire to England, on condition of leaving their property behind, and to retain only fifty men of the garrison as prisoners of war. The neighbouring fortresses of Guisnes and Hammes, connected with Calais by a line of towers and earthworks, were captured after a short resistance, and with them was lost the last foot of soil which England possessed in France. To gain Calais, the English spent eleven months in the most obstinate siege, under King Edward III.; to lose Calais, only a week was required under Queen Mary.

Mary's subjects looked upon the loss of Calais as a national misfortune. The indignation at the receipt of the news was boundless, extinguishing for the moment even the thoughts of the priestly massacres still going on uninterruptedly. Even the queen was roused from her sullen lethargy, and consented to give orders for the immediate gathering of an army to reconquer Calais. In little more than a week, thirty thousand men rushed to the Kentish ports, and all the merchant vessels on the coast having been forcibly seized, the expedition set sail towards the middle of January. But there was more enthusiasm than seamanship among the excited invaders, and a gale of wind which arose when they were half way across the channel scattered their fleet in all directions, covering the shore with wrecks from Dover to the mouth of the Thames. Mary did not look upon this disaster from a nautical point of view, but considered it as a judgment of God. There were still heretics in her realm, and till every one was burnt she could never hope to propitiate the favour of heaven. Fresh instructions were sent to the inquisitors, now spread over the whole country, to be more energetic in their labours, and the order was obeyed with great zeal. Cardinal Pole took the lead by burning Protestants all around Canterbury Cathedral, and Bishop Bonner displayed greater activity than ever in putting the rack to work and keeping the flames alive in his diocese of London. The murder of single heretics taking up too much valuable time, men and women were driven to the stake in crowds, the bodies of some serving as faggots for the others. Many of the more daring Protestants had come to hold secret prayer-meetings, which furnished a never-failing supply to the flames of the bishop of London. On one occasion Bonner got thirteen men at a swoop, and trying seven of them at once, sent them to Smithfield the day after. There arose a tumult, however, when the burning took place, and the bishop, to prevent the recurrence of similar scenes, and fearing somewhat for his own valuable life, left London in all haste, dragging his six remaining prisoners after him. At his country residence at Fulham the prelate drew breath, and at once proceeded to go through the forms of condemnation, surrounded by all the comforts of his private home. The ceremony having been accomplished, the six heretics were led to Brentford, and there burnt in the darkness of the night.

Soon after the fall of Calais rumours of a French invasion spread all over England, and a parliament was called together to advise on the defences of the country. "The lords made fine speeches, and the commons voted large sums of money to raise an army; but the people looked on sullenly, as if doubtful whether the rule of the French king would not be preferable to that of Romish priests. General musters of the population were ordered to take place throughout the kingdom, yet they only served to show the utter dislike, amounting to abhorrence, felt for the government. In Devonshire, Lincoln, and other counties, the musters ended in mutinies, and though the ring-leaders were hanged immediately, the disaffection was visibly spreading in wider and wider circles. The feeling of the people was expressed by Sir Thomas Smith, a good Catholic and former friend of Gardiner, who exclaimed, "Here is nothing but firing, heading, hanging, quartering, and burning, taxing, and levying: a few priests in white rochets rule all." There was some show now as if priestly rule was driving the nation into final revolutionary exasperation; but before the symptoms got far developed, a widespread report subdued all into sudden quietness and resignation. When the leaves were falling from the trees, in the autumn of 1558, every man, woman, and child in England knew that the queen was dying. She was murdering still, but the work was getting weaker and weaker, her priestly hangmen seemingly pausing, in consideration of the setting and the rising sun. Up to the preceding spring Mary had continued impressing herself with the belief that she was going to be a mother—a mother destined, like the Virgin, to bring forth a miraculous child, endowed with supernatural wisdom, strength, and beauty. All these heavenly hopes vanished finally in the conviction that she was dying of dropsy. On the 6th of October her state had become alarming, and the members of the privy council were called together "for great and urgent affairs;" they resolved to despatch an envoy to Philip to inform him that the days of his consort were numbered. Towards the end of October the report was rife through London that the queen had expired, but that her death was kept secret; and to show her subjects that she was still alive, a number of heretics were sent to the stake. Cardinal Pole, though seized by mortal malady like the queen, delivered with his own hands five persons over to the flames at the beginning of November. The five Protestants, three men and two women, were burnt alive in sight of Canterbury Cathedral—the last martyrs killed on English soil by Romish priests. A fortnight later both queen and cardinal had gone to account to God for all the murders they had committed in the name of religion.

Mary expired on the morning of the 17th of November, and Cardinal Pole in the evening of the same day. A week before her death a special ambassador from Philip, count de Feria, arrived, and was at once ushered into the presence of the queen. It was no useless sentimentality which brought the envoy over from the Netherlands, but a simple matter of business. Philip was once more thinking of his old scheme of marrying Princess Elizabeth; the English soldiers in his service had proved splendid fighting animals, and it seemed good policy to retain such a fine lot of fellows for storming fortresses, at no higher sacrifice than that of taking a rather good-looking young woman for wife. Count de Feria's business, therefore, was to desire the queen to appoint Elizabeth as her successor, which she did without a murmur. All the love of her life had been concentrated upon the one man, her husband, and even in her dying hour she kept crouching at his feet in mute submission. With faltering lips she whispered that she was "well content" to see her sister upon the throne—hated sister, secret heretic, certain to undo the great work of her reign in a day. The important declaration having been obtained before witnesses, the gallant count troubled himself no more about Mary, but set out at once to greet Princess Elizabeth. Philip had left a splendid casket of jewels behind him at Hampton Court which Elizabeth had once admired, and taking this with him, he hastened to the residence of the princess, at Hatfield, near St. Albans, and offering it on his knees, informed her that it was through the exertions of his master that her accession to the throne had been secured. Elizabeth smiled graciously upon Philip's envoy, and her smile brightened on seeing the whole court of the queen following him to her humble dwelling. Nobles, ministers, privy councillors, chamberlains, and ladies of honour, came hurrying up, in one long stream, from St. James's Palace to Hatfield House to worship the rising star. Mary was left alone in the chamber of death, with only a few priests at her pillow, half inclined to run to Hatfield likewise. Thus the queen kept lying from the 10th to the 16th of November, abandoned by all earthly grandeur, with no sound but that of plaintive prayers ringing in her ear. Soon after midnight, mass was celebrated at her couch, and she received extreme unction; at the lifting up of the host, her head fell back upon the pillow. For a moment the priests gazed at the cold clay of Mary, queen of England, and then fled.

SECTION V.

ELIZABETH.

THE quiet manor-house of Bishop's Hatfield, an ancient demesne of the abbots of Ely, was a scene of wild excitement on Wednesday, the 16th of November, 1558. An immense crowd of glittering nobles and courtiers kept swarming about the dingy brick building, anxious to obtain a glance from the young woman of twenty-five, recently a prisoner in the Tower, who had taken up her residence here. Late in the day the excitement grew to its height, the news having arrived that Queen Mary had breathed her last in the lonely death-room at St. James's Palace, and that the supreme power of the realm had fallen to the young mistress of Hatfield manor-house. "Long live Queen Elizabeth!" shouted the first who heard the report; and all the crowd of courtiers repeated as with one voice, "Long live Queen Elizabeth!" But Elizabeth did not respond to the cry. There was a very old head on the shoulders of the young lady of twenty-five, and its wisdom had not been impaired by the lessons of the Tower school. Before acknowledging in any way the loud acclamations which greeted her as queen, she cautiously tried to discover her legal right to the title, and for this purpose held a long and anxious conference with her private friends. The chief of these, and most trusted of her advisers, Sir William Cecil, had gone to London a week before to look after her interests there, and had sent no report as yet of the death of Mary; so that it was necessary to look upon the rumour of the latter event with great suspicion. Burning though she was with impatience to reach the pinnacle of all her hopes and desires,

HATFIELD HOUSE.

Elizabeth affected outward indifference; however, on the proposition of her friends, she consented that one of them, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, should proceed with speed to St. James's Palace, to find out whether Queen Mary was yet breathing. Mary had her spies upon Elizabeth, but Elizabeth also had her spies upon Mary; and Sir Nicholas was instructed to place himself in communication with one of the ladies of the royal bedchamber, and to tell her to give him a black enamelled ring, a present of Philip's, which never left the finger of the queen, as soon as she was dead, and as a token of it. Night had fallen in before this had been arranged; but Throckmorton lost not a moment's time; and, saddling his horse before the rising dawn, rode off in full speed to London. When bestriding his horse, Queen Mary was still breathing, her heavy eyes fixed upon the cross at the foot of her couch, and her hand grasping, in death agony, the black enamelled ring.

When Sir Nicholas galloped into London it was full daylight, and the bells of all the churches were ringing, and all the streets were crowded with groups of people, talking, and giving vent to their feelings in joyous exclamations. Quick as Sir Nicholas had been in the service of his mistress, Sir William Cecil had been quicker. Cecil had priests as well as bedchamber ladies in his service, and being well paid, the holy men served him well. Within five minutes after the queen's death he knew of it; and within an hour after he had issued a proclamation to the people, had changed the guards of the Tower, had given orders to close the ports of the kingdom, had charged the Wardens of the Marches to watch the northern border, had formed a new privy council, and had assumed the supreme government of the realm in the name of Queen Elizabeth. Before Sir Nicholas Throckmorton had time to get his ring, a deputation of the privy council, despatched by Cecil, was on its way to Hatfield House, to inform Elizabeth of all the measures that had been taken for the security of her throne, and to entreat her to remain quiet for a few days longer, leaving the direction of affairs in the hands of her trusted friends. The queen at once consented, seeing the wisdom of the council, and confiding in the councillors. Of all the high qualities of the daughter of Anne Boleyn, her highest as a ruler, the capacity of selecting fit servants, now showed itself for the first time. The young queen of twenty-five saw, what her predecessors in power had failed to see, that Sir William Cecil was the first of living statesmen; and strong with this knowledge, she determined to employ him, and to trust him, although his past career scarcely invited such trust. Having served in turn Somerset and Northumberland, and offered to serve Gardiner and Pole, having exhibited himself as a staunch Protestant under the protector's rule, and professed Roman Catholicism during the sway of the papal legate, whose favour he tried hard to win, it required some courage to have confidence in Cecil. Elizabeth had this courage, not only because she had faith in his high abilities as a statesman, but because she understood the bent of his outwardly-wavering, inwardly-steadfast career. Her mind was cast in the same mould as that of the man she trusted. Elizabeth was the ruling power in both, before which all else had to disappear; and here were two ambitions which strictly supplemented each other. Cecil was as necessary to Elizabeth as Elizabeth was to Cecil, and both he and she were fully aware of the fact—a fact constituting the basis and substance of the reign of the greatest of English queens.

Cecil's first care, after he had seen to the security of the throne of his young mistress, and become convinced that her succession would be undisputed, was to look to the mainspring of all good government, finance. He found the public accounts in the most frightful confusion, the crown deeply indebted to Flemish Jews and Lombard Street usurers, and not a coin in the royal exchequer. To raise money for her immediate expenditure, Mary had been signing bonds even on her death-bed; the two last "bills of hand" her trembling fingers had left uncompleted, and being found on the table near the dead queen's couch, the attendants had made use of them for "coining the corpse." It was with an involuntary shudder that Cecil observed these ghastly parchments, the sight of which was enough to beget the resolution of breaking the ties which bound the crown of England to foreign Jews. Investigating the subject, he discovered that more than two hundred thousand pounds sterling, bearing interest and compound interest at fourteen and fifteen per cent., were due immediately to Hebrew usurers of Antwerp and Amsterdam, and to pay off this dishonourable debt was clearly the most urgent measure which the new government had to take in hand. Cecil put himself at once in communication with Thomas Gresham, to take the advice of the great city merchant on the financial position of the government; and the result of their discussion was the determination to submit the whole matter at once to the young queen. Accordingly, on Friday, the 18th, the day after Mary's death, Cecil took the city merchant to Hatfield House, and the two had a long conference with Elizabeth, at the end of which Gresham, with business-like speed, at once departed for Antwerp—great centre of capital and capitalists. Cecil also returned to London, but went again to Hatfield the next day, the flow of courtiers and aspiring politicians towards the old manor-house having become so overwhelming as to make the continued private life of the queen an utter impossibility. It was arranged, therefore, by Cecil, that she should forthwith assume the reins of government, and take the oaths of allegiance of the new members of the privy council.

On Sunday, the 20th of November, the quaint old hall of Hatfield manor-house was thronged by a more brilliant assembly than was ever seen within its walls. Ranged on the rush-strewn floor in one dense mass stood the flower of the English nobility and deputies from all the great towns in the kingdom, the gaze of all riveted on the young lady, who, with flowing red locks and brilliant blue eyes, affable in demeanour, yet proudly conscious of her high position, was filling an arm-chair at the upper end of the hall. Cecil first approached the improvised throne, and bending his knee, took the oaths as secretary of state. Then, amidst dead silence, Elizabeth addressed the counsellor and friend whom she had chosen as chief guide on the perilous heights of absolute, uncontrolled power

"I give you this charge," she exclaimed, graciously inclining her head to Cecil, "that you shall be of my privy council, and content yourself to take pains for me and my realm. This judgment I have of you, that you will not be corrupted with any manner of gifts, and that you will be faithful to the state; and that, without respect to my private will, you will give me that counsel that you think best: and if you shall know anything necessary to be declared unto me of secrecy, you shall show it to myself only, and may assure yourself I will not fail to keep taciturnity therein." After Cecil had taken the oaths of allegiance, the members of the privy council whom he had appointed were sworn in. Their functions, as Elizabeth's speech clearly told them, were subordinate; however, she softened the hardships of crushed ambition by gracious compliments and still more gracious smiles. Even for those not destined to enjoy the sweets of office she had many kind and hopeful words. "I shall accept for my council," she exclaimed, addressing the crowd of courtiers and nobles, who had shown their anxiety for preferment by hurrying to Hatfield while St. James's Palace was still tenanted by a living queen, "I shall accept for my council you of my nobility, and such others of you the rest as in consultation I shall think meet, and shortly appoint; to the which also I will join to their aid, and for ease of their burden, others meet for my service; and they which I shall not appoint, let them not think the same for any disability in them, but for that I consider a multitude doth make rather discord and confusion than good counsel. And of good will you shall not doubt, using yourselves as appertaineth to good and loving subjects." Words like these, from the lips of an amiable and good-looking young lady, could scarcely fail their effect, so that even the disappointed courtiers to whom the pilgrimage to Bishop's Hatfield had brought no fruit, kept crying as heartily as ever, "Long live Queen Elizabeth!"

Three days after her reception in the old manor-hall, on Wednesday, the 23rd of November, Elizabeth set out on her progress to London. Her train consisted of more than a thousand persons, and kept growing as she went along, until it reached the dimensions of a vast army. The acclamations of the multitudes lining the road from Hatfield to the metropolis were genuine expressions of joy, the people feeling instinctively that the black nightmare of priestly government was being dissolved at the advent of this young queen, whose radiant looks alone proclaimed the rule of peace upon earth. All were yearning for the reign of peace, except the handful of mad fanatics who had kept up the work of murder within the past five years, and most of whom now shrank back into that obscurity from which they had arisen on the invasion of popery. There were some, however, bold enough to show their face even now that the dark shadow had fled from the land; among them the bishop of London, chief of the priestly bloodhounds. On the approach of Elizabeth, Bonner, with a number of other prelates, set out to greet her, and they fell in with the royal cavalcade at the top of Highgate, nigh to the spot where the London bishops had their toll-gate for fleecing the commerce flowing along the great north road. The queen greeted all the ecclesiastical dignitaries in the most friendly manner, permitting them to kiss her hand; but, to exhibit her sentiments against Bonner the more strongly, would not even let him approach. As yet Elizabeth had not declared by a single word or public act whether she meant to conform to the Protestant faith in which she had been educated, or to the Roman Catholic creed which she had professed of late. But her reception of the loathed prelate who held the see of London at once showed, and was intended to show, that the faggots should cease to burn, and priestly hangmen should cease to flourish within the dominions over which she had come to rule. The mute declaration was fully understood by the people; and at her entry into the city the first present offered to Elizabeth was a Bible, with the open text of the Epistle to the Corinthians, "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed."

The solemn entry of the queen into her capital did not take place till Monday, the 28th of November, after she had spent nearly a week at the Charter-house, the town residence of Cecil's friend, Lord North. One quality at least Elizabeth had inherited from her royal father, the love of pomp and of fine dresses, and she absolutely refused exhibiting herself before her faithful subjects until the proper trappings for the show had been prepared. But the time occupied by tailors and upholsterers was not lost, for there were daily meetings of the privy council at the Charter-house, presided over invariably by Elizabeth, who did not fail thereby to convince her ministers that, fond as she was of pleasure, she did not mean to forget amidst the vanities of the world the hard labours of government. These were only suspended for the day of her entry into the city, when the good people of London had the satisfaction of gazing upon an accumulation of splendours such as their eyes had not beheld for very many years. Elizabeth left the Charter-house on the eventful Monday morning in a magnificent chariot, gilded from top to bottom, and drawn by prancing steeds behung all over with silks, pearls, and cloth of gold. Thus she proceeded slowly by the outer walls of the city, along the Barbican, until arrived at Cripplegate, where the lord mayor and aldermen in their glaring scarlet mantles were waiting, with ever-ready loyalty, to receive their new sovereign. Elizabeth here mounted a prancing horse, and dressed in a splendid robe of purple velvet, with the blue ribbon of the Garter across her shoulder, rode forward to the royal residence in the Tower. Right in front of the queen was the earl of Pembroke—bearer of the title once worn by Elizabeth's mother—carrying the sword of state, and close at her side rode Lord Robert Dudley, stared at by many curious eyes, it being whispered that he was something more to his royal mistress than his position as master of the horse would indicate. But whatever remarks were made by slanderous tongues, they were drowned by the volleys of enthusiastic shouts with which the queen was greeted all along the road from Cripplegate to the Tower. The exultation of the multitude was repaid by smiles and curtsies without end, which served to heighten loyal feelings to such an extent as almost to put a stop to the progress of the fair bearer of the crown. Slowly and more slowly the procession pushed its way onward, up Leadenhall and Gracechurch Streets, till the entrance of Mark Lane, where popular enthusiasm had risen into frenzy, forming itself into an effectual barricade. But after a short delay the glittering train began to move on anew, the booming guns of the Tower accompanying in deep bass the treble of bursting loyalty. In Mark Lane and Tower Street, Elizabeth had to listen to long speeches, not at all in proportion to the hours of a short November day; however, she smiled at her faithful lieges more lovingly than ever, giving undeniable proof of having studied the business of royalty to perfection. At length the immense procession reached the Tower, strangest of royal palaces, and more strange and momentous to Elizabeth than to any sovereign that ever entered its gates. But the queen did not seem particularly affected on riding, in all the pomp and glory of majesty, within the dark walls on which the blood of her mother had trickled, and which had been very near becoming her own tomb. Like most women of great intellect, Elizabeth had but shallow feelings and a barren imagination. The sight of the glittering sword of state, carried before her by the earl of Pembroke, extinguished all dreams of the glittering axe which severed the head of Anne Boleyn, marchioness of Pembroke.

Elizabeth remained a week at the Tower, and on the 5th of December removed to the splendid palace which the Protector had built for himself in the

• SOMERSET HOUSE.

Strand, called after him Somerset House. Both here and at the Tower there were daily meetings of the privy council, presided over by the queen, at which questions of the gravest import had to be decided. The depth of misery and anarchy into which the kingdom had fallen under the rule of the priests was so great that immediate efforts were required to relieve it; and Cecil, fully aware of the state of affairs, did not fail to inspire his royal mistress, as well as his colleagues in the council, with all the energy required for the occasion. One of the most burning questions of the moment, absolutely admitting of no delay, was the foreign policy of England. Mary and Philip had embarked the country in a war with France, which was not only opposed to its best interests, but had led to the loss of Calais, looked upon by all as a public disgrace; and the immense difficulty before Cecil now was to re-establish peace, and at the same time to satisfy the national honour. France had become so strong and England so weak, that to regain Calais by force of arms was an absolute impossibility; and all that remained, therefore, was to obtain in the diplomatic field what could not be got in the field of battle. Cecil lost not a day in opening negotiations with the king of France as well as with Philip, both of whom had been trying to settle matters between them previous to the death of Mary, and the result was the meeting of peace commissioners at Cateau Cambresis, a small town in the north of France, close to the Flemish frontier. It was quite clear that all the eloquence in the world which the English ambassadors might bring into the proceedings here would be utterly lost as long as Philip and Henri II. should combine to oppose them, and Cecil's policy consequently was to divide the interest of these two sovereigns by holding out separate proposals of alliance to each. However, as there was nothing in substance to offer to the French king, not even money, the secret negotiations with him soon fell to the ground, and all efforts for obtaining a honourable peace, and, if possible, get back Calais, had to be concentrated in fostering the goodwill of Philip towards England, or rather the fair sovereign of England. Philip was not at all unwilling to become protector of both the queen and her realm, but he assumed a haughty air, wishing to be wooed rather than to become a wooer. This exactly suited the purposes of Cecil, who did not cease to ply Philip's ambassador with fair speeches about the affection of the queen for his master, and the gratitude which she felt for his past services. Elizabeth herself did not hesitate to assist actively in befooling the noble envoy of the king of Spain, although the immediate consequence was a vast amount of arrogance and even insolence on his part. But the queen's smiles and fair words took full effect upon the negotiations at Cateau Cambresis, and it was too late the son of Kaiser Charles discovered that he was no match either in the arts of diplomacy or of love-making for the daughter of Anne Boleyn.

After a week's sojourn at Somerset House, the queen interrupted the even tenour of her life of hard work by another little show. She buried her sister. A gorgeous funeral procession passed into Westminster Abbey on the 13th of December, and the body of Mary having been deposited in the chapel of Henry VII. with all the rites and solemnities of the Roman Catholic church, the queen, who figured as chief mourner, sat down to listen to a Latin sermon delivered by Dr. White, successor of Gardiner in the see of Winchester. The sermon, nominally a eulogy of the deceased sovereign of England, contained in reality the manifesto of the papal party, and, having been prepared in great secrecy by the Romish prelates, fell startling upon the ear of Elizabeth. Dr. White, after lavishing the greatest praise, on the late queen for having established the supremacy of the church of Rome, addressed himself directly to her successor, lecturing her upon the well-known text, "Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak, but they are commanded to be under obedience." Though not given to quote the Scriptures, the bishop of Winchester, like most of his Roman Catholic brethren, made use of them when it suited his purpose, and the text of St. Paul was too good for Dr. White to leave him to hesitate extracting nourishment from it. He added to the zest by informing the queen that though he had loved her predecessor much better, he had a certain regard for her; "for," exclaimed the worthy prelate, "melior est canis vivus leone mortuo"—better is a living dog than a dead lion. This was too much of a joke for Elizabeth, and her patience not standing the trial of being called a dog, even in Latin, she gave orders for the arrest of the bishop, as soon as he had descended from the pulpit. The prelate, a thorough fanatic, and thoroughly in earnest, hurled defiance at the queen, threatening her with excommunication, which had the effect of softening her anger by making her inclined to laugh. Though not a very earnest Protestant, Elizabeth felt terribly sceptic about priestly thunders.

Although both Cecil and the queen felt visible hesitation to declare themselves in regard to the great question of religion sooner than absolutely necessary, and before the civil administration of the kingdom had been established on a new and powerful basis, it soon became evident that the subject allowed no long postponement, uppermost as it was in all men's minds. The ultra Protestant party, taking it for granted that the sympathies of the queen were with them, which was not by any means the case, began the agitation by turning some of the most fanatic of the Roman Catholic priests from their churches, destroying the images, and prohibiting mass; and the movement, once commenced, gradually spread in larger and larger circles, fanned chiefly by the ardour of a number of Protestant refugees, who had sought an asylum on the continent during the reign of Mary, and had come back imbued with strongly Calvinistic doctrines and all the zeal of martyrs. Elizabeth, whose religious convictions, weak on the whole, were inclined rather to Catholicism than to Calvinism, made men to punish the disturbers of peace, but was retained by Cecil, who more clearly understood the current of events. Fully appreciating the great fact that the overwhelming majority of the nation was Protestant at heart, and had become still more so by the lasting effects of Romish persecution, Cecil, looking upon the subject entirely from a political point of view, saw the necessity of leaving some freedom to the religious movement, and even encouraging it as conducive to the welfare of the state. The queen, who believed in majorities quite as much as her prime minister, had nothing to oppose to the arguments of Cecil; and after the injudicious attack upon her by the bishop of Winchester, which deeply hurt her vanity, she showed herself quite prepared to throw the gauntlet to the priesthood. An incident following immediately after, of not much importance in itself, though grave in its consequences, served further to exasperate the queen, whereupon she hesitated no longer, and finally and for ever threw off the bonds of Rome.

Among the envoys sent abroad by Cecil to notify Elizabeth's accession to the throne, was Sir Edward Carne, who had been instructed to convey the news to Pope Paul IV., as one of the sovereigns with whom the court of England was in diplomatic relations. The embassy was a simple matter of princely etiquette, and the sovereign of the Roman states, temporal as well as spiritual ruler, might have taken it as such under ordinary circumstances: and ought to have taken it as such, if consulting his own true interests. But Paul IV. was altogether a strange and wayward being, peevish and petulant like a child, although past eighty, and full of fancies about the almightiness of the church, while he himself was in the clutches of a Spanish army, and his eyes were looking every day at the ruins left by the sack of Rome. When Sir Edward Carne called upon him, Paul was in one of his exalted moods, and to the polite notification that Queen Elizabeth had ascended the throne of England and of Ireland, he replied that England and Ireland were fiefs of the papal see, that no sovereign could assume the crown without his consent, and that his order was that Elizabeth should lay down the sceptre immediately, and await his further decision. There was more bluster to the same effect, and senseless as it was, coming from a tottering old man verging towards second childhood, and whose power was not sufficient to drive a Spanish grenadier from his own door step, the careful diplomatist despatched by Cecil reported home every word of it, not forgetting to state the reiterated assertion of the pontiff of Elizabeth being a bastard. This was more than the queen could be expected to forgive, and, ordering Cecil to recall his envoy immediately from the papal court, she at once resolved upon her own course of retaliation. Up to this time Elizabeth had regularly attended mass in her private chapel, observing all the ceremonies of the church of Rome; she now proclaimed her secession from it, in a manner which, if not queen-like, was extremely woman-like. On Christmas Day she went to her closet in great state, magnificently attired, and surrounded by her whole court, prepared, to all appearances, to attend the high festival of the church in the usual manner. But suddenly, when the Gospel was concluded, and the bishop of Carlisle was preparing to celebrate high mass, the queen arose and grandly swept out of the chapel, and the whole court following her example, as in duty bound, the poor prelate was left with uplifted hands in front of the altar, stunned by surprise, wondering whether the ceiling would fall down upon him, or the earth open to swallow him alive. It was thus Elizabeth seceded from the church of Rome.

The secession of the people of England, after the same simple and highly dramatic fashion, was clearly not possible, and Cecil, therefore, had to summon a parliament to undertake the work. The faithful commons of England were so well accustomed to begin a new reign by repealing all the statutes passed in the preceding one, that not the slightest difficulty was apprehended in once more reversing the wheels of state policy; and the due preparations having been made, writs for the elections were issued in the first days of 1559. But preceding the opening of parliament, Elizabeth resolved to go through the ceremony of coronation, so as to add to her own popularity by a renewed employ of those little artifices of royalty which she had so well mastered, and of the skillful use of which she was thoroughly conscious. The grand ceremony was fixed to take place on the 15th of January, a Sunday; and the day before, the queen, according to ancient custom, went in state from the Tower to Westminster to show herself to her loving subjects. Having spent the early hours of the day in making several new lords, among them Sir Henry Carey, nephew of Anne Boleyn, elevated to the peerage as Lord Hunsdon, she set out from the Tower at two in the afternoon, in a chariot covered with crimson velvet, over which was borne a gold-embroidered canopy held by knights and barons. The streets were crowded with people throughout the whole course of the procession, and Elizabeth distributed her smiles and loving words in such profusion as to surpass herself as a royal actress. The good citizens of London went mad with joy on witnessing the grace and condescension of their royal mistress. As reported by the old chronicler, Holinshed, who was an eye witness of the splendid show of which the queen was the centre and soul, "When the people made the air ring with praying to God for her prosperity, she thanked them with exceeding liveliness both of countenance and voice, and wished neither prosperity nor safety to herself which might not be for their common good. As she passed by the companies of the city, standing in their homes, she took particular knowledge of them, and graced them with many witty formalities of speech. She diligently both observed and commended such devices as were presented to her, and to that end sometimes caused her coach to stand still, sometimes to be removed to places of best advantage for hearing and for sight, and in the mean time fairly entranced the people to be silent. And when she understood not the meaning of any representation, or could not perfectly hear some speeches that were made, she caused the same to be declared unto her. When the recorder of the city presented to her a purse of crimson satin, very richly and curiously wrought, and therein a thousand marks in gold, with request that she would continue a gracious mistress to the city, she answered that she was bound in natural obligation so to do, not for their gold but for their good wills, and that, as they had been at great expense of treasure that day to honour her passage, so all the days of her life she would be ready to expend not only her treasure, but the dearest drops of her blood to maintain and increase their flourishing state." It was clearly impossible to carry the high art of queenship to greater perfection.

There was a curious difficulty in proceeding to the coronation of Elizabeth. No prelate could be found to perform that sacred function, save the queen's chaplain, the bishop of Carlisle, and he had no proper garments. Cardinal Pole had left—for various reasons, chiefly for not being able to find a sufficient number of zealots—more than one half of the bishoprics untenanted, and the ultra fanatics in office had shown themselves so hostile to the queen, that their services could not well be asked. Of all the bishops, Dr. Oglethorpe, the tenant of the see of Carlisle, was alone willing to undertake the coronation business: but he, too, justly 'offended with the queen for having disturbed his service on Christmas Day, would only do it under the condition of the coronation taking place with all the rites of the Roman Catholic church. This was consented to by Elizabeth, with the little compromise that he should read the Gospel and Epistle in English as well as in Latin. However, the arrangement left the greater difficulty untouched. Poor Dr. Oglethorpe had got no clothes, and the queen had got no money wherewith to buy them. Gresham's financial embassy was proving rather resultless at the beginning, both the Jews and Christians of Antwerp being unwilling to part with their cash on the mere security of fair words, and there being no chance of a rise in English credit abroad as long as the twenty per cent. loans remained unpaid, and the queen's government was not established on a much firmer footing than that of her predecessor. In this emergency, nothing remained but to borrow the proper episcopal costume for the coronation, and Dr. Bonner of London was prevailed upon to cede his robes for a day to the bishop of Carlisle. The foul murders of the great priestly hangman had stained his soul only, and not his vestments, else might they have been unfit to figure at a queen's coronation.

The great ceremony was gone through with all the pomp and glitter usual on the occasion. Elizabeth, clad in a mantle of crimson velvet, furred with ermine, walked majestically from Westminster Hall into the abbey, taking her seat on a chair of state at the high altar. Having said the Lord's Prayer and taken the coronation oath, the bishop of Carlisle proceeded to anoint her, while she was kneeling upon cushions, with a cloth spread over her costly velvet mantle to prevent its being stained. The latter precaution was necessary, for poor Dr. Oglethorpe had bought cheap oil, which, as her majesty told her attendants immediately after, "was like grease, and smelled ill." However, cheap or dear, the oil did its duty, and Elizabeth having, like a true woman, examined her crimson velvet, and seen that it had not suffered under the process, she went behind a screen near the altar, and had her dress changed for the final part of the ceremony. Reappearing before the vast multitude assembled in the abbey, she stood forth in a mantle of cloth of gold, ermine-lined, with a belt across her shoulder, and a long sword dangling at her side. The bishop next placed the regal crown on her head and the sceptre into her hand, and the remaining formalities having been accomplished, Elizabeth returned to Westminster Hall, to sit down to a joyous banquet, in the midst of her nobles and courtiers. When all were feasting, the champion of England, Sir Edward Dymock, came riding into the hall in full armour, and, throwing down his iron gauntlet, challenged all the world to fight him in defence of the right of "the most high and mighty princess, our dread sovereign, Lady Elizabeth, by the grace of God queen of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the true, ancient, and Catholic faith; most worthy empress from the Orade Isles to the mountains Pyrenees." There was nobody to reply to the challenge; and having vainly waited for some minutes, Sir Edward Dymock swung down from his prancing steed, put his gauntlet into his pocket, and sat down at the table among the other guests, fulfilling, to the best of his power, his duties as champion of England.

It was intended to open parliament on the 23rd of January, but the queen having caught a bad cold at her coronation, the opening had to be postponed for two days. On Wednesday, the 25th, Elizabeth went to parliament in person, received with more enthusiasm than ever by the crowds which met her on the road. The queen having taken her seat on the throne, the royal speech was read by Sir Nicholas Bacon, a friend of Cecil, and appointed by him lord chancellor in place of Dr. Heath, archbishop of York, who had held the seals under Mary. Parliament was informed, in the opening address, that the queen was firmly determined to carry on the government of the realm for the good of the people, without the least regard to her own private interests, nothing being so dear to her as the love and affection of her subjects. After dwelling for some length upon this point, as pleasant to the ears of the parliamentary representatives of the nation as to the mob of London, the speech went to discuss the important question of finance. The queen communicated to her faithful commons the fact that enormous debts were owing abroad, with "biting interest," and that money was greatly wanting both to pay off these debts and to place the country in a proper position for defence against internal as well as external foes. There was an outspoken conviction as to England having sunk very low among the nations of the world, having become, in fact, a mere "ragged state torn by misgovernment;" nevertheless, the queen expressed the strongest hopes that with the assistance of the estates of the realm, she would soon be able to restore it to its former high place. "Her highness," the lord chancellor concluded, more and more fervent upon the great subject of the royal speech, the call for money, "her highness has commanded me to say, that were it not for the preservation of your own selves and the surety of the state, she would rather have adventured her own life than troubled you. And albeit you yourselves see that this is no matter of will, no matter of displeasure, no private cause of her own, but for the defence of our country, and the preservation of every private man's home and family, her majesty's pleasure is that nothing shall be demanded of her loving subjects but that which they, of their own free liberality, be contented frankly and freely to offer: so great is the trust and confidence that she reposes in them, and the love and affection that she bears towards them." The address was greeted with all the applause it deserved, for scarcely ever before had the lords and commons of England listened to such a coaxing speech from the throne.

The queen's confidence in the "free liberality" of her loving subjects was fully realised in the grant of the most bountiful supplies. Without hesitation, and almost without discussion, the commons voted forthwith two fifteenths and tenths, half-a-crown in the pound on all personal property, and four shillings in the pound on the rents of land. On the demand of Cecil, the act was made to include all persons in the realm, spiritual as well as temporal, whereby a most significant change was introduced, the clergy having hitherto undertaken to tax themselves in convocation.

The passing of this clause proved at once that the representatives of the people would not show the least hesitation to sweep overboard the whole of the statutes bearing upon religion which had been passed in the last reign, if but the executive asked them to do so. Accordingly, a number of bills, placing the ecclesiastical government of the kingdom upon very nearly the same footing on which it had been in the reign of Edward VI., were brought in by Cecil, and passed without other opposition than that of the bishops and a few zealous Roman Catholic lords. The first and most important of these statutes, called "an act restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical and spiritual, and abolishing all foreign power repugnant to the same," swept away, in a few words, the whole structure of papal power which Mary and Cardinal Pole had built up in the fires of persecution, to last, they vainly fancied, to the end of time. It was enacted by one of the clauses of the new statute that all bishops and archbishops, judges, doctors of law, ministers, and officers under government should make a statement upon oath, declaring "that the queen's highness is the only supreme governor of this realm and of all other her highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual and ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal." The punishment set upon the non-obedience of this law was comparatively mild, consisting only in fines and imprisonment for short periods; and it was ordered, moreover, that the commissioners who might be appointed by the crown to watch over the carrying out of the statute, and to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the place of refractory bishops and priests, should adjudge no other matters to be heresy but such as were declared to be so by Holy Scripture. The same spirit of moderation prevailed all the other laws passed for the change of the national religion, and though many of the members of the lower house showed themselves much inclined to go further, they were not allowed to do so, care being taken throughout to check the rushing tide of anti-papal reaction. Elizabeth, no more than her great minister, forgot arithmetic over religion. They knew that the vast majority of the people of England were Protestants, but they did not become oblivious, therefore, of the fact that a strong and active minority remained Roman Catholics. Undeniably, there was wisdom in arithmetic.

The extreme anxiety of the representatives of the people to please the queen in everything, was not without its object. Having been most liberal in money matters, and obedient in all other respects, the members of the House of Commons approached her majesty on Monday, the 6th of February, to submit a petition. It was nothing less than an earnest request, in the name of the nation, that Elizabeth would take unto herself a husband, so as to end, under God's blessing, all fears of an extinction of the noble Tudor race. The petition was handed to the queen by a deputation of the House of Commons, including the speaker and most distinguished members. She sitting in state, in the great gallery of Whitehall Palace, looking very serious and more than usually proud. Glancing over the parchment placed in her hands, Elizabeth stated, in a few words, that she would dovote her whole attention to the subject, so as to be prepared to give her reply before the end of the week. The promise was kept, and on Friday, the 10th of February, the members of the House of Commons were summoned again into the presence of her majesty. She addressed them in a long and very curious speech, passing in review the whole course of her past life. If ever a woman, Elizabeth said, was pressed by outward circumstances to seek a protector in a husband, she was and always had been in that state. Dangers innumerable had threatened her from her earliest "years of understanding," and for a time she had lain under "peril of death." After alluding, in a somewhat mysterious way, to attempts of murder to which she had been exposed when a prisoner in but faint; probably the listeners thought that, even from an oratorical point of view, there was too much stress laid upon the word virgin.

Elizabeth's reply to the address of the House of Commons was deemed altogether unsatisfactory by the majority of the members. The horrors of the last reign were still too vividly in their memory that they should not shrink back in affright from a repetition: which yet was not only possible but probable as long as the succession to the throne remained unsettled. As matters stood, the next heir to the crown, taking the lineal descent from Henry VII., and disregarding the despotic will of his son and successor, was the young queen of Scotland; and as she had been educated in strict conformity with the creed of Rome, and was believed to, be entirely under the influence of priestly zealots, there was but too much reason to fear that her accession would bring back the dark nightmare of popery into England. The fear was much increased by recent proceedings in France, which distinctly revealed the intentions of the government of that country to uphold the succession of the Scottish queen to the throne of England, if necessary by force of arms. Mary Stuart, having been brought up at the French court since the age of six, and lost, in almost all respects, her own nationality, was married to the dauphin, eldest son of King Henri II., on the 24th of April, 1558, when little more than fifteen years old. Five days before the nuptials, an impor-

the Tower, she continued: "Could all have drawn or dissuaded me, I had not now remained in this virgin estate wherein you see me: but so constant have I always continued in this my determination that, though my words and youth seem hardly to agree together, yet is it true that, to this day, I stand free from any other meanin'." In this tone, Elizabeth continued for some time longer, not stating, however, any clear reason for not marrying, except that her issue, or, as she expressed it, "such offspring as may come of me," might "grow out of kind and become ungracious." The speech concluded with a little burst of stilted oratory, which, coming from the lips of a young woman of twenty-five, with not unsullied reputation, sounded altogether odd. "When I received this ring," Elizabeth exclaimed, holding up her coronation ring, "I solemnly bound myself in marriage to the realm, and for the memorial of my name and of my glory, it will be quite sufficient that the inscription on my marble tomb shall state 'Here lieth Elizabeth, who reigned a virgin and died a virgin.'" The applause which greeted this piece of eloquence was tant treaty, taking the form of a marriage-contract, was signed by the archbishop of Glasgow and eight other commissioners, deputed by the Scottish parliament to represent the nation, by the terms of which Scotland was connected in intimate personal union with France. The treaty settled that should there be any male issue from the union of the dauphin and Mary Stuart, the eldest son should be king of Scotland as well as of France, but if, on the other hand, daughters only were born, unable to inherit the crown of France, the eldest of them should be queen of Scotland, yet remain likewise a French princess, receiving as such an annuity of four hundred thousand crowns, and forbidden to marry without the consent of the French king. In the meanwhile the dauphin was to assume the title and arms of king of Scotland, and in the event of his death, the queen, his widow, was to receive a jointure of six hundred thousand livres. This settlement, to a great extent, destroyed the independence of Scotland, and what remained of it was annihilated by a secret treaty which Mary was induced to sign, without the knowledge of the Scottish commissioners, on the 4th of April, 1558, three weeks before her marriage. The secret treaty, consisting of two acts, was of the most extraordinary nature. By the first of these acts the queen made a full and free donation of the realm of Scotland to the kings of France, in consideration, as was stated, of the services which they had at all times rendered to Scotland by defending her against the English, her "ancient and inveterate enemies," and, in particular, for the assistance which King Henri II. had rendered to herself by protecting the country during her minority. By the second act of the treaty Mary Stuart conveyed to Henri II. her claims upon England and Ireland, he promising to sustain them by force of arms, both as king of France and as prospective ruler of Scotland. In thus giving away what she had no right to give, Mary Stuart committed a political crime which was to weigh heavily upon her all her life; nevertheless, in the beginning it served to raise her importance in the French court, while greatly arousing the fears of English politicians. Secret as was the treaty of the 4th of April, its main contents soon spread among the public, chiefly through the vanity of the young husband of Mary, only a year older than herself. On the instigation of the priestly party, he pretended, after the accession of Elizabeth, to have become legitimate king of England, by right of his consort; and speaking of the maiden queen as a bastard and usurper, he openly called himself, with the seeming approbation of his father, king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It was an offence which Elizabeth did never forget nor forgive in all her transactions with Mary Stuart.

In the weakened state of the government, and the bankruptcy of the national exchequer, the hostile attitude of France was not without its dangers; nevertheless, it brought the one advantage to Elizabeth of making King Philip her steadfast political friend. The son of Kaiser Charles had become aware by this time that the royal virgin of England was trifling with him, not having the least intention to accept his proffered hand, and replying to all his love-letters by more empty compliments; yet he continued not the less to uphold her cause at the congress of Cateau Cambresis, where the commissioners of Spain, France, and England kept negotiating terms of peace between the three countries. Little pleased as Philip was with the general course of affairs in England and with the refusal of his hand by the proud daughter of Anne Boleyn, he yet infinitely preferred to see her on the throne, and the country prosper under her rule, than to let it fall under the dominion of the royal house of France. Philip was no great politician, but the fact of France being the chief foe and rival of his own family in the race for continental dominion was one which he could never forget, and it remained his prime duty, therefore, to prevent the aggrandisement of that country. Thus, when the dauphin, Mary Stuart's husband, began to assume the titles of king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, Philip at once drew nearer to Elizabeth, promising his earnest support in the event of any struggle with France, and engaging, in the meanwhile, to procure for her the most honourable terms of peace that could be obtained. He kept his word in the latter respect. The great difficulty at the congress of Cateau Cambresis, the proceedings of which threatened to run into interminable length, was about Calais. Elizabeth, through the mouth of her ambassadors, declared that Calais was an English town, and that she would never make peace without its being given up; while Henri II., imitating her tone, firmly insisted that Calais was a French town, the ancient patrimony of his predecessors, and should never fall into foreign hands again, as long as he had a ducat in his pocket and an arquebuser in the field. At this point, therefore, all negotiations came to a standstill, till at length Philip cut the Gordian knot. He proposed that the king of France should bind himself to restore Calais to England at the end of eight years, in the condition in which it had been lost, giving not only his word of honour to fulfil the contract, but delivering proper hostages into the hands of Elizabeth. The French commissioners demurring to this, Philip assumed a determined attitude, declaring that if his conditions were not complied with at once, he would re-enter upon war, marching one half of his army upon Paris, and the other half towards Calais. The prospect seemed unpleasant to Henri II., and after a few more vain attempts to get better terms, his ambassadors declared themselves ready to subscribe to the proposed treaty. It was signed on the 2nd of April, 1559, the stipulation being not only that Calais should be restored at the end of eight years, but that the French should raze the fortresses which they had built on the Scotch border, and that the dauphin and his royal consort should confirm the settlement thus made, and directly recognise Elizabeth's title to the crown of England. These conditions were, apparently, extremely favourable to Elizabeth, and such as she could have never hoped to obtain without the aid of Philip. However, in reality, the treaty was utterly valueless, for before many weeks were passed it became clear that the king of France had not the slightest intention to fulfil the stipulation extorted from him about the restoration of Calais, and the dauphin had no more inclination to be faithful to his own engagements. Henri II. and his son solemnly ratified the Cateau Cambresis document, and immediately after they had done so, orders were despatched to strengthen Calais, while the young husband of Mary Stuart made no scruple in continuing to sign his name as, "Francis, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, and Ireland." There was more than one symptom to show that this was not meant to be an empty phrase.

The pretensions of the French court seriously alarmed Elizabeth, so much so as almost to induce her to change her opinions about marriage. In June, 1559, the Spanish ambassador, Alvarez de Quadra, bishop of Aquila, despatched an anxious message to Philip, informing him that the queen was inclined, after all, to take a husband. "An envoy," De Quadra wrote, "has come in haste from France to say that the dauphin, after having publicly assumed the royal arms of England, is about to be proclaimed king of Scotland, England, and Ireland. The queen, when she heard it, said that she would 'take a husband who should make the king of France's head ache, and that he little knew what a buffet she could give him.'" To Philip this was no pleasant news, since he himself, after vainly striving for Elizabeth's hand, had become affianced to the daughter of Henri II., and as the refusal of all his ardent matrimonial offers was based on the plea that the queen was determined never to marry, it naturally inflicted a deep wound on his vanity. However, Elizabeth's momentary ebullition of feeling did not last long. There came scores of princely suitors from foreign parts, all willing to "make the king of France's headache," but the queen, evidently fearing they might make her own head ache too, sent them or their ambassadors home with compliments. Among the most notable of the matrimonial candidates were two archdukes of Austria, Ferdinand and Charles, a son of the elector of Saxony, and Eric, heir to the kingdom of Sweden. Elizabeth was sufficiently well stored with female conceit to be delighted by the wooing of so many illustrious princes; however, her general behaviour soon showed that she had not the slightest intention to sacrifice her liberty in favour of any one man. While publicly she expressed herself in the most complimentary terms in respect to her high-born suitors, she sneered at them in private. Of the Archduke Ferdinand she said that she had no doubt he was a fine Catholic, and she felt quite sure he knew well how to tell his beads, and pray for the souls in purgatory; while of Charles she remarked that he seemed a very good man, but rather too fond of sitting by the fireside all day long. If ever she took a husband, she exclaimed, it should be some one who could ride, and hunt, and fight. Eric of Sweden would have been the man after this pattern, for he rode much, hunted more, and fought always, being altogether one of the greatest ruffians in the august circle of European princedom. But against him Elizabeth had other objections. She thought he was not religious enough, and undeclared as to his Protestantism; while, on the other hand, she fancied that the prince of Saxony was rather too Protestant, inclining towards the doctrines of Calvin. It was evident that the queen was very difficult to please, the cause of which the Spanish ambassador tried to explain to his master in a little private note. "They tell me," he wrote, "that she is enamoured of my Lord Robert Dudley, and will never let him leave her side. He is in such favour that people say she visits him in his chamber, day and night." The connection was not complimentary to the good taste, no more than the good morals of Queen Elizabeth. Public opinion was unanimous in holding that Lord Robert Dudley, her majesty's intimate friend and master of the horse, was the greatest fool, if not also the greatest knave in all England, his only recommendation being a smooth face, and a glib tongue fluent in prattling soft nonsense. The fact that Dudley was united to a fair and innocent young wife, from whose society he was withdrawn by her being forbidden to appear at court, made the intercourse, if possible, still more disgraceful to Elizabeth. On more than one occasion Cecil exhibited a noble courage, by reminding his mistress of her false position. When the news that the duchess of Suffolk had married her equerry, a man named Adrian Stokes, reached court, the queen exclaimed, "What! has she married her horsekeeper?" "Yea, madam," replied Cecil, "and she says you would like to do the same with yours."

One of the first consequences of Elizabeth's unwillingness, or want of opportunity, to enter the matrimonial state, was the hostile attitude which it became necessary to assume against both France and Scotland. Mary Stuart possessed, without doubt, the best claim to the crown of England on the demise of Elizabeth without legitimate offspring; but it was, likewise, without any doubt, entirely opposed to the true policy of the new government to allow the claim of Mary Stuart, or even to permit her name to be brought forward as heir apparent. It was in her that the fanatic members of the Roman Catholic party centred their hopes of restoring England to the pope; and the religious reform, brought about so easily by Elizabeth's first parliament, was not complete as long as there remained a pretender to the throne whose advent might be expected to throw everything again into confusion, if not to introduce another reign of priestly murder. That the great bulk of the English people had become Protestant was sufficiently proved by the fact, not only that the parliamentary statutes, repealing the enactments of the reign of Mary, were received everywhere with the greatest enthusiasm, but that the clergy themselves, though mostly appointed by the papal legate, and selected chiefly for bigotry, made no scruples to proclaim their adherence to the new state of things. The royal commissioners appointed to see to the execution of the statutes had a very easy task, for out of 9,400 persons holding cures of souls, less than 200 made any opposition to take the demanded oath, or wished to resign their livings. The bishops alone stood out in resistance, buoyed up by the hope that another Mary would soon come to restore the use of the fine old means for bringing back stray sheep to the fold of the good shepherd of Rome. Owing to Cardinal Polo's neglect in filling vacant sees, there were only fourteen bishops in existence, and the whole of these, with the exception of one, refused to acknowledge Elizabeth as supreme head, or, as she preferred to be called, governor of the church. The exception was Dr. Kitchen, a worthy prelate, not devoid of the spirit of human mutability, but ever and always faithful to the see of Llandaff, to which he had been appointed early in the reign of Henry VIII. Under his majesty, of blessed memory, Dr. Kitchen, originally a Benedictine monk, became first a Protestant, and subsequently again a Catholic; but as soon as Edward VI. ascended the throne, he professed himself once more a fervent adherent of the doctrines of Luther. This he remained steadfastly till the accession of Queen Mary, when he made a solemn declaration of his unflinching adherence to the church of Rome and to the authority of the holy father the pope. When Elizabeth assumed the sceptre, Dr. Kitchen was wavering, getting rather old, and was not able to see with accustomed clearness in which direction the tide was running; however, as soon as he found it out, he showed himself more loyal than ever to the sovereign of the realm, and more faithful than ever to the see of Llandaff. The commissioners had no difficulty whatever to get the oath of the right reverend Dr. Kitchen, acknowledging the royal supremacy; but his thirteen brother prelates absolutely refused it, and had to be dealt with otherwise. Neither Elizabeth nor Cecil were inclined to be severe, and all that was done was to discharge the contumacious bishops with a pension, and to appoint others, chiefly Protestant divines who had fled into Germany and Switzerland during the late reign of terror, in their stead. Most of the pensioned bishops remained quiet; but a few talked treason, so that it became necessary to place them in confinement. But they were tolerably well treated, Cecil looking upon them not as actual enemies of the government, but as persons dangerous only in the case of the principal foe of the queen becoming victorious. To oppose this foe, embodying a political as well as religious principle, was the principal aim of Elizabeth's great minister. He hated not, nor even vehemently disliked, but he feared the party of Mary Stuart; and he feared it the more when a sudden extraordinary event placed it on the top of political power.

On the 29th of June, 1559, a splendid tournament was held at Paris in honour of the marriage of the eldest daughter of Henri II., to Philip, ruler of Spain, of Burgundy, and the Netherlands. The king of France, always fond of pomp and show, and proud of the reputation of his court as being the most brilliant, as well as the most dissolute in Europe, had summoned around him the whole of the nobility, male and female, of the country, to do honour to the great event which was to bind the two chief royal families of Europe in close amity and relationship. The scene of the tournament was at the end of the road of St. Antoine, close to the walls of the Bastille, crowded for the moment with heretic Huguenots, shut up previous to being burnt for the glory of the holy apostolic church of Rome. Near to the northern entrance of the gloomy prison, a magnificent throne had been erected, overhung with the richest velvet, on which the royal arms of England were embroidered in lines of gold. On all the galleries around, as well as on the breasts and sleeves of the heralds, were likewise glittering the arms of England, in token that the legitimate heir of the crown would grace the festival with her presence. The time for the joust having arrived, two gorgeous heralds came marching up, crying, "Place pour la Reine d'Angleterre," when in swept a long and magnificent procession, headed by Mary Stuart and her young husband. Then the tournament began, the principal knights in the lists being the duke de Guise, conqueror of Calais and uncle of Mary Stuart, with the duke de Nemours, of the blood royal of France, on the one side, and Alphonso d'Este, prince of Ferrara, with King Henri II., on the other. The tilting lasted for above an hour, the king, heated with wine, insisting to break lances not only with his regular opponents, but with several officers of his guard. They all were courtiers enough and experienced enough in tilting to submit to his strokes, and not to hurt him in return; but when at last he called upon a Scotch nobleman, Count Montgomery de Lorge, to break a lance with him, there seemed peril in the play. Count Montgomery, captain in the Scotch life-guards, though a good courtier, was not known as a good jouster; and fearing danger, Catherine de Medici, wife of Henri, called upon her lord not to expose himself any longer. But the king would not listen, and getting more and more excited, sharply ordered Montgomery, who showed himself most unwilling, to enter the lists against him. A few minutes after, and the festive aspect of the illustrious assembly had changed into a look of petrified horror. The king and Montgomery ran heavily against each other, both breaking their lances; but the Scottish knight, instead of immediately throwing away the stump remaining in his hand, as customary in tournaments, kept clutching it tightly, and the horses continuing their course, the ragged piece of wood pierced the king's armour at the lower part of the face, pierced his helmet, and went right into his eye, the splinters coming out at the top of the head. Henri at once fell upon the neck of his horse, the blood gushing forward in streams, and the brain protruding from his head. Horror and amazement for a moment stayed every hand from lending assistance to the king, whose horse kept galloping on till nearly exhausted, when the bleeding body was dragged away from it, and carried into the palace of Tournelles, in the St. Antoine road. The unhappy monarch was unconscious, and there was not the slightest hope of his ever opening his gory eyes again; nevertheless, his iron frame refused to give way at once, and, speechless and sightless, he lingered on for ten days longer, under more atrocious tortures of body than even his hangmen had been able to inflict on the Huguenots in the Bastille. On the 10th of July, Henri II. drew his last breath, and early on the morning of the 11th, the news arrived in London that Mary Stuart had been proclaimed queen of France.

The event was overwhelming in its importance. King Henri II., though in alliance with the pope, and not disinclined to allow his young daughter-in-law the pleasure of calling herself queen of England, had always been, more or less, a friend of Elizabeth, before as well as after her accession, warmly advocating her cause when she was lying a prisoner in the Tower, and showing somewhat of his old good-will even in the favourable terms of the treaty of Cateau Cambresis. His death, on a sudden, reversed this policy, throwing the whole power of one of the mightiest and most despotic governments in the world into the hands of a young woman, the declared enemy of Queen Elizabeth. Mary Stuart in reality became by the death of Henri II. absolute sovereign of France as Elizabeth was of England, her husband, eldest son of Henri, who ascended the throne as Francis II., being but a weakly and sickly boy, not more than sixteen years old, without physical or mental strength, passionately attached to her, and entirely under her control. The power which had fallen into her hands, Mary exercised at once, by appointing her uncles, the Guises, to all the high positions in the state, so as virtually to make the government of the kingdom over to them. France had been for some time past the prey of two contending parties, conservatives and reformers, each representing religious as well as political views, and fighting with such mutual animosity that even Henri II., with all his energy, had scarce been able to keep them down. The conservatives, headed by the five brothers Guise, uncles of Mary Stuart, represented the most powerful of these parties, both in numbers and in the talent of their leaders. Three at least out of the five brothers of the Guise family, the cardinal de Lorraine, the marquis d'Elbeuf, and a lord de

Guise, were men of high talent and of extraordinary energy, and the fact that they were not less talented than unprincipled, the cardinal, among others, being known as one of the greatest libertines of the witty and vicious court of France, in some measure added to their strength, in an age and a country absolutely corrupted and ruled by priestly cunning and physical force. Opposed to the conservative and ultra-Catholic faction of the Guises, was the reform and Protestant party, headed by the Prince de Condé and his brother, the king of Navarre, and supported for a while, though not with sincerity, by the able and unscrupulous Catherine de Medici, consort of Henri II. After the tragic death of her husband, Catherine seemed for a moment doubtful whether she should attach herself to the conservatives or to the reformers; but as soon as she saw that the Guises were getting the upper hand, she unhesitatingly threw her influence into the scale with them. The immediate ascendancy of the uncles of Mary Stuart was owing partly to the popularity of the duke de Guise, the conqueror of Calais, and partly, and still more, to the adroit manner in which the young queen placed herself at the helm of the government, quietly pushing her boy-husband aside, and reigning in his name. In less than a month after Henri's death, Mary and her uncles felt themselves so securely established in power as to deem it safe to declare the main objects of their policy. They were, an intimate alliance with the pope, the violent extirpation of heresy in France, the reduction of Scotland, and the conquest of England. The projects of conquest were no empty boast, but extremely serious, the duke de Guise, eager to gather fresh laurels, making immediate preparations for assembling an army for shipment to Scotland. His plan was to subdue, in the first instance, the northern kingdom, heirloom of his niece, and from thence to march into England, and strengthened by the adherence of all good Roman Catholics, to push the illegitimate usurper from the throne and restore the ancient faith of the realm. France, the warlike uncle of Mary Stuart loudly declared, was ready to stake a hundred thousand men on the glory of uniting three kingdoms under one sceptre, one church, and one code of laws—un roi, une loi, une loi. The dream was not unworthy the chief of the Guises.

To meet the threatening invasion, Elizabeth had neither troops, nor arms, nor guns, nor ships, nor money. An official investigation, made in the spring of 1559, showed that the whole naval force in commission consisted of exactly seven coast-guard vessels, the largest of one hundred and twenty tons burthen, besides eight small merchant brigs, carrying a couple of guns each, which were purchased in the last days of Queen Mary, with the noble intention of recovering Calais. This was the naval force of England actually afloat; but in the harbours of the kingdom the official investigators found nine other small vessels, all more or less rotten, and into which sailors could not be expected to trust their lives. However, there were no sailors whose lives could be risked; nor was there any properly disciplined force fit to be called an army. The greater number of fighting men collected together were stationed at Portsmouth, but the commander despatched a vessel to bring them into something like discipline, reported that the whole lot were "grown to misorder and mischief, and to the greatest ill than man's head can imagine." Two things at least were required to raise fresh bodies of troops, arms and money, and Elizabeth was ill provided with either. The larger part of the grant of her first parliament was spent at once in paying off the most greedy of the twenty-per-cent. Jews, into whose meshes the late government had fallen, and the rest went in shows and festivities which, the queen persuaded herself, were necessary to uphold the dignity of the crown, and to add to her personal popularity. The want of money was scarcely compensated by a small stock of artillery, which the royal commissioners, to their own great surprise, discovered in the dockyards. There were piled up, covered with dust and cobwebs, about thirty cannon and "demi-cannon," all supposed to be sound, besides some two hundred "culverins," "minions," and "falconets." These were the only things to oppose to the threatened French invasion—these, and the loyal hearts of the queen's subjects. Elizabeth had full confidence in the latter, yet had studied history too well not to know that victory was apt to march in the train of big guns rather than loyal hearts.

There was one way open of saving England from the army of one hundred thousand which the Guises threatened to hurl upon its shores, and that was an intimate alliance with the Protestant party in Scotland, who had risen in rebellion against Mary Stuart and the regent, her mother. Ever since the French troops had taken possession of the country in the name of the young queen, the cause of the Reformation had been spreading in the northern kingdom, until its adherents had become strong enough to stand forth openly against the established rule, breaking its power by setting up a counter-government. Under the name of the "Lords of the Congregation," a number of the most influential nobles of Scotland, including the earls of Glencairn, Argyle, and Morton, lord James Stuart, bastard of James V., and many other great barons who had imbibed the doctrines of Luther and Calvin, had banded themselves together in close union, and assuming political as well as religious sway over their followers and adherents, had set up an insurrectionary rule—a state within a state. The movement commenced with the signing of a solemn "covenant," on the 31d of December, 1557, which set the laws of the country regarding religion at open defiance, by proclaiming the right of all not only to worship God after the dictates of their own conscience, but to denounce the faith and ceremonies of the church of Rome. Although strongly incited by the priests to crush the "Covenanters" at the outset, the princess-regent did not dare to provoke a collision with them, uncertain as she was of aid from France, and of the extent to which her brothers, the Guises, as well as her daughter, would be able to help her. Thus matters stood till the accession of Elizabeth, neither the French and papal party feeling sufficiently strong to suppress the ever-growing activity of the Lords of the Congregation, nor the latter to hazard a great stroke towards driving priests and foreigners out of the country. The victory of Protestantism in England necessarily influenced the state of affairs in Scotland, and Cecil, perceiving at once the extreme importance of an alliance with the reformers in the north, at once made preparations for effecting the object. Elizabeth, neither as bold nor as far-seeing as her great minister, at first withheld her consent to the proposed union, feeling a strong antipathy to rebels, a stronger one to rebels professing Calvinism, and the strongest of all to the person of the Calvinist rebel leader. John Knox, heart, head, and soul of the reformers, had published, while in exile at Geneva, a book fulminating against the two Marys, Queen Mary of England, and regent Mary of Scotland, who were burning heretics under priestly dictation, to which work, written with extraordinary power, he gave the title of "Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous regiment of women." Elizabeth, with all her male energy of character, had too much of female arrogance in her nature to pardon the bold trumpeter denouncing the vanities of her sex; she, therefore, expressed cordial hatred of Knox, declaring that she would have nothing to do with him and his friends. It was a fine theme for another chapter about "the monstrous regiment of women."

The narrow conceit of Elizabeth might have cost her a crown, had it not been for her able minister. Cecil, seeing that the alliance with the Scotch Protestants was a question of life and death for England, unhesitatingly insisted upon it, till he carried his point, and received the permission of the queen to treat with the Lords of the Congregation. The negotiations were carried on in great secrecy till the death of Henri II., when, on the danger of French invasion suddenly presenting itself, Cecil threw off his concealment, and the queen herself entered with some ardour into the undertaking. Towards the end of August, while Mary Stuart was basking in the first full sunshine of power, her throne surmounted by the arms of France, England, Scotland, and Ireland, Elizabeth despatched an experienced diplomatic gentleman, Sir Ralph Sadler, into Scotland, to enter into direct communication with the Protestant leaders. Though husbanding her own resources with the greatest parsimony, the queen did not shrink from spending money to get friends; and Sir Ralph was entrusted with the sum of three thousand pounds sterling for distribution among such of the pious Covenanters as might be in want of cash. His written instructions directed the envoy to approach "the rebels" softly, and, having put somewhat into the pockets of their great men, to stir them up to fight, "so as the French might be the better occupied with them, and the less with England." The diplomatic game did not answer entirely well; three thousand pounds was a small sum to be distributed among a whole host of hungry men; and every rebel worth bribing, and willing to be bribed, was fully aware that for each single gold piece dropping from the hands of thrifty Queen Elizabeth, ten at least might be obtained from brilliant Queen Mary. To arrive at terms more worthy of them and of England, the Lords of the Congregation came forward with a grand project. It was that the young earl of Arran, nearest heir to the crown of Scotland, should marry Elizabeth, and that, allegiance having been withdrawn from Mary Stuart, as ruler of a foreign country, the realms of England and Scotland should be united for ever under the descendants of the new dynasty. Hopeful as was the scheme, and apparently simple in execution, it came to nothing. Elizabeth consented to meet Arran at a secret interview, and left it firmly determined not to marry him. The Scottish earl was plain in features and embarrassed in speech, and as he stood side by side with Lord Robert Dudley, the queen drew a deep sigh, and abruptly left the room.

The intimacy of the queen with her handsome master of the horse had given rise to all sorts of rumours ever since her accession, and when one royal suitor after the other was dismissed by her, the belief became general that she intended to raise Dudley from the position of favoured lover to that of husband. But Dudley had a wife living, and it was necessary to get rid of her before he could think of giving his hand before the altar to his royal mistress. In the summer of 1559, there was much talk among all classes of the people of attempts he had made to poison her, and the speeches about it grew so loud that the foreign ambassadors discussed the subject in their official despatches. Under date of the 11th of September, Alvarez de Quadra, envoy of Philip, forwarded to his court a most extraordinary report of a conversation he had held with Cecil a few days before, which placed the whole of the rumours about the queen and her lover in a fearful light. "Secretary Cecil," the Spanish envoy wrote, "after many protestations and entreaties that I would keep secret what he was about to tell me, said that the queen was going on so strangely that he was about to withdraw from her service. It was a bad sailor, he said, who did not make for port when he saw a storm coming, and for himself he perceived the most manifest ruin impending over the queen through her intimacy with Lord Robert. The Lord Robert had made himself master of the business of the state and of the person of the queen, to the extreme injury of the realm, with the intention of marrying her; and she herself was shutting herself up in the palace, to the peril of her health and life. . . . He implored me, for the love of God, to remonstrate with the queen; to persuade her not utterly to throw herself away as she was doing, and to remember what she owed to herself and to her subjects." After further details of his conversation with Cecil, the ambassador concluded: "Last of all he said that they were thinking of destroying Lord Robert's wife. They had given out that she was ill; but she was not ill at all, but was very well, and was taking great care not to be poisoned. God, he trusted, would never permit such a crime to be accomplished, or allow so wicked a conspiracy to prosper."

Twenty-four hours after this conversation, the wife of Lord Robert Dudley was found dead at the foot of the staircase in her lonely dwelling of Cumnor Hall, near Oxford. That she was murdered there was no doubt, nor that she was sacrificed to the ambition of her handsome lord; but whose hands committed the foul deed no human judge, or jury, ever discovered. The bewitching master of the horse of Queen Elizabeth had been married to Amy Robsart eleven years, he being a lad of nineteen, and she a fair sweet girl of seventeen, at the time of the nuptials. It was a love-match, so-called—"nuptiæ carnales a lætitiâ incipiunt in luctu terminantur," as Cecil remarked of it—and, like all such unions, beset with misery. Having got tired of the charms of his pretty little wife, Lord Robert left her, and the sunshine of royal favour coming to distinguish him above all other courtiers and horse-masters, he shut her up at Cumnor Hall, out of the reach of friends and relations. Here Amy Dudley was "found dead" on the 8th of September; and on an inquest being held, the few servants attending in the house swore that they knew nothing whatever as to the way in which she had perished. Lord Robert stayed with the queen at Windsor when receiving the report that the body of his wife was lying stiff and stark and covered with gore at the foot of the staircase in the gloomy old hall in Berkshire, a few hours' journey from the royal palace. The master of the horse affected no sorrow for the frightful death of his consort, but concerned himself at once about the inquest on her body. Despatching a courier to his cousin, Sir Thomas Blount, he gave minute orders that "the discreetest and most substantial men should be chosen for the jury." The matter was managed faultlessly, and the twelve men selected to investigate the mysterious event were so entirely discreet as to bring in without hesitation a verdict of "Accidental death." It satisfied the queen, but did not satisfy the people of England, and loud cries that an atrocious murder had been committed and was being hushed up, broke out everywhere. The subject was discussed in highways and byways to such an extent that one of the most celebrated of Protestant preachers thought it his duty to inform Cecil that "the country was full of dangerous suspicion and muttering," to be allayed only by an "earnest searching and trying of the truth, with punishment if any were found guilty," so as to avoid "the displeasure of God, the dishonour of the queen, and the danger of the whole realm." Cecil duly reported this and other communications to the queen, but she only laughed at them, as pieces of absurdity. "She laughs too much for a honest woman," De Quadra wrote to his master.

The stories and scandals about the queen seemed to affect for a while as her reputation so her popularity. But the feeling lasted only for a very short time. Gradually, the people began to perceive that their sovereign was both more and less than a woman, and that, whatever her shortcomings and frailties in private life, she was by far the best ruler placed at the helm of the English government since the days of Henry VII. Before Elizabeth had been a year on the throne, the effects of her administration became visible both in the revived state of trade and industry, and in the respect with which England was looked upon by foreign countries, testified by numerous embassies. The first great effort of the government was to create an armed force for the defence of the kingdom, which was accomplished in the course of the year 1559. By Cecil's advice, the queen appropriated the whole of the revenues of the vacant bishoprics, and likewise confiscated for the public benefit the large grants of land and other property which her predecessor had made over to convents and abbeys, and the vast sums thus obtained served for building ships and purchasing arms. Thomas Gresham, who continued to be Elizabeth's financial and commercial envoy in the Netherlands, received orders to purchase at Antwerp and Liege as much war material as could be obtained, and he executed his task by sending shiploads of guns, swords, corslets, sulphur and saltpetre over to England. Meanwhile, carpenters and shipwrights were busy at home swinging axe and chisel. At Gillingham, on the mouth of the Mèdway, the archbishops of Canterbury had built themselves a magnificent palace, and near it stood the miraculous image of the holy Virgin, attracting thousands of pilgrims. Elizabeth converted the magnificent archiepiscopal mansion into a splendid carpenter's workshop, and the miraculous image of "Our Lady of Gillingham" having been removed to a lumber room, the pilgrims were asked to lend a hand in building ships and making anchors, ropes, and sails, which they did with so much good will as to convert in a few months the old haunt of monks into the first naval yard of the kingdom. By the end of the year 1559, there were twenty ships lying in Gillingham harbour, complete with guns, sails, and tackle, well stored with ammunition, manned for sea, and ready to sail at a moment's notice. Public rumour destined the twenty pilgrim men-of-war to reconquer Calais. Elizabeth, indeed, thought much of Calais; but Cecil told her, and she believed it, that her Calais for the time had to be sought in Scotland.

The plans of Cecil were vast and comprehensive, and were submitted to the queen in a paper drawn up by himself, headed "Memorial of certain points meet for the restoring of the realm of Scotland to the ancient wealo." The "points" were nearly the same previously advocated by the Protector Somerset, in whose footsteps Elizabeth's minister tried to follow. "It is to be noted," Cecil wrote, in his memorial, "that the best worldly felicity that Scotland can have, is either to continue in a perpetual peace with the kingdom of England, or to be one monarchy with England. If the first be sought, then must it necessarily be provided that Scotland be not so subject as it is presently to the appointments of France, the ancient enemy of England. As long as Scotland is at the command of the French, there is no hope to have accord long betwixt those two realms." To attain this great object, Elizabeth was advised to send immediately a body of troops, together with some ships and money, to the Scotch reformers, so as to enable them to drive the French from the country. "And then," Cecil concluded, "may the realm of Scotland consider, being once made free, what means may be devised, through God's goodness, to accord the two realms to live united for time to come, at the pleasure of Almighty God." Elizabeth had neither the boldness, nor the far-seeing wisdom of her great minister; but though, perhaps, she was not able to perceive with him that both the political and religious independence of the kingdom depended upon the closest alliance with the reform party in Scotland, she was sufficiently shrewd to appreciate the advantage that would accrue to her own interests and the security of her throne by a union with the northern Protestants. Gradually, and led more than leading, she allowed herself to be drawn into the execution of Cecil's policy. At the commencement of December, 1559, Sir William Winter, a newly-made young admiral, was commissioned to take fourteen out of the twenty ships lying in Gillingham harbour, and to sail into the Frith of Forth, to intercept a French squadron which, it was known, was preparing to carry reinforcements to the foreign garrisons in Scotland. This clearly meant war against France; but Elizabeth, still timid, attempted to prevent the movement being looked upon as such, by issuing dubious instructions to Sir William Winter. He was told in his commission, "to understand that the principal point of his service was to impeach the access of any more succour from France into Scotland, and to facilitate any departure thence toward France." He was further instructed that, "if he found himself strong enough, and if there was a convenient opportunity, war or no war, attacked or not attacked, he might destroy any armed vessels that he might fall in with." But there was an ugly condition attached to this lofty commission of her majesty. Sir William was enjoined to profess under no circumstances whatever that he was acting under orders from the queen and her government, but, when challenged, "to say that he was acting on his own responsibility." The French would have been perfectly justified, under these circumstances, to treat the Queen's admiral, should they defeat him, as a pirate, and tie him to the mast-head of the nearest vessel.

Sir William Winter, fortunately, was not defeated, but made his way into the Frith of Forth, the dangerous road before him having been swept clear, and the enemy scattered, by a tremendous gale, which arose at the critical moment in favour of England. Five days before Elizabeth's commander quitted the Medway, the marquis d'Elbeuf, lord high admiral of France, and brother of the duke de Guise, left Dieppe with a large fleet, consisting partly of transports, carrying foot soldiers and cavalry for service in Scotland, and partly of war ships, well manned and armed, and far superior in strength to the whole newly-built navy of England. The weather was fair when the French fleet sailed from Dieppe, so that, had it continued so, d'Elbeuf would have reached Leith before Sir William Winter with his fourteen ships had cleared the mouth of the Thames, and the landing of a new army in Scotland might have changed the course of history, as far as human calculations went. But human calculations were not to prevail for the moment. The French fleet had scarcely reached the entrance of the North Sea, when the wind, which had been south-east before, veered round to the opposite quarter, blowing fiercely, and increasing in vehemence until it acquired the force of a hurricane. For a whole week, the heavily-laden transports were tossed about furiously by the gale; some went to the bottom at once, and others were dashed against each other, the thick oaken spars flying about like chaff in the wind, and the wild cries of the drowning men perishing in the wilder uproar of the elements. Many of the French ships were driven against the flat coast of Holland, inaccessible amidst the gigantic tumult of the waves, the white-crested breakers rolling up into mountains. Not a living soul was saved of the whole proud fleet which had set out for the conquest of Scotland, except the crew of two vessels, one the flag-ship of the French admiral. The latter, after beating about for more than ten days in the channel, regained

Dieppe; while the second ship, commanded by captain de Martigues, one of the most expert sailors of the French navy, found a temporary refuge behind the string of islands guarding the entrance into the Zuyder Zee, and ultimately reached Leith. One hundred men, landed from this vessel, were the whole succour derived by the French in Scotland from an enterprise upon which Mary Stuart and her mother, the regent, had staked all their hopes.

Elizabeth's young fleet had but a narrow escape from the same storm which annihilated the French navy. Sir William Winter, with his fourteen Gillingham vessels, was overtaken by the storm a day after he had left the mouth of the Thames, but, sailing near the shore, was enabled to take shelter in Yarmouth roadstead, where he remained a fortnight. At the end of this time, being still ignorant of the terrible fate that had overtaken the enemy, he ventured forth, anxious to execute his commission, but was stopped by a fresh gale off Flamborough Head, and had to fall back into the Humber, with the loss of many of the ships' boats. It was not till the morning of the 24th of January, nearly a month after leaving the Medway, that he went sailing up the Frith of Forth, slowly drifting with the tide. The French looked on with astonishment at the fourteen strange ships, bristling with cannon, but with scarcely any men visible on board, and not denoting their nationality by name, flag, or colour. Silently and slowly, like phantoms of the sea, the unknown ships came drifting towards Burntisland, a small town on the northern shore of the Forth, which, together with the opposite isle of Inchkeith, had been strongly fortified by the French troops. The commander of the latter, General D'Oysel, seeing the strange men-of-war in the offing, at first imagined them to be the long-expected vessels of d'Elbeuf; but as they came nearer, without saluting the French flag at Inchkeith, and without showing any colours, or giving any signs of life whatever, he got suspicious, and ordered a blank shot to be fired across the bows of the nearest vessel. Still there was no answer, onward as before, silently and slowly, came the phantom ships. D'Oysel's patience now was exhausted, and springing to a gun, he fired right into the foremost of the strange men-of-war. The shot produced a startling effect. In an instant, the dead arose into life; armed men sprang forth from every nook and corner of the silent ships, and the flag of England came whirling up to the mast-heads. The young English admiral had waited to be attacked, and thought his queen would forgive him if he attacked the French in turn—even forgive him if he should beat them.

The beating was soon done. Two broadsides proved amply sufficient to stop the guns at Burntisland and along the shore, whereupon the admiral took possession of all the French vessels within reach, and despatched a detachment of sailors to cut off General D'Oysel's communication on the land side with Stirling, Edinburgh, and Leith. These had come to be the only places of importance held by the French, in the name of the queen of Scotland, the rest having fallen gradually under the authority of the reform party, headed by the Lords of the Congregation. As soon as the thunder of the English guns was heard at Burntisland, the Protestants rose through all the county of Fife, to help in cutting off the retreat of the French force under D'Oysel, which had become absolutely necessary by the blockade from the sea, involving a total loss of provisions. D'Oysel commenced his retreat the day after he had been attacked, determined to fight his way through difficulties apparently insurmountable. He set out from Burntisland, now a heap of ruins, in the middle of the night, the rain pouring down in streams, and no man having a morsel of food in his knapsack. All night long they marched, and all the next day, and all the next night, till, having made a long turn northward, to escape both the sailors of the English fleet and the forces of the reformers, they reached the bridge of Alloa, on the road to Stirling. Although having tasted no food for forty-eight hours, and marched in incessant rain, the fugitives had yet kept up their spirits by the hope of soon reaching the secure stronghold of their countrymen; but they were ready to sink down in despair when they found that Alloa Bridge, the only pass to Stirling, as well as to Edinburgh, had been broken, and the flooded river was rushing impetuously through the open arches. All despaired, save the general, who had no sooner glanced at the fatal bridge, when he conceived a plan to repair it. An order was issued to the astounded soldiers to lay down their arms, and set to unroof a large old church, standing close to the river-side. The work was soon accomplished, and the stout beams of the church roof having been laid upon the piers of the broken bridge, D'Oysel's troops marched across, and, at the end of a few hours, found themselves safe at Stirling, the first to tell the tale of the English attack and their own retreat.

At Edinburgh and Leith, the ignorance was naturally not the same as at Stirling, and the day after the arrival of the English fleet, the regent sent a herald to Sir William Winter, requesting to know by whose order he was laying war against the queen of Scotland. The admiral was ready with an answer, determined to fight a little and to lie a great deal for his gracious sovereign. He told the herald, with most serious countenance, that he had been sent "to conduct divers ships, loaded with ordnance and cannon, to Berwick," and that, "finding no sure anchorage there," he had, entirely on his own account, "resolved to seek the Forth, knowing no other but good peace between my sovereign and all other princes." In this peaceable mood, the young admiral complained, he had been most mischievously attacked. "As I was running into Leith roads," said he, "the French forts at Inchkeith and Burntisland shot at me, and I being therewith moved, and hearing the great cruelty which the French used against the Congregation of Scotland, I determined with myself to give all the aid I might to the Congregation, and to let the French from their wicked practices as far as I might—but hereof the Queen's highness, my mistress, was nothing privy." It was but a poor story, and that the admiral should ask the shrewd regent of Scotland to believe it, was really adding insult to injury. However, the tale was greatly approved of by Elizabeth, and the English envoys abroad were instructed to repeat it at the courts at which they were accredited and to add such expressions of regret at the "accident" in the Leith roads as might befit the situation. The terrible destruction of the fleet in the North Sea had cast the French government too much down to say a word in remonstrance to this explanation; but the regent of Scotland refused to receive it quietly, and sent a spirited letter to Count Noailles, her daughter's ambassador at London, to protest against the proceedings of Queen Elizabeth. "Such a mask," she wrote to Noailles, "is too easy to strip off. As if it were likely, or credible, that an officer and a subject should have the will, far less the power, of making war, not only without the consent, but without the orders of his sovereign. Speak openly to the queen. Bid her remember how God avenges unjust dealings." Count Noailles spoke as openly as was possible for a man grown grey in diplomacy, but failed to make the least impression upon Elizabeth. "This woman," the Spanish ambassador wrote to his master, commenting upon the events of the time, and particularly Elizabeth's warlike policy in Scotland—"this woman is possessed with a hundred thousand devils, and yet she pretends to me that she would like to be a nun, and live in a cell, and tell her beads from morning till night." The old bishop, King Philip's envoy, was evidently jealous of the maiden queen, being made aware daily of her infinite superiority in diplomatic craft. Able as he was to circumnavigate facts, he instinctively felt that he could never hope to arrive at such glorious heights of dissimulation as this young queen who wanted to be a nun.

Elizabeth had some excuses for the diplomatic trickery in which she showed herself so early a master. If she dissembled, her great antagonist, the queen of France and Scotland, dissembled still more, and there were serious fears that the intrigues from this quarter would bring about, sooner or later, a revolution. Hundreds of French emissaries, chiefly priests, were spread all over England, openly exciting the people to revolt by asserting that Elizabeth was illegitimate, and that the crown of right belonged to the Scottish queen, as nearest legitimate heir. Mary Stuart, too, continued to call herself queen of England, and to all the remonstrances of the English ambassador at Paris on the subject, there was no other answer but the very unsatisfactory one that it was a mere titular distinction, without any meaning attached to it. When pressed hard, Mary Stuart offered to put the question to arbitration whether she had a right to assume the title of queen of England, which naturally made matters infinitely worse, as it involved a claim, the very existence of which Elizabeth could not concede in honour to herself. The French ambassador was met by a burst of anger when submitting the proposition, and, in reply, the queen told him that "she would not suffer her estate to be thus neglected in the open sight of the world." Soon after, a meeting of the privy council was called together, and after a long and earnest debate, it was decided to send an army into Scotland. It was the unanimous opinion of the council that "the queen of Scots, her husband, and the house of Guise, were the mortal enemies of the queen's person," and that, "as long as her majesty and the queen of Scots were alive, they would never permit her majesty to live in assured peace." The members of the council further gave their advice that, unless the French were wholly driven out of Scotland, "her majesty, and all those who defended her title, would be in continual danger." Unwilling as Elizabeth was to declare war, and to enter into an alliance with the Calvinist reformers in the north, she felt she could hesitate no longer. Thus, much against her own desire, the queen drifted into a policy and towards a course of events which was to shape her whole reign and affect the history of England for centuries to come.

Cecil having signified to the Lords of the Congregation the willingness of her majesty to enter into an open alliance with them, a conference was arranged to take place at Berwick, and on the 25th of February, 1560, the duke of Norfolk was met here by five Scotch commissioners, the chief of whom were Lord Maxwell and Lord James Stuart, illegitimate son of King James V. Two days' discussion sufficed to bring about a formal treaty, securing an offensive and defensive alliance between Scotland and England. By the terms of this treaty, duly signed on the 27th of February by all parties, the queen of England, "in consideration of the attempt to annex Scotland to the French crown, and for the preservation of its ancient liberties," bound herself to furnish an army to assist the Scottish people to expel the foreign invaders, and, in return, the Scots engaged to provide an army at their own expense to assist England, in case the French should retaliate by invading it. The 25th of March was fixed as the time on which the English army should enter Scotland; but a slight delay ensued, retarding the important event for three days. On Thursday, the 28th of March, all was ready, and six thousand foot soldiers, together with two thousand horse, crossed the Tweed, at Berwick, under the command of Lord Grey, who was treading familiar ground, having marched eleven years before with the Protector towards the capital of Scotland. He now kept to the old road near the sea, but pushing forward slowly, until joined at Prestonpans, on the 4th of April, by the troops of the reformers. The meeting was hearty; however, Lord Grey could not suppress his feeling of deep mortification on finding that the allies for whom he was going to fight had only engaged for twenty days, the term commencing with the 25th of March, on which hostilities were to begin, so that under this arrangement the army of Scotland would dissolve in air in the course of about a week. To turn this week to the best account now became the chief object of the English commander, and he forthwith directed his own and the Scotch troops upon Leith, which had been fortified by the French, and supplied with a garrison of four thousand men, thus becoming their principal stronghold in the kingdom. But, by some unaccountable neglect, the siege guns, which were to be sent by sea from Berwick, had not arrived when Lord Grey's army sat down before Leith, nor, still more unaccountably, had Sir William Winter, whose fleet was lying in glorious inactivity in the Frith of Forth, received any orders to co-operate with the troops on shore. Thus the week passed, and the Scotch army disbanded itself, without taking Leith, or effecting the slightest advantage against the enemy. All that the English commander could do under the circumstances was to send a messenger to London, urging the immediate despatch of fresh troops, guns, and ammunition. The messenger presented himself before the queen in the second week of April—most important week in the history of the two kingdoms.

Even after the despatch of her army into Scotland, Elizabeth showed extreme unwillingness to make the cause of the Scottish reformers her own. It was owing to her distinctly expressed wish, that the English admiral was left without orders for co-operating with the army, and that even the cannon of Lord Grey's troops was retained at Berwick. All the persuasions of Cecil to proceed in the course once commenced proved fruitless, and the queen seemed on the point of utterly ruining her cause by her wavering mood and indecision, when a somewhat unexpected event suddenly changed the aspect of affairs. While the envoy from the camp before Leith was on the way to the queen, there arrived in London a new ambassador of King Philip, a Flemish nobleman, Seigneur de Glascon, the bearer of a special message to Elizabeth. He was instructed to tell her that the king of Spain, having heard of the assistance she had given to the heretics of Scotland, in arms against their lawful sovereign, thought it necessary to warn her not to continue the same course of policy, but to recall the ships and any troops she might have despatched, under pain of incurring the intense displeasure of his majesty, if not his open hostility. The message, faithfully delivered by Philip's envoy, stung Elizabeth to the quick. Her pride revolted at the cool insolence with which the Spanish king presumed to order her how to behave; and, though not forgetting for a moment the fact of his representing the first power of Europe, she at once, with true feminine impetuosity, resolved to set him at defiance. Immediate orders to send reinforcements, guns, and ammunition to the English troops in Scotland, were despatched to Leith, and Sir William Winter received instructions to co-operate, to the best of his power, with the commander of the army. The queen now loudly declared that she would never rest till the last Frenchman had been driven out of Scotland; and, to exhibit the warlike emotion which had suddenly sprung up in her breast, she summoned the London train bands together for exercise, and day after day kept galloping at their head in St. James's Park. The movement was slightly ludicrous; however, it had its effect upon the patriotism of the masses. Volunteers, ready to fight the French at the shortest notice, went flowing in streams to Berwick, and before the end of April a second English army was ready to march upon the Scottish capital.

The whole of the French troops in Scotland were now shut up in Leith, holding of Edinburgh only the castle. The approach from the sea-side having been stopped by the blockade of the English ships, the regent had no choice but to surrender Leith at once, or to defend it till the arrival of another French fleet, not expected before the middle of June. There was barely food enough within the walls of Leith to last till the middle of May; nevertheless, General D'Oysel, who had taken upon himself the command in chief, resolved to hold out to the last, trusting to the stout walls of the fortress as much as to the stout hearts of his soldiers, most of them old veterans, seasoned in many an Italian campaign. Lord Grey was by no means so well off in regard to troops as his antagonist, his men being mostly young, under loose discipline, unaccustomed to siege-work, and disheartened, to some extent, by a striking want of sympathy on the part of the Scotch people for whose sake they were staking their lives. Except a few noblemen and their servants, there were no Scotch troops in the English camp, and none could be induced to enlist, even under the offer of high pay. There remained nothing to Lord Grey but to fight the battle for the Scotch without the Scotch, and, as soon as his cannon had been landed from the ships, he set to work in the task before him. The big guns, as in many a previous contest of arms, again proved the best English weapon. Day and night the heavy ordnance kept battering the walls of Leith, and on the last day of April the havoc made was so great, that it seemed the town could no longer resist. On the evening of the day, the quarter nearest the harbour was perceived to be in flames, and, fanned by a strong northerly breeze, the fiery tongues went licking round the fortifications, till they had overlapped the whole place, and rose high up into the sky, illuminating with glare of day the English camp and fleet. Lord Grey expected momentarily the surrender of the garrison; but when hour after hour passed and the French came not, he determined to remind them of his presence the next day, by marching into the town. The next day came, the 1st of May, and no sooner had the first dawn announced itself in the golden tinge of the clouds, when the English troops got ready for the storm, expecting to have easy work by striding over open breaches. But when it was full daylight, Lord Grey, to his immense surprise, saw no open breaches before him, nor ruins blackened by fire, but walls as thick and as clean as ever, and soldiers marching upon the walls in holiday dress. The French had got it into their heads to imitate a native custom by celebrating May Day, and festooned garlands were hanging from fort to fort, with flowery May-poles on every bastion. The English troops, who had not yet forgotten the tremendous conflagration of the previous night, looked on in blank astonishment at all the flowers and garlands, somewhat doubtful whether the thing was a dream or reality. Then the French commenced dancing on the walls, around their May-poles, and Grey thought best to order his men back to their tents. Cannon and gunpowder were clearly lost upon an enemy who insisted on dancing.

On May Day, the guns ceased thundering against the walls of Leith, but the work of destruction commenced afresh with the dawn of the next morning. There arrived couriers in the English camp with despatches from Cecil and the queen, urging the energetic prosecution of the siege, and, if possible, an immediate assault. Another threatening letter from the monarch of Spain had raised the military ardour of Elizabeth to the highest pitch; and, forgetting all her former hesitation, by which the whole of the preparations for the war had been hampered and left incomplete, she now insisted that the French should be at once attacked and driven from their stronghold. Lord Grey, though fully aware of the danger and difficulty of the task, had not the courage to withstand the injunctions of the vehement royal lady, now suddenly thirsting for warlike fame. His character as a skilful general stood not very high; he had commanded at Guisnes, strongest of all the Calais outworks, when it was taken by the French, and to wipe out this defeat had become the great ambition of his life. He now resolved to take Leith at all hazards, and at all risks. After battering the walls for five days longer, from the morning of the 2nd till the evening of the 6th of May, he thought the breaches made sufficient to warrant a general storm, to take place early the next day. Late in the evening of the 6th, some of the chief officers inspected the fortifications, and strongly reported against the assault, as utterly impracticable for the moment; however, the commander-in-chief, goaded by ever-renewed taunts from the court, insisted that it should take place. Accordingly, the troops were got ready for the storm a little after midnight; and as soon as the first rays of day came creeping from over the eastern hills, there was a rush forward into the enemy's trenches. The outer works were soon taken, but when the storming-parties, with increased impetuosity, had jumped down into the second and deepest moat surrounding the fortifications, they found, to their utter dismay, that the scaling-ladders which they had brought with them were too short by more than a man's length. In vain the excited soldiers tried to climb up against the hard granite walls by lifting each other from the top of their ladders; there was no footing anywhere, and no sooner was a head raised above the battlements when it got knocked down by the bullets or butt-ends of the French. And not only Frenchmen, but Scotchwomen of the lowest classes came forward to bar the passage of the assaulting host. All along the ramparts stood swarms of "the Frenchmen's harlots," busy, with immense zeal, in loading guns, rolling tar-barrels, and pouring boiling pitch upon the heads of the English soldiers. For these, there was no possibility of fighting, and all they could do was to allow themselves to be killed. The work of slaughter went on for more than two hours, to the intense gratification of the regent, who, though seriously ill, and feeling life fast ebbing away, ordered herself to be carried on her couch to the summit of the castle, to enjoy the terrific spectacle. Never before did the eyes of the queen-mother behold such a sight. With fierce stubbornness, heedless of death, the English regiments kept dashing against the granite walls, surging upwards like storm-driven waves, and devoured like waves in their own element. Grim death fell down in showers from the ramparts of Leith, and the dark moat below became a yawning grave.

The carnage went on till the grave was choked, and the dying stopped the road of the living. But it was not before half the officers of his army had perished that Lord Grey ordered the bugles to sound a recall. Slowly the shattered remnant of the English host crept back to the tents, followed by a long train of wounded, of cripples, and of corpses. The spirit of the army was utterly broken, and it was feared every moment that the French would burst from their fortifications to mow down those that were left to kill. However, this was a groundless fear, for the French, although they had suffered little or nothing from the assault, were in no mood whatever to take the offensive. General D'Oysel's troops had plenty of courage, and plenty of guns and gunpowder, but they were short of food, having come to the end of dried fish and salt pork, and nearly eaten all their horses. Of immediate relief there was not the slightest hope, and even the prospect that French ships would break the blockade in the middle of June had become dim with the report that the Huguenots had risen, and that France was in the throes of civil war. Thus situated, General D'Oysel was as much inclined to bargain for oatmeal and fresh mutton as to fight for glory and the Roman Catholic religion; and having expressed his wishes to this effect to Lord Grey, who received them cordially, peace negotiations were opened at once. They promised to be the more successful as the queen-regent was daily getting weaker in health, and entirely unable to defend the interests of her daughter, so that free action was left to the wishes of the French general and his officers, all of whom were far more anxious to return to their native country than to continue in a land offering few charms, and most unattractive in regard to victuals. To Elizabeth the offer of peace was as welcome as to the commander in Scotland: for although the defeat sustained from the French was galling to her pride, she could not help seeing that a prolongation of the struggle would lead to nothing but useless waste of life, and, what was nearly as important to her, waste of money. She, therefore, fully acquiesced in the negotiations, and, to bring them to a safe end, desired Cecil to proceed to Scotland.

The preparations which Cecil had to make to leave his power in safe hands, somewhat delayed his departure, so that he did not reach Edinburgh till the 16th of June, nearly seven weeks after the commencement of the negotiations. An important event had occurred in the meanwhile, in the death of the queen-regent, Marie of Lorraine, widow of James V., once the brightest ornament of the most brilliant court in the world, with half a dozen kings basking in the sunshine of her beauty, but now, and for years past, a grim horotic-hunting termagant, closed her eyes for the final rest at midnight on the 11th of June. Around her couch stood many of the Scotch nobility, together with D'Oysel and the chief officers of the French army, to all of whom she bid a solemn farewell, exhorting them to be loving, peaceful, and tolerant towards each other as well as towards their enemies. It was that kind of advice which the dying are so fond to give, little as they may have practised it, and which the living accept with so much reverence, yet follow so seldom. But the audience surrounding the deathbed of Marie of Lorraine was really anxious to give weight to her dying exhortation, the great interest of the hour to all parties being that of peace. The French, on their part, made no secret as to the reason why they desired peace above all things. Four days after the death of the regent, the officers of D'Oysel's army invited those in the English camp to a friendly entertainment on Leith sands, the condition being that each side should "bring with them such victuals as they had in store," as a contribution to the general feast. The invitation having been accepted, Lord Grey and his officers appeared on the ground like well-bred English gentlemen, loaded with roast fowl, hams, beef, capons, fine white bread, and all sorts of delicious wines. The French came late, after the table had been spread, and they excused themselves for their dilatoriness with the long time it had taken to procure and duly prepare their viands. They then opened their provision baskets, and the gentlemen of England beheld, on napkins white as snow, two onions, a piece of baked horse, and four dozen rats, beautifully roasted, with a laurel leaf at the tail of each.

The arrival of Elizabeth's great minister saved the remnant of the rats of Leith from being roasted, and the gallant Frenchmen from the trouble of roasting them. Although at first the peace negotiations went on in a very unsatisfactory manner, being hampered by the intervention of Monseigneur de Montluc, bishop of Valence, ambassador despatched by Mary Stuart and her husband, Cecil managed to settle all difficulties in threatening to resume siege operations by a new and powerful army which the duke of Norfolk was collecting at the border. The worthy ecclesiastic who represented the interests of the Scottish queen dimly felt that this would involve him in partaking with his countrymen of all the delicacies of Leith cookery, and the prospect growing less and less agreeable every day, Monseigneur de Montluc finally resolved to submit to the conditions laid down by the head of the English government. On the 6th of July, Cecil and Lord Grey, on the part of Elizabeth, and General D'Oysel and Montluc, on the part of Mary Stuart and Francis II., set their names to a definite peace agreement, known as the treaty of Edinburgh. The principal clauses of the treaty were that the French troops should quit Scotland for ever; that the fortifications of Leith should be demolished, that the queen of France and Scotland, as well as the king, her husband, should cease to claim or assume the style and title of the sovereign of England; that no foreigners should be allowed to serve either as civil or military officers in Scotland; and, finally, that the government of the Scottish realm, during the absence of the queen, should be confided to a council of twelve members, seven of them to be appointed by the queen, and five by the representatives of the people assembled in parliament. By a further stipulation of the treaty, the next parliament, fixed to take place in the month of August, was also empowered to settle all matters pertaining to religion. As the last clause was a vast concession to the Scotch reformers, granting everything they could possibly desire, so was the whole treaty a signal victory of English policy. When the ships which bore away the French army set sail in Leith harbour, Elizabeth could feel that her throne had come to stand on a new foundation.

The treaty of Edinburgh, important as it was as a victory of the English, was still more so as a defeat of the French government. Mary Stuart and her uncles, the Guises, bitterly felt it so, but they were absolutely powerless to do more than give vent to their grief. France, since the death of Henri II., had fallen into a state of complete anarchy through the misgovernment of its rulers, and was standing on the brink of destruction through the strife of internal foes. The boy-king, Mary Stuart's husband, suffering from leprous disease, was a convenient tool for the execution of the plans of the Guises, which tended to nothing less than the extirpation of heresy, and the establishment of a strong absolutist rule, upheld by priestly fanaticism and backed by the stake and the gallows. The Guises themselves, all of them able men, with large brains and small conscience, were fully aware of the difficulty of the task, but still they overrated the power of their allies, the priests, for crushing the seeds of heresy. There were above a million of Protestants, or Huguenots, in France, representing the flower of the middle classes, and to crush them it did not suffice, as the Guises calculated, to fulminate excommunications in chapels and churches, to prohibit Bibles and prayer meetings, and to send a score of hangmen through the land as teachers of true religion. Unlike the Protestant subjects of King Philip in the Netherlands, who, with Flemish endurance, allowed themselves to be killed in the name of God, the French heretics assumed an aggressive attitude, declaring their readiness to defend their faith, not only with their lips but with stout arms wielding stout swords. On the first signs of religious persecution becoming evident, the chief leaders of the Huguenots met in secret assembly at the city of Nantes to prepare measures for resisting the storm. After mature deliberation, it was decided to form an army, and to march in small bands towards Blois, where the king and the Guises were staying; to take the latter prisoners, to bring them to trial, and to appoint fresh guides and advisers to his majesty. There seemed great chances at first that this conspiracy would be successful, several thousands of Huguenots, many of them old soldiers, taking their oath to overthrow the hated tyranny of the Guises or to perish in the attempt. But the number itself made secrecy almost impossible, and the whole plan having been betrayed to the uncles of Mary Stuart, they lost not a moment to crush their enemies. Removing with the king from Blois to the fortified city of Amboise, they gathered as many defenders around them as the priests were able to raise, and all the roads being strongly guarded, the Huguenots were taken prisoners in groups as they approached, and at once thrown into subterranean dungeons prepared for their reception. When all had been thus secured, the work of vengeance commenced. Long lines of gallows were erected in the streets of the city, and on these the prisoners were hung in scores, without trial, without examination, and without the least form of judgment. All through the month of March, while Elizabeth's army was making preparations to march into Scotland, the work of murder went on within Amboise, in sight of Mary Stuart and her young husband. When the hangmen had broken down under the fatigue of their terrible work, Mary's uncles ordered rows of scaffolds to be built, to cut off heads by the wholesale. To save trouble, the dead bodies of the heretics were cast together in heaps, till all the streets of the city ran red with blood, and long purple streaks were seen floating down the river Loire. But even this was weary work, and when it had lasted nearly a month, the cardinal de Lorraine conceived the idea of finishing the business while providing entertainment for the ladies. It was arranged that the remaining heretics should be drowned like dogs, for the glory of God, and the amusement of the royal family. Accordingly, in the last days of March, the Huguenots not yet slaughtered were chained to long poles, eight, ten, and a dozen at a time, and thrown into the river, with the queen and her maidens looking on from the high balcony of the castle. Each group of martyrs kept floating for a while, till dragged down by their ionic, and the spectacle so amused the court as to give rise to loud exclamations of delight. Even king Francis forgot that he was a leper in the pleasing excitement of seeing his subjects drowned.

Like all martyrdom, that of the French Protestants bore its immediate fruit. So far from feeling cowed or subdued, the Huguenots, after the massacres of Amboise, showed themselves more bold and courageous than ever in defence of their religion. They organised secret associations throughout the country, procured large supplies of arms and ammunition, and even sent ambassadors to England to seek aid and protection from the queen. Elizabeth thought intervention in French affairs too bold a game, although the recovery of Calais was looming at the end of it, Cecil, on his part, received the Huguenot messengers with openly-expressed satisfaction, holding out hopes of assistance after a time, if not at once. Already Cecil saw clearly the absolute necessity of England taking the lead in the new religious movement in Europe, and of soaring to greatness by assisting other nations to throw off the bondage to Rome. But Elizabeth's political sagacity could not rise to this height all at once, and even the success of Cecil's labours in Scotland, so far from giving her faith in his policy, made her only distrust it. While the Huguenot envoys were yet lingering near the English court, the estates of Scotland assembled, in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Edinburgh, to settle the future administration of the realm, civil as well as religious. At the very first meeting of the Scotch parliament its overwhelmingly Protestant character became evident. The ecclesiastical benches were almost entirely deserted, and while the leading Lords of the Congregation and their friends filled every seat, the state of ancient government was singularly illustrated by the empty throne which was standing at one end of the hall, with a dusty crown, mace, and sword lying on the top. The proceedings of parliament amounted to a complete revolution. By a series of acts, rapidly and almost unanimously passed, Roman Catholicism and the jurisdiction of the pope were abolished for ever, and terrible penalties were enacted against all who should continue to attend or celebrate mass, the first offence involving confiscation of property, and the last, punishment of death. These acts were preceded by a Confession of Faith, based on the doctrines of Calvin, which were thereby solemnly acknowledged by the representatives of the nation. The confession ended in the warlike prayer, "Arise, O Lord, and let thy enemies be confounded; let them flee fra thy presence that haik thy godly name; give thy servandis strenth to speik thy worde in baldness, and lat all natiounis cleif to thy trew knowledge. Amen."

Queen Elizabeth did not like the Confession of Faith, nor any of the proceedings of the Scottish parliament. To Knox, the soul and leader of the reformation in the north, she had a strong dislike, which the great reformer tried in vain to overcome by friendly and even submissive letters, offered as an atonement for his unhappy book on "the monstrous regiment of women." But besides this personal grievance, which might have vanished in time, the queen had another and far more serious objection to the doings of her northern allies. She felt instinctively, and she felt truly, that the doctrines propagated among them were directed against irresponsible crown-bearers as much as against irresponsible priests, and that they would lead in the end to a republican instead of a monarchical form of government. Luther, in his revolt against established authority, stopped short at the throne; Calvin, bolder in spirit, and living in democratic surroundings, went one step further in censuring kings who deserved censure; but Knox, greatest and most fearless of apostles of the truth, went far beyond these leaders, advocating not merely reform but revolution. Scotland's apostle, like another Elijah, felt "very jealous for the Lord God of hosts," and, following the doctrines of Luther and Calvin to their logical sequel, was nobly steadfast in his determination not to allow kings, any more than popes, to stand between high heaven and his own soul. He loudly proclaimed the right of subjects to punish bad rulers like other malefactors, and to resist princes whenever they should transgress the law of God—dogmas and maxims naturally very displeasing to the ears of the daughter of Henry VIII. That they were not meant to be mere maxims, but good to be converted into strong substantial facts, the estates of Scotland went to prove to Elizabeth. In the new constitution which they elaborated very little was said about the privileges of kings, but a great deal about the privileges of men. The system of future ecclesiastical and, to some extent, civil government, was laid down in a Book of Discipline, in the drawing up of which Knox took a leading part. This charter, among others, established the startling innovation that the religious sovereignty should reside in the people, as the source of all authority. The people alone, the Book of Discipline ordered, should possess the right to appoint preachers and ministers of religion, whose sacred function was declared to originate, not in the imposition of hands, or any other ceremony denoting ecclesiastical authority, but in the conscientious election of the faithful members of the church. In the eyes of the representatives of Scotland the episcopal government of England was as much an abomination as the hierarchy of Rome, and they did not hesitate to hold it up to contumely as a remnant of foul superstition, offensive to all godly men. Instead of into bishoprics, the Scottish parliament divided the kingdom into religious districts, ten in number, over which were placed as many ministers, bearing the title of superintendents. But their duty was not only to superintend the religious worship, but the manners and morals of the people; to teach, as well as to preach; to give alms to the poor, and instruction to the ignorant, and, in general, to show the ways upon earth as well as the road to heaven. It was a gigantic revolution in all respects, such as no nation ever went through in so short a space of time. In little more than a month, while the estates were sitting at Edinburgh, Scotland became, from a feudal monarchy, the most democratic republic upon earth.

But though actually and virtually a republic, the disciples of Knox were wise enough not to proclaim Scotland as such, well aware that as yet the physical strength of the nation was not equal to the assertion of its independence. On the other hand, it seemed impossible that, after the French troops had been cast out, and the new constitution been framed, Scotland should continue under the sovereignty of the queen of France, even though her authority might be only a shadow. There was clearly no security for what Scotchmen held dearer than their lives, their religion, as long as the sceptre was in the hands of a princess, foreign in all but birth, ultra-papist in all her views, surrounded by Jesuits, and openly exhibiting the bent of her inclination by looking on with satisfaction, if not directly ordering, the cold murder of Protestants. The massacre of the Huguenots at Amboise had made it impossible that the queen of France should continue to be queen of Scotland, and the only question now was as to who should take her place. The old plan, warmly approved of by Cecil, of marrying the earl of Arrian, next heir to the Scottish crown, to Elizabeth, and to unite the two realms, appeared in all respects the best solution of the difficulty, and, after mature deliberation, the estates resolved to take the important step of directly offering a crown and a kingdom to the maiden queen. The resolution was passed in the month of September, 1560, and a special embassy set out immediately for London with an address to Elizabeth's council—a most remarkable document. "Other devices," said the representatives of Scotland, commenting upon the position of their country, "may seem probable for a time; but, we fear, not for long. We wish the best, though many incidents may fall out to change the course, but if this [the marriage] shall take place, then are all doubts removed for ever. We have no king to offer you—the more sorry we; but we present unto you him who, being in place next unto a king, shall bring with him the friendship and force of a kingdom. We assure you with him of the hearts and good-will of a whole nation, which you may never by riches obtain. We present no stranger, but in manner your own countryman, seeing this isle is a common country to us both; one that speaketh your own language, one of the same religion. You need not fear that by marriage of a king of Scotland unto a queen of England, the pre-eminence of England might be defaced, for that should always remain still the worthiness thereof; neither need you fear any alteration of the laws, seeing the laws of Scotland were taken out of England, and, therefore, both these realms are ruled by one fashion. By these means Ireland might be reformed, and thus the queen of England become the strongest princess upon the seas, and establish a certain monarchy by itself in the ocean, divided from the rest of the world."

The noble language of Scotland's deputies made no impression upon Elizabeth. Once more all her greatness as a queen disappeared in her littleness as a woman. Whatever affection there was in her heart was given to that vain, frivolous, and aptly-headed scoundrel.

drel whom all the nation accused of the murder of his own wife, and it was for his sake that she declined becoming monarch of Scotland as of England, and the "strongest princess upon the seas." It was in vain that Cecil, backed by the whole privy council, pressed her to accept the Scottish offer, and, by a slight personal sacrifice on her part, to gain the blessings of two nations. Elizabeth would not listen, and kept dallying with Dudley, who, false and treacherous as ever, had in the meanwhile got into secret communication with the Spanish ambassador, offering to bring the kingdom back to the allegiance of Rome, if his master would give his consent and assistance to his marriage with the queen. This was an offer as foolish as unnecessary, for had Elizabeth willed to make a husband of her master of the horse, the consent of the king of Spain was certainly not required. When she had positively refused the earl of Arran, and with him the crown of Scotland, the great anxiety of the privy council was that she should marry somebody, even though it might be the detested Dudley. Lord Sussex strongly expressed this feeling in a letter to Cecil, discussing the marriage question: "I wish not," wrote Sussex, "that her majesty should linger over a matter of so great importance, but choose speedily, and thereupon follow so much of her own affection as by the looking upon him whom she should choose, omnes ejus sensus titillarentur, which shall be the readiest way, with the help of God, to bring us a blessed prince. If I knew that England had other rightful inheritors, I would then advise otherwise, and seek to serve the time by a husband's choice. But, seeing she is ultimum refugium, and that no riches, friendship, foreign alliance, or any other present commodity that might come by a husband, can serve our turn without issue of her body, if the queen will love anybody, let her love where and whom she list, so much thirst I to see her love." Lord Sussex did not understand his royal mistress quite well enough to know that, ready as she was to love her master of the horse, she was not at all ready to marry him. Perhaps at moments she stood at the brink of crushing her pride to the extent of contemplating the union; but those moments of passion quickly vanished, and with them Dudley's hopes. They had never been raised higher than at the time when Lord Sussex's letter was written, in the beginning of November, just after the failure of the Scotch negotiations. Already the courtiers came crouching at the feet of the queen's favourite, for she had dropped hints of marriage, and gone so far as to give orders to create him a peer. The patent was drawn out accordingly, and duly laid before the queen for signature. She looked at it, carefully read it, and carefully cut it to pieces with a penknife.

The penknife operation was not a mere changing whim on the part of Elizabeth; but caused by a piece of rather important news which she had just received. The news came from France, where various strange events had taken place subsequent to the massacres of Amboise. When all the Huguenots within reach of the walls of Mary Stuart had been killed, the Guises bethought themselves of seizing and destroying the chief leader, the prince de Condé, brother of King Anthony of Navarre prospective heir to the throne. It was a dangerous undertaking, but, carried out with great boldness, succeeded remarkably well. Both Condé and the king of Navarre were invited to be present at a meeting of the estates of France, to be held at Orleans; and, arriving in the city, the former was thrown at once into prison, and the latter had his guards taken from him and was forbidden to leave his residence. Condé was immediately put upon his trial, accused of having conspired with the Huguenots to overturn the government and to seize the person of the sovereign. In the meanwhile, to get rid of King Anthony, who could not be tried, the Guises devised a notable scheme. They persuaded their young monarch to invite his illustrious relative to an interview within the castle of Orleans, to get up a quarrel with him, and, when at its height, to draw his dagger and cry for help, on which soldiers were to rush into the room and despatch the king of Navarre. All the details of the plan were carefully arranged, and it might have succeeded but for the unexpected interference of Catherine de Medici, mother of Francis. She was ostensibly a friend of the Guises, yet profoundly mistrustful of them, as well as jealous of Mary Stuart; and as the destruction of the king of Navarre and his brother was evidently serving no other end but that of increasing their power, she resolved to prevent it by all the means at her command. While whispering to her royal son not to lend himself too readily to the work of assassination, she furnished secret information to King Anthony of the intended scheme, and the effect was that it proved abortive. Meeting Francis face to face, the king fixed his eyes with a keen searching gaze upon him, as if trying to read in his very soul. The crowned youth, trained as he was in the school of murder, shrank under the stern gaze, trembled and faltered, and, after a few minutes thus passed, the meeting came to an end, the cardinal de Lorraine, who was watching with his assassins in an adjoining room, listening in vain for the signal to begin the butchery. Great was the disappointment, and to remedy it Lorraine and his brothers settled that a brilliant hunting party should take place in the environs of Chambord and Chenonceaux, that the king of Navarre should be invited to it, and that he should be placed under the special charge and guidance of some of the huntsmen who had been waiting for him in the royal antechamber. Anthony of Navarre tried to excuse himself, but the young king insisted that he should go, and the great sport was fixed to take place on the 16th of November. But late in the evening of Sunday, the 15th of November, when Francis was kneeling devoutly in his chapel before the image of the Virgin, turning his rosary, he was suddenly seen to fall to the ground in a swoon. Carried to his couch and recovering consciousness, he complained of pains in the back of the head, and had medicines administered to him. They seemed to take effect, and he was visibly better the next day, though not able to leave his bed, so that the great hunt had to be postponed. At the end of a week, his majesty was sufficiently recovered to append his signature to several death-warrants, among others that of the prince de Condé, condemned by a special tribunal appointed by the duke de Guise. The execution was fixed to take place at Orleans on the 10th of December, the day of the opening of the estates of France, on which it was designed to produce effect, many known Protestants having been chosen representatives of the people. Preparations for the meeting of parliament, the great hunt, and the great execution, now filled up the whole time of the Guises, when all at once, more suddenly than ever, Francis II. fell again to the ground in a swoon. It was on the evening of the 4th of December, at the moment when the young monarch was sitting down to a grand banquet, given in honour of the arrival at Orleans of a new pontifical legate. Doctors were soon on the spot, but this time they and their medicines were useless. After lingering for a few hours in semi-unconsciousness, Francis II. expired on the morning of the 5th of December, not quite seventeen years old. Mary Stuart, after a reign of less than a year and a half, had ceased to be queen of France.

The death of the poor leper who had worn the crown of France was followed by the most momentous consequences. Francis II. had scarcely drawn his last breath when all the courtiers and great officers of state, including the Guises, sank on their knees before the king of Navarre, whose murder they had been planning but an hour before. By the laws of succession, the crown devolved upon prince Charles, brother of the defunct, ten years old, while the king of Navarre, his nearest male relative, became regent. His first act was to open the prison door of his brother, lying for execution; and his second to ally himself with Catherine de Medici, and to expel the Guises from all the positions of trust and power which they had engrossed to themselves. The revolution did not take many hours to accomplish, and those who had been rulers of a kingdom on the morning of the 5th of December, found themselves suspected traitors in the evening, while the two brothers condemned to be killed had seized the helm of the government. The Guises might have attempted to dispute possession with the king of Navarre and his brother, both of them brave, but not wise or even adroit men, had not all their other enemies come forward at the same time. The co-operation of shrewd Catherine de Medici was in itself a tower of strength to the new ruler, and it was greatly increased by the report that the constable de Montmorency was marching from Paris upon Orleans with a large body of retainers, to take possession of the command-in-chief of the army from which he had been driven by the Guises. The latter now saw the hopelessness of any further attempts to regain power, and quitted the court precipitately, the cardinal de Lorraine making Mary Stuart the companion of his flight. When, on the 10th of December, the new boy-king opened the estates of the kingdom with great pomp, the tall figure of Anthony of Navarre at his side, the streets of Orleans offered an extraordinary sight. While the adherents of the Guises went rushing out of the southern gates of the city, the troops of Montmorency came marching in at the north, and between the two streams of soldiers and armed men a small funeral procession, issuing from the cathedral, seemed in imminent danger of being crushed. It was a singular procession, the centre being composed of a mean-looking funeral car, with a royal crown on the top, but with no other followers but one bishop, stone-blind, led by two old chamberlains. The blind prelate was Guillard, bishop of Senlis, and the coffin which he was accompanying to its last resting-place contained the mortal remains of Francis II., king of France.

The news of the death of the king was anything but welcome to Elizabeth, greatly as it raised the hopes of the French Protestants with whom she professed to sympathize. In refusing the offer of the Scotch parliament to marry the earl of Arran and unite the two kingdoms, the queen had committed a great political blunder, and she now dimly perceived that she might possibly reap the fruits of it before long. Among the people of Scotland, the rejection of the proposed union had caused considerable excitement, amounting to indignation. "What motive the queen of England had in this refusal we omit," said Knox, in a letter to a friend; while Randolph, Cecil's envoy at Edinburgh, informed the privy council, "there is such resentment of the rejection of the offer of marriage, that the Scots hold themselves almost absolved from all their obligations." Right in the midst of this excitement came the report of the death of Francis II. and the widowhood of Mary Stuart. The natural effect of it was to bring the thoughts of the people once more back to their hereditary ruler, whom they had been on the point of dethroning, but who now seemed almost preferable as a queen to Elizabeth. With the death of her husband, and the fall of her uncles from power, ended all fears of French interference, there remaining absolutely no tie to bind the queen to France, except the pension stipulated for in her marriage-contract, the receipt of which was not unwelcome even to the most patriotic of Scotchmen. The only strong objection against her that could be urged was her Romish bigotry; but even this did not seem formidable when coupled with the reflection that Mary Stuart was scarcely nineteen, and that years, new surroundings, and, possibly, a Protestant husband, might do much to bring about a wholesome change. Impelled by all these considerations, the estates of Scotland determined to send an embassy to the queen, entreating her to return to the country. The embassy was headed by Lord James Murray, illegitimate brother of Mary, warmly attached to her, yet more warmly attached to Protestantism. He set out with secret misgivings, knowing the character of his sister, and knowing, also, the plotting of the papal party in Scotland, whose spirit had been subdued, but not broken, and who were only waiting for a favourable opportunity to take revenge upon their opponents. Murray's fears were but too well founded. Before even he had left Scotland, some of the principal of the old Roman Catholic leaders, among them the bishops of Aberdeen, Moray, and Ross, together with the archbishop of St. Andrew's, went to meet in secret conclave, at which it was determined that they, too, would send an embassy to Mary Stuart. Thus two currents came setting in against the widowed queen from her native country, carrying councils of peace and of war, of new love and of ancient hatred. To choose at the outset the true stream was no easy task for a young woman of nineteen, spoiled by flatterers, and corrupted by Jesuits, with more temper than good sense, more beauty than intellect, and more passion than judgment.

During the first few months of her widowhood, Mary Stuart acted with a skill quite unexpected to Elizabeth, who was keenly watching her from a distance. At the outset, Mary appeared to be almost unconscious of the sudden turn of public feeling in her favour which had taken place in Scotland; but as soon as she became aware of it, she at once quitted the somewhat disreputable society of the cardinal de Lorraine, and retired into the convent of St. Pierre-les-Dames, presided over by her aunt. Flights of young gallants, among them the earl of Bothwell, soon came over from Scotland to throw themselves at her feet; but she kept in prudent retirement, liberal in smiles, but parsimonious in words, raising hopes in many and favouring none. There was no room at St. Pierre-les-Dames for Bothwell and his friends, and Mary advised them to return at once to Scotland, entrusting them with letters to the leading men in the kingdom. The despatches, more than three hundred in number, were duly delivered, with the effect of creating a storm of affection for the young queen. "All men are going after her," Randolph informed Cecil, expressing his conviction that if Mary Stuart returned "it would be a mad world." Elizabeth now began to feel alarmed, and thinking it best to settle matters at once, instructed the earl of Bedford, who was setting out on an embassy to the new French government, to seek the widowed queen in her retirement, and to offer the usual expressions of condolence. The earl executed this part of his mission well, and was told by Mary that the dearest wish of her heart was to be in peace and friendship with her royal sister Elizabeth. "We are," she exclaimed, "both living in one isle, are both of one language, are the nearest kinswomen to each other, and both queens." The compliments over, Bedford opened himself on the chief subject of his mission, which was that the Scottish queen should sign the treaty of Edinburgh, concluded more than a year ago, but which had never yet been ratified. Mary cleverly evaded the unwelcome subject by telling the earl of Bedford that much as she liked to oblige her sister Elizabeth, she could not possibly give her signature without consulting her subjects, hitherto, she had obeyed the king of France, her lord, in refusing the ratification of the treaty, but for the future she had to look upon the people of Scotland as masters, and do nothing without their consent. The earl was mute; he thought the reply very fine, but very unsatisfactory. A few days after the interview with the English ambassador, Mary left the convent, and took up her residence at Vitry, in Champagne, formally assuming the dignity and state of queen of Scotland.

The first official envoy from her kingdom whom Mary consented to receive was the one despatched by the papist faction. The archbishop of St. Andrew's, with his friends and co-conspirators, had chosen a shrewd and energetic priest, John Lesly, of Aberdeen—subsequently bishop of Ross—as private ambassador; and making haste, he managed to arrive at Vitry at the same time with Lord James Stuart, representative of the parliament and people of Scotland. Mary preferred to receive the priest first, and to let the national ambassador, her brother, wait; and on the 14th of April, 1561, John Lesly was ushered into the presence of the queen. He came with a strange message. By the mouth of their envoy, the chiefs of the Roman Catholic party quietly proposed to the queen to kindle the flame of civil war in her own country, and to set the people to murder each other. It was not a mere wild dream of revenge, but a carefully elaborated plan, worked out in all its details with the most business-like precision. Mary was advised to arrest her brother in the first instance, without listening to his message from the nation, and then to sail for Aberdeen in a French or Spanish man-of-war, accompanied by as many foreign soldiers as could be purchased. Her landing at Aberdeen, the archbishop and bishops promised, should be awaited by twenty thousand men, all good Catholics, raised in the north of Scotland, at whose head she could march upon Edinburgh, disperse the parliament, and restore the old religion. This accomplished, the horizon of her ambition might be made to widen: a march southward, across the border, offered no great difficulties, with thousands of loyal hearts, in priestly robes, for secret allies; and the deposition of a bastard queen and elevation of a second Mary to the throne of England, followed as a matter of course. Mary listened with rapt attention, though not without secret misgivings, to John Lesly's propositions. The work of slaughtering heretics was familiar enough to the widow of Francis II.—seemed pleasant enough, from Amboise experience—and in itself appeared unobjectionable; but there remained the doubtful question as to whether the noble prelates of Scotland would be able to do all that they promised in the way of murder. They had been unsuccessful in outrooting false doctrines, even with the assistance of a large French army, and it seemed almost impossible that they should be able to effect the work now that rank heresy had overgrown the land. Carefully weighing probabilities, Mary thought it would be best to temporize; she therefore sent her thanks to the zealous prelates, but informed Lesly that for the moment she was not in the position to accept the proffered advice, not even as far as regarded the arrest of her brother. The day after the interview with the priestly envoy, April the 15th, the queen received Lord James Stuart with the greatest demonstrations of affection.

In James Stuart the estates of Scotland had chosen an ambassador singularly well fitted to effect a reconciliation between queen and people. A man of vast energy, undoubted honour, and sincerely Protestant, the nation was able to look upon him as a noble representative of their best interests, while at the same time the queen, widely separated as she was from him in religious views, was fully cognizant of his personal attachment to her, and could not possibly doubt the honesty of his advice. Nevertheless, Mary, so far from lending a willing ear to the message of peace which her brother carried, and the personal counsel with which he accompanied it, had no other thought in receiving him than to bring him over by corruption to what she conceived to be her true interest. Well as he knew the character of her whom he was addressing, Lord James Stuart was astounded when, after having exhausted all his eloquence to describe to her the real state of Scotland, and the firm ropt which Protestantism had taken in the nation, she asked him to help her to restore Roman Catholicism, offering him, as price of his apostasy, a cardinal's hat and several rich benefices in France. Lord James refused with indignation, after which the queen tried her softer blandishments, promising to listen to his counsel, to do nothing against his wishes, and, if it should meet with the approbation of all her subjects, to appoint him regent of the kingdom during her absence. In return, Mary requested her brother not to go back to Edinburgh by way of England, as he had come, and not to reveal anything she had said to the government of Elizabeth. Lord James refused both, more than ever convinced, after what had taken place, of the necessity of maintaining an intimate alliance with the power which had enabled Scotland to secure both political and religious independence. Failing to corrupt the loyalty of her brother, the queen now made an attempt to bring the leaders in the Scotch parliament over to her views, despatching for the purpose Gilles de Noailles, a French nobleman possessed of great talent for intrigue. The mission of Noailles consisted in persuading, either by weight of words or of gold, a certain number of persons on his list to exert their influence to break off the English alliance, as a preliminary to the restoration of the old religion and ancient form of government. But the efforts of Noailles, though carried on with great energy, entirely failed. The adroit nobleman soon found that the men he might buy were not worth buying, and that the gift of his verbal eloquence was entirely lost in the midst of an intensely practical people. The parliamentary leaders to whom he addressed himself told him that they were fully aware of all the defects and drawbacks of the English alliance; but that they were still more painfully conscious of the consequences of a restoration of popery in Scotland. They had seen what it meant very recently in England, and they were daily informed of its meaning in Spain, in France, in Germany, and in the Netherlands, among nations far richer than Scotland, held in death grasp by priests revelling in blood. Monsieur de Noailles could not see it that way; he had been at Amboise and other places, and thought the drowning of Huguenots and splitting of heretic heads rather amusing than otherwise. But despairing to gain any converts to his view of the case, he quitted Edinburgh after a two months' sojourn, informing his royal mistress that her subjects were little else but unimaginative barbarians.

After the failure of all her negotiations, there remained nothing to Mary but to return to her kingdom, submitting to be guided in the first instance by her political opponents, and to wait for an opportunity to break their power. A longer sojourn in France could clearly serve to no other purpose but that of strengthening the English alliance; besides which it was becoming dangerous by the smouldering flame of civil war. The death of Francis II. and the fall of the Guises, though it interrupted the Protestant persecution for a while, did not stay it altogether, and not being minded to submit tamely to being killed and hunted like wolves by priestly bloodhounds, the Huguenots, at the end of another six months, sprang again to their feet, the Bible in the left and the trusty sword in their right hand. To the uncles of Mary Stuart, the aspect of things was altogether threatening, and they advised her to stay no longer in France, but to return at once to her own country. The queen consented, and the departure was fixed for the middle of the summer, to await communications from Scotland. The next step of Mary was to despatch General D'Oysel, the hero of Leith, to Elizabeth, with the request that the queen might allow her to pass through England into her own dominions, so as to avoid a long and tedious sea voyage. Elizabeth refused, with some show of indignation, telling the general that as long as Mary declined to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, solemnly negotiated between England and Scotland, and signed by the representatives of the two governments, she must look upon her, not as an ally but as an enemy, and therefore could not possibly allow her to pass through her own realm. There was perfect fairness in this declaration, almost dictated by political necessity; however, the reply of D'Oysel had the effect of driving Mary Stuart into a great passion, she looking at the matter, not from the political but the sentimental point of view. Representing herself as a helpless widow, friendless and almost homeless, she burst forth, in an interview with Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, English ambassador at the French court, in loud complaints against the cruelty of her royal sister for having "impeached her passage." Sir Nicholas, dispassionate diplomatist, with some insight into the nature of tearful woman, quietly listened to the long oration, and, the torrent of words having subsided at last, calmly laid a parchment before the fair creator. "Will your majesty ratify the treaty?" he inquired. The suggestion was not acceptable to her distressed majesty. Rather than sign the treaty of Edinburgh, Mary was determined to risk everything—even the mal de mer.

Being forbidden to travel over land, nothing remained for Mary Stuart but return by sea to her dominions. Having passed some time at St. Germain with the royal family, and entered into careful arrangements for having the pension of 60,000 livres a year, to which she was entitled as queen-dowager of France, settled upon her in due form, Mary embarked at Calais on the 14th of August, accompanied by two of her uncles, the duke d'Anjou and the duke d'Elbœuf, together with a train of above one hundred French noblemen and priests, among the latter Peter de Boudailles, abbot of Brantome, upon whom devolved the task of general chronicler of events. It was with extreme reluctance Mary quitted France for her native country, being fervently attached to the pomp, pleasures, and dissipation of the luxurious court in which she had spent her last dozen years. Abbot Peter was deeply touched, by this attachment. "The galley," he wrote in his chronicle, "having left port, and a slight breeze having sprung up, we began to set sail. The queen, with both arms resting on the poop of the vessel near the helm, began to shed a flood of tears, continually casting her beautiful eyes towards the port and the country she had left, and uttering the mournful words, 'Farewell, France,' until night began to fall. She desired to go to bed without taking any food, and would not go down into her cabin; so her bed was prepared on the deck.

She commanded the steersman that he should awake her early in the morn, if he could still discern the coast of France. Fortune favoured her; for the wind having ceased, and recourse being had to the oars, very little progress was made during the night, so that when day appeared the coast of France was still visible; whereupon, being called, the queen sat upright in her bed, and began again to look towards the land as long as she could, breaking forth in dolorous lamentations, 'Farewell, Franco! Farewell, Franco!' All this was overwhelmingly touching and romantic, and abbot Peter and his friends shed tears at seeing the exceeding pretty young woman, their mistress, sigh for the pleasures she was leaving behind at the most brilliant court in the world; the fine dresses, the magnificent entertainments, the glorious licentiousness—a very whirlwind of joys, beautifully diversified, now and then, by the hanging, shooting, and drowning of a few thousand Huguenots. Looking back, Mary Stuart beheld nothing but a tumult of enjoyment; looking forward, she saw little else but stern, disagreeable duty, oppressive to her delicate sentiments. "Often during the voyage," recorded the abbot of Brantome in his chronicle, "have I seen her dread her arrival in Scotland as if it were death, and have heard her say that she would prefer a hundred times to remain a simple queen dowager in France than to go and reign in her wild country."

Elizabeth had some intention of kidnapping her dear sister and rival in the straits of Dover or the North Sea, but failed courage. An English fleet was sent to cruise in the track of the queen of Scotland, with vague instructions to the commander to look out for enemies, which, however, were wisely disregarded. Had the admiral sent the galley which carried Mary Stuart and her fortune to the bottom, Elizabeth would certainly have rejoiced at the deed secretly, but as certainly hung the man who did it, and gone into mourning openly. As this was a chance not likely to tempt the bravest captain on the seas, Mary Stuart and her hundred cavaliers and chaplains got to Scotland safely, though not comfortably, having been tossed about for four days and four nights on the foam-capped billows of the German Ocean. A thick black fog lay heavy on the shore of Scotland when the queen's galley ran, on the morning of the 19th of August, into the harbour of Leith, where not a soul was visible to greet the sovereign of the realm. As soon as her arrival got known, the magistrate came down to the shore, with a palfrey for Mary, and a select lot of shaggy mountain-ponies for her magnificent suite. "The fine gentlemen of France, accustomed to prancing coursers behung with pearls and cloth of gold, stood aghast at the sight of the terrible ponies, looking less like horses than wolves: 'lamentable to behold,' according to Peter Bourdailles, "and harnessed to match." At sight of the shaggy cavalcade, the abbot further records, "the queen began to weep, and to say that this was not like the pomp, the splendour, the trappings, or the superb horses of France." The fine French gentlemen were ready to sit down and weep with the queen; but the choice lying between a pony-ride and a walk through bottomless mud, they resigned themselves to the lesser evil, and set out in procession to Holyrood Palace, the citizens looking on in grim silence. The sight of the royal residence, hidden, tomb-like, under the black precipices of Salisbury Crags, was not made to raise the drooping spirits of the queen; nor the dark rooms, covered with rushes, and almost destitute of furniture, into which she was ushered. "Et qui pis est," Abbot Peter entered in his chronicle, "and what was worse, in the evening, when she wanted to go to rest, some five or six hundred rascals from town—cinq ou six cents marauts de la ville—came under the queen's window to serenade her, screeching psalm tunes and scraping on three-stringed fiddles, horribly out of tune." The picture of these gaunt, solemn men, singing psalm tunes, was the most frightful sight yet behold in the "wild country" by a gay abbot and a beautiful-eyed queen, accustomed to no other psalms but the amorous ditties of sweetly wicked knights, and the tender warblings of love sick troubadours.

The signs of welcome on the arrival of Mary Stuart were by no means of the kind to inspire high hopes of the prosperity of her future career, yet they were more than enough to beget great uneasiness in Queen Elizabeth. Up to the last moment, the queen had buoyed herself with the expectation that either Mary would not dare to start at all; or that, as expressed in a letter from Sir Thomas Randolph to Cecil, "she might be met withal somewhere in the North Sea," and be sent to the bottom, the thing "being done unknown;" or that, finally, her landing on the Scottish shore would be opposed by the more zealous of the reformers. None of these anticipations being realized, Elizabeth for the first time began to feel a serious dread of her antagonist, as one who might possibly be a source of trouble, if not danger, to her. That, if Mary succeeded in gaining popularity in Scotland, she would be the rallying point of all the enemies of the English government, seemed absolutely certain; but more than this even Elizabeth dreaded the prospect of having to acknowledge the rival queen as her successor during her own lifetime. Owing, probably, to the scenes she had herself witnessed at Hatfield House while her sister was lying on her deathbed, Elizabeth had a morbid fear of naming, or even knowing, the inheritor of her crown; and the fear of getting in Mary an enemy as successor, instead of at least a nominal friend or dependent, was the greater, as her way to the throne had been cleared, previous to her arrival in Scotland, by an act of gross injustice. By blood, Mary Stuart was undoubtedly the nearest heir to the English throne; but by the will of Henry VIII., which excluded the descendants of his sister Margaret, consort of James IV. of Scotland, the crown devolved upon Lady Catherine Grey, younger sister of Jane Grey, unfortunate queen of ten days. To acknowledge Catherine, a quiet and inoffensive girl of eighteen, sincerely Protestant, as her successor, would have been no unwise policy on the part of Elizabeth; instead of it, however, she persecuted her young relative with a malignity entirely unpardonable. Being left very much unguarded, Catherine got intimately acquainted with, and warmly attached to, the young earl of Hertford, son of the Protector Somerset, and fearing that the course of their true love might not run smoothly if proclaimed to the world, the juvenile pair resolved to marry secretly. The ceremony was gone through accordingly; but when the queen heard of it she got into a towering rage, and ordered both Catherine and her young husband to be thrown into the Tower, under the pretence that they were not legally married. It was an act, not only of the most wanton cruelty and despotism, but one absolutely antagonistic to Elizabeth's own interests. The poor injured girl, prospective heir to the English crown, sank under the burden of her shame and sufferings, and with her perished all that stood between Mary Stuart and the throne of Elizabeth.

Mary's first actions after her arrival in Scotland were not unwise. She made Lord James Stuart, her brother, prime-minister, and appointed the earls of Huntly, Argyle, Errol, Montrose, and other Lords of the Congregation, members of her privy council, so that altogether the Protestants had reason to be satisfied with the new government. But there was one thing in which she was never able to satisfy them, the exercise of her own religion. Mary insisted on retaining her priests and all the forms of Roman Catholic worship for herself and her court, and though this had been granted to her by the estates among the conditions of her return, the exercise of the liberty at once gave rise to expressions of anger and resentment. When, on the Sunday following the queen's arrival, mass was said in her private chapel, the more violent of the reformers were moved almost to insurrection. Gathering around him a troop of exasperated men, the master of Lindsay, leader of an extreme party among the Calvinists, rushed, in iron armour, into the courtyard of Holyrood Palace, prepared to put a stop to the service, crying out that "the priests should die the death of idolaters according to God's law." At the door of the royal chapel, Lord James Stuart, who had expected the attack, opposed the further progress of the enraged band, and by the weight of his personal influence succeeded in driving them back; nevertheless the anger of the masses at the reintroduction of popery kept growing, threatening constant rebellion. What was most dangerous to Mary was that Knox himself, now by far the most influential man in the kingdom, was opposed to her private worship. A few days after the attack upon Holyrood chapel, the great reformer wrote a remarkable letter on the subject to his friend Calvin. "The arrival of the queen," Knox informed the famous apostle of Geneva, "has disturbed the tranquillity of our affairs. She had scarcely been back three days before the idol of the mass was again set up. Some prudent men of great authority endeavoured to prevent it, saying that their conscience would not suffer that the land should be again contaminated, which the Lord, by the efficacy of his Word, had purged from idolatry. But as the majority of those who adhere to our faith thought differently, impiety gained the victory, and is now acquiring fresh strength. Those who favoured it give as a reason for their indulgence that all the ministers of the Lord are of opinion, and that you yourself declare, that it is not lawful for us to prevent the queen from practising her religion. Although I contradict this rumour, which appears to me most false, it has taken such deep root in men's hearts that it will be impossible for me to dislodge it, unless I learn from you whether the question has been actually submitted to your church, and what was the answer of the brethren. I am always troubling you with such inquiries; but I have no one else into whose bosom I can pour my cares. I confess to you, my father, that I have never until now felt how painful and difficult it is to combat the secret foes' hypocrisy when concealed under the mask of piety. I have never feared open enemies so greatly, but that, in the midst of my tribulations, I continued to hope for victory."

Before Calvin's reply arrived, Mary made a great effort to gain over Knox. Trusting to the fire of her beautiful eyes, and all those blandishments of manner and speech of which she knew herself the master, she invited the greatest of her subjects to a private interview at Holyrood Palace, pretending that she felt an earnest desire to hear the truths of religion from his lips. Nobody was allowed to be present at the interview but the queen's brother, Lord James, and he remained as a respectful listener in the background. Mary, after some gentle remarks about their differing views on religious subjects, at once came to ask him how it was that the reformers wished to place their creed above the laws of the state, so as to drive subjects into rebellion against their rulers. To which Knox replied, "Madam, if to rebuke idolatry and to persuade people to worship God according to His Word is to raise subjects against their princes, I cannot stand excused, for so I have acted; but if the true knowledge of God and His right worship lead all good subjects, as it must do, to obey the prince from their heart, then who can reprehend me?" Knox then went on to maintain, with great earnestness, the doctrine of the reformed faith, placing the laws of heaven above the laws of earth. "If all men in the days of the apostles," he exclaimed, "had been compelled to follow the creed of the Roman emperors, where would have been the Christian religion?" To this striking argument, the queen attempted to reply. "But the early Christians did not resist their rulers," she said. "Those who do not obey commands virtually resist," answered Knox. "But," rejoined Mary, "they did not resist with the sword." "That," exclaimed Knox, "was simply because they had not the power." At this declaration, as candid as true, the queen took fire. "Then you do maintain," she cried, "that subjects, having power, may resist their princes." "Most assuredly, madam," Knox calmly replied, "whenever princes exceed their bounds." And, seeing the fair royal lady before him dumb with surprise, the reformer went on to explain to her that he looked upon sovereigns persecuting their subjects as upon parents attempting to destroy their own children, which perfectly justified the latter to employ resistance and restraint. "Therefore," continued Knox, "to take the sword from princes, to bind their hands, and to cast them into prison till they are brought to a more sober mind, is no disobedience to them, but obedience to a higher law, laid down in the Word of God." The queen was lost in amazement—such language, uttered in bold, manly accents, had never before reached her ears. It was not till Lord James Stuart, who had been listening with deep interest, his whole soul hanging upon the lips of the preacher, came hurrying forward, to discover the cause of his sister's silence, that she found words to reply to her great subject, who stood before her like one of the prophets of old. "Well, then," the queen cried, recovering herself, in a tone faintly ironical, "I perceive that my subjects have to obey you and not me; that they must do what they like, and not what I command; while I must learn to be subject unto them and not they to me." To which burst of petty irritation, Knox replied, with great earnestness, "Heaven forbid, madam, that it should ever be so. Far be it from me to command any one, or to absolve subjects from their lawful obedience. All that I, and all that the people desire is, that princes as well as subjects should obey God." To which Mary replied, excitedly, "But I will defend the church of Rome, for I hold it to be the true church." John Knox had nothing more to say. The die was cast: Scotland had decided to go with the church of God, and the queen to go with the church of Rome.

Doubtful as was the position of the Scottish queen, Elizabeth did not the less cease to fear her. She knew that Mary Stuart was, and always would be, far more dangerous to England than to Scotland, the latter country having become overwhelmingly Protestant, while in England the Roman Catholics were still numerously represented both among the highest and the lowest classes. Looking upon Mary as not only the heir apparent to the throne, but the lawful ruler of the realm usurped by her illegitimate sister, those partizans of Rome raised their heads immediately after the arrival of the queen of Scotland in her capital, and rumours of conspiracies and insurrections came to be rife on all sides. Well-authenticated letters informed Cecil of the existence of a vast plot, emanating from Spain or Italy, the object of which was to poison Elizabeth, to elevate Mary to the throne, and to restore the union with the Holy Father of Rome. The queen herself was made daily aware that she was surrounded in her own household by spies and enemies, who kept watching every one of her movements, and, in spite of all precautions, got access even to her closet. The strictest vigilance had to be exercised to prevent the scheme of murder being realized. Every dish had to be partaken of by the cook who made it, and every drop of wine that came to the royal table to be tasted by the butler who kept it in charge. Even the gloves, handkerchiefs, and other articles used by the queen were minutely scrutinized as passing through the hands of not absolutely trustworthy persons; and, to prevent all possible mischief, her physicians induced her to take large doses of various nauseous compounds, supposed to be antidotes against poisons. There was, probably, much exaggeration of the amount of danger threatening the life of Elizabeth; but that there was danger but little doubt existed. Unknown priests of swarthy aspect, under the protection of the Spanish ambassador, were met with hovering in the queen's palace, and the shadow of dark figures was seen more than once retreating from the royal bedchamber, on the approach of the guards. A dagger might do its work swiftly, but the greatest fear was that of poison. Rome, it was well known, was rather partial to poison.

The rumour of plots and conspiracies against the queen and the Protestant government was greatly intensified by an event of a startling nature, the burning of St. Paul's Cathedral. St. Paul's was the pride and glory of London, being considered not only one of the largest, but one of the finest churches in the Christian world, its spire, five hundred feet high, tipping the clouds, and the gilded eagle upon its summit towering grandly over the city, visible to the approaching traveller for thirty miles down the river. But a few hours sufficed to throw this pride of London into the dust. One hot summer afternoon in the year 1561, a heavy thunder-cloud came sweeping over the city, and all on a sudden the winds were hushed, and it got still and dark as night. Then there came a flash from the black mass of vapour above, and a fiery arrow piercing the darkness was seen to fall upon the golden eagle of St. Paul's. The citizens trembled in their hearts; but the fright soon passed away when they saw their noble spire towering as proudly aloft as ever, unharmed by thunder and lightning. Gradually the storm-clouds passed on eastward; yet no sooner had the sky got blue again, when the people in St. Paul's churchyard saw a pale tongue of fire licking upward from under the steeple of the cathedral. A few moments later, and the golden eagle came down with a crash upon the roof of the south transept, while a stream of molten lead kept creeping down the walls, setting all the beams and rafters ablaze. Another quarter of an hour, and the magnificent steeple was transformed into one vast pyramid of fire, illuminating in the setting darkness the whole city and the country for miles around. The pile of flame called up plenty of willing hands, and long files of citizens ranged themselves from the churchyard to the river, passing water buckets up and down. However, all efforts to save the main part of the cathedral were fruitless, and it was not before the spire had been entirely destroyed and the nave become a charred and roofless ruin that the devouring element ceased its work. Then the cry arose on all sides that the fire was due to the Roman Catholic priests. The lighting itself, as witnessed by thousands of eyes, had done no harm to the edifice; but there were those who pretended to have seen, in the darkness of the tempest, dim spectral forms in priestly garments creep up the tower carrying torches in their hands. The account was generally credited, and for more than a month there was extreme danger to all persons passing through the streets of London dressed as a Roman Catholic priest.

The suspicion against priests for the moment was not confined to the mob of London, but shared by some of the shrewdest men in the kingdom, Cecil among them. That the Roman Catholics were hatching plots, he was firmly persuaded, and he kept watching with keen anxiety the doings of the leaders, particularly of the Spanish ambassador, known to be the centre of all intrigues. King Philip's envoy had his residence at Durham House, in the Strand, and from the water-gate of this dwelling there were seen issuing nightly all sorts of strange and fantastic forms, people in silks and people in rag, Italian monks closely snuffed, French soldiers with spurs and steel-caps, Flemish merchants in fine-spun broadcloth, and Irish chieftains nobly ignorant of cloth and clothing. Neither Elizabeth nor her minister much admired this odd collection of mankind which in the darkness of the night kept gliding into Durham House, and, issuing again hours after, disappeared on the river; yet they felt that they had no right to interfere with the movements of the guests of Alvarez de Quadra, intimate friend as well as ambassador of the greatest monarch of Europe. However, there could be no doubt that mischief of some kind or other was brewing within the precincts of Durham House, and having taken council with his royal mistress, Cecil determined to find out something about it. One morning, the private secretary of De Quadra, Senor Borghese, called at the queen's palace, and Cecil, drawing him aside, held a long and intimate conversation with him. The effect of it was that Borghese reappeared the next day at the private residence of the minister, carrying a large bundle of letters, some in Spanish, others in Latin, and many more written in cipher. It took nearly a week to examine the bundle, and when the task was accomplished, it seemed as if a vast curtain had unrolled before Cecil's eyes, opening an entirely new landscape. For the first time he was able to spy into roofless Durham House, and behold the mysteries taking place there. He saw the envoy of King Philip, professed warm friend of Elizabeth, holding intercourse with all the enemies of the queen, aiding them in their complots, and encouraging them by word and deed to hatred of the government. He saw him despatch English priests into Flanders and Spain, carrying lists of all the disaffected nobles within the realm, with full description of their grievances and a detailed account of their resources. He saw him indite letters to his master, informing him that the country was ripe for insurrection, and rampant heresy ripe for destruction, and that nothing was wanted but a small Spanish force to dethrone Elizabeth, and to inaugurate the reign of a second Mary. When Cecil had seen all this in the bundle of letters brought by Senor Borghese, and ciphered by his aid, he thought it was time to act. Issuing immediate orders for the arrest of a number of nobles and priests frequenting the Spanish embassy, he at the same time set a secret watch upon Durham House, with instructions to look for the next foreign courier leaving the place. The individual waited for appeared soon after, well-armed, booted, and spurred, and being followed on the road to Dover as far as Gad's Hill—favourite spot for highwaymen—was there seized by two of the queen's guards, disguised as robbers, and stripped of his despatches. A glance into them revealed to Cecil a gigantic hornet's nest of intrigue and conspiracy.

The seizure of the papers of the Spanish ambassador, both those furnished by his secretary and those taken from his courier, clearly proved the existence of a vast plot among the Catholic rulers of Europe to deprive Elizabeth of her crown and bring England back to the pope. To Cecil, who had long suspected such a plot, the absolute proofs of it, now in his hands, caused less surprise than gratification, as enabling him to bring the queen over to his views. Elizabeth latterly had been a good deal coquetting both with her royal sister of Scotland and the envoy of King Philip, the object in both cases being the gratification of personal feelings. Her amorous intercourse with Dudley kept her in the nets of the cunning Spanish ambassador, who did everything in his power to encourage it, and, if possible, to let it culminate in a marriage, well aware that nothing could possibly degrade the queen so much in the eyes of her own subjects than her nuptials with the brazen and treacherous favourite, generally regarded as the murderer of his wife. The intercepted despatches fully proved the intrigues of De Quadra in this respect, and the contemptuous manner in which he was found to speak of Elizabeth's affection for her master of the horse was not without effect in curing her, at least momentarily, of her infatuation. But the effect of the revealed mysteries of Durham House was still more important as regarding Elizabeth's position towards her sister of Scotland. Utterly unlike and unsympathetic in all other respects, Elizabeth had yet one feeling in common with Mary Stuart, that of thorough hatred of the extreme form of Protestantism represented by John Knox and his disciples, and it was this which, worked upon to its utmost extent by Mary's agents, gradually produced the effect of drawing the two queens towards each other. The reports of the attitude assumed by Knox towards his sovereign deeply wounded the royal pride of Elizabeth, and having begun to listen to Mary's complaints, she finished by getting into an animated correspondence with her, and after a while went so far as to assent to the proposition of a personal interview, to take place at Nottingham. Cecil naturally was greatly alarmed at the prospect of this meeting, which, it seemed certain, could end in nothing else but the acknowledgment of Mary's claims of succession. It was in vain that he and all the members of the privy council reasoned with the queen on the subject, representing to her the extreme danger of encouraging, in any manner whatever, the hopes of the Roman Catholic faction, and of opening the realm to another reign of priestly anarchy and murder. Elizabeth listened to the arguments of her advisers, but nevertheless insisted upon the fulfilment of her engagement to meet Mary at Nottingham, the day of which, with all particulars, had been fixed, when Senor Borghese and the Gad's Hill highwaymen upset the scheme. It was high time, for already the giant struggle between Protestantism and its priestly enemies had burst out on the continent, and had Elizabeth, coaxed by the smiles of a fair and false young queen, and spurred by the hatred of a great and valiant apostle of truth, thrown in her sword with Rome, it might have changed the history of the world.

The mighty contest between the adherents of the new faith and the followers of ancient dogmas, long threatening in France, found its outbreak in the spring of 1562, precipitated by almost accidental causes. Although immediately after the death of Mary Stuart's husband the chiefs of the Protestant party got the upper hand, and commenced their rule by the promulgation of a new code of laws, securing freedom of worship, the victory did not last long, treachery undoing all that had been gained. After their fall, the Guises, uncles of Mary Stuart, retired for a while, but having gathered fresh power in a reorganization of their priestly forces, they came into the field stronger than ever. They succeeded in gaining over once more Marie de Medici to their cause, and, after that, converted by bribes and threats, the weak and vacillating king of Navarre, regent of the kingdom. The apostasy of the latter was an immense loss to the Protestants, for, although they had never considered him, but his brother, the prince de Condé, their real leader, his partisanship, after his accession to the regency, had been of the highest value to them, establishing in fact their own security and guaranteeing religious peace. To disturb this peace now became the immediate object of the Roman Catholic leaders. Being reinstalled in office, the duke de Guise and his brothers went travelling up and down the country, haranguing priests, and exciting the fanatic multitude to attacks upon the unbelievers in the pope. In the course of his progress, the duke, one morning—on the 1st of March, 1562, a Sunday—arrived at the small town of Vassy, in Champagne, at the moment when the Protestants of the place commenced public worship at their chapel. The singing of psalms, lawful as it was for the time being, sounded unpleasant in the ears of the conqueror of Calais, and he sent a message to the heretics desiring them to suspend their service till he himself had returned from mass. The insolent order was not attended to, whereupon the great duke, sword in hand, strode forward towards the Huguenot chapel, at the head of his armed retainers, who at once fell like tigers upon the inoffensive worshippers. There was no resistance shown, nor attempted, and a crowd of helpless men, women, and children, several hundred in number, were sabred down while saying their prayers at the foot of the altar. The atrocity was too great to remain unavenged, and at the report of the massacre of Vassy all Huguenot France sprang to arms.

As in England, so in France, Protestantism had the greater number of its adherents in the towns, chiefly those inhabited by the more intelligent classes of the manufacturing population, while the Catholics found their strength among the agricultural hinds, and in the lowest mob of some of the great cities. The knell of the horrors of Vassy was responded to at once by all the manufacturing towns in the kingdom, and in less than a week after Guise's butchery, the whole of them, including Lyons, Havre, Dieppe, Rouen, Bourges, Poitiers, Tours, and Orleans, with other centres of industry, had shut their gates, garrisoned themselves, and expressed their determination to overthrow a government sanctioning such foul murders. The attitude of these intelligent masses, suddenly rising in the defence of law and religion, was so impressive, that it seemed for a moment as if they might gain the upper hand by mere moral force. Marie de Medici, ever aiming to be at the side of success, allowed herself, together with the young king, to be taken to Fontainebleau, beyond the reach of the priest-ridden Paris mob, and the prince de Condé was on the point of taking both to Orleans, to the head-quarters of Protestantism, when a message from the duke de Guise frustrated the plan. The duke had established himself at the capital, seizing the reins of government; and he hesitated not a moment to inform the king's mother that the Huguenots had not the slightest chance of success, as his troops marched upon them from all sides. At the receipt of this message, Marie de Medici refused to accompany Condé any further, insisting to be allowed to return to Paris with her son. Condé hesitated, much inclined to carry both the king and his mother off by force; but his intentions were resisted by his own friends, chief among them Admiral Coligny, high authority among the Huguenots, and who had taken the place vacated by the apostate king of Navarre. Coligny's strong opposition to a plan which might have saved France from the horrors of civil war, and led to the triumph of Protestantism, entirely altered the state of affairs, and the king being permitted to be taken back by his intriguing mother to Paris, the central power of the kingdom once more was in the hands of the Guises. They lost not a minute to show their power. Large bodies of troops, partly composed of hirelings from the Alps and the Pyrenees, were hurled at once against the Huguenot towns, most of which, imperfectly provided with food, arms, and ammunition, were entirely unable to defend themselves. Bourges, Angers, Tours, and Poitiers, had their gates battered down after but a short resistance, the capture being followed in every case by indiscriminate slaughter of the rebels. In the wake of every battalion of the royal armies there followed bands of fanatic priests, carrying the symbol of Christ high in the air, and hoarsely shouting for murder. The soldiers of Guise willingly obeyed the priestly orders, marking their path by long streaks of blood.

The ill success of the Huguenots, far from subduing them, drove them to despair. The towns not captured at the first onset, secured themselves by the most frantic efforts, women and children working at the defences, and every man taking the solemn resolution to sacrifice life and limb and all earthly goods in the cause of religion. In a short time the effect of this new exaltation was felt by the troops of Guise. The duke d'Aumale failed in a great effort to take the important city of Rouen, held by Condé in person, and Dieppe and Havre at the same time succeeded in beating back large bodies of troops sent against them. To punish the Huguenots for this failure, the priests directed detachments of their army of extermination against a number of small and unprotected places in the south of France, where heresy was known to have taken root. The ancient town of Orange was the first selected for attack. Without warning and without resistance, the place was captured by a body of hirelings, half French and half Italian, commanded by Fabrizio Serbelloni, a relative of the pope, who at once entered upon the work of massacre. At Orange there were not sufficient Huguenots to make simple killing a gratification, and, to allow the ministers of religion their full joy, all the heretics taken were put to death under atrocious tortures. The men were either burnt at smouldering fires, or slowly hacked to pieces, so as to linger for days; while the women, after suffering torments and ignominy worse than death, were hung out stark naked from the windows of their houses to form targets for the soldiers to shoot at. Nor did the children escape the priestly demons. Babies torn from the breasts of their mothers were mutilated in their sight, and the dripping wounds of the innocent little creatures pasted over, in infernal mockery, with leaves torn from the Bible. For a whole week the priests kept up their work, till hell itself seemed to be exhausted in cruelties. At the end of the week, every heretic within the town having perished under frightful tortures, the murderers fled before the approach of a small Huguenot force under a warlike leader, Captain Des Adretz. The latter had heard of the doings of the pope's relative at Orange, and had sworn a great oath that the priests and their hangmen should suffer for it. And Captain Des Adretz was true to his oath.

The Huguenots were more than a hundred miles away from Orange when the report of the massacre reached them, but driven by their impetuous leader, they hurried towards it in furious exultation, taking neither rest nor food, running more than marching. At Montelimart, they fell upon the rear of Serbelloni's priestly bandits, who, cowardly like all murderers, were flying up the valley of the Rhone. Though vastly inferior in number, Des Adretz at once attacked them, scattering them to right and left, and driving a portion into the castle for refuge. Still the Huguenots followed, sword in hand and fury in their eyes, and pushing the priestly bloodhounds before them to the edge of the tower of Narbonne, they hurled them over the steep battlements, each seizing an enemy by the neck as an eagle would seize a cat. All having been thus despatched, Des Adretz set out in pursuit of the remainder of Serbelloni's soldiers, flying northward for their lives. They ran fast, but he hurried faster, and after a chase of more than seventy miles, the murderers were overtaken at the fortified town of Montbrison, within which they barricaded themselves in all haste. But no fortifications could withstand the fury of the Huguenots. In a few hours they had stormed the earthworks, climbed the walls bristling with cannon, and driven the priestly troops into the ancient castle, deemed impregnable, overhanging a rocky chasm, with the torrent of the Vizezy running deep at the bottom. When all had been shut up here, Des Adretz, lion-like, battered in the gates of the castle, stalked up to the summit, and pushing a plank forward from the giddy height, ordered his prisoners to jump down from it, one by one. The fiendish cowards offered no resistance to the handful of infuriated men around them, and obeying the command of the Huguenot captain, they crept along the fatal plank, one man after the other, to dash their brains on the granite rocks deep below. Orange was revenged; but the task of the Huguenots, defending their lives and their religion against overwhelming numbers, remained as difficult as ever. While Des Adretz was chasing the enemy in one direction, continuing his race from Montbrison to Bourg, and from Bourg to Grenoble, sweeping down like a hawk upon priests and priestly assassins, fresh bodies of troops under the command of the Guises came pouring in from all sides against the towns still occupied by the Protestants. One by one, they were stormed and given up to carnage, till by the beginning of August, five months after the massacre of Vassy and the commencement of the civil war, the whole force of the Huguenots was concentrated within Orleans, Rouen, Havre, Dieppe, and a few places in the south. Condé and his friends doubted no longer that Protestantism was doomed to perish in France, unless help could be obtained from abroad.

There was only one country from which help could be reasonably expected—England. Early in the summer Condé had despatched envoys to Elizabeth, imploring her to lend her aid to the martyrs of Protestantism, helping them to overthrow her own and their enemies. Cecil eagerly supported the alliance with the Huguenots, but the queen was very cold. Although fully aware that there were no greater foes of her throne than the Guises, and that as long as they were in power no means would be spared to foment disaffection in her own realm, she yet showed a strong dislike to declare openly against them, feeling abhorrence both of the Calvinistic creed of her proposed allies and of the dangers and uncertainties of war. However, as the peril of the Huguenots increased, so did their eagerness to obtain England's assistance. Condé's envoys at first spoke only of the eternal gratitude of all French Protestants, at which Elizabeth smiled; but their bids gradually rose, and by the middle of August, when the army of the Guises was advancing to a new siege of Rouen, they offered, in return for English assistance, to place the town and port of Havre into possession of the queen, and to redeem it at the final peace by the unconditional restoration of Calais. Elizabeth hesitated to accept even this tempting offer, and the Huguenot ambassadors, sad and dismayed, were on the point of returning to France, when Cecil broke in upon his mistress with a last argument. He laid before her a letter from Thomas Gresham, man of trusted financial minister, still residing at Antwerp, containing some strong remarks about the effect of the queen's political timidity upon her monetary affairs. Gresham had been empowered to raise a loan for Elizabeth, but could not get it because, as he said, "the moneyed men were afraid to deal further with her." The reasoning of the "moneyed men" was very simple. "There was no other communication," Gresham wrote, "but that if M. de Guise had the upper hand of the Protestants, the French king, the king of Spain, the pope, and all those of that religion would set upon the queen's majesty for religion's sake," and that, therefore, "great doubt was cast upon her estate and credit." The argument had a wonderful effect upon Elizabeth. Very dispassionate about Protestantism, but terribly anxious about the cash nexus, the whole truth of her position towards the French Calvinists seemed to burst upon her in Gresham's few lines. Once more Condé's envoys were summoned to Hampton Court, and told that the queen was ready to sign the proposed treaty of alliance. Their manifest eagerness was not overlooked by Elizabeth, inducing her to turn the scales of an already sharp bargain a little more to her side. Prince de Condé, in return for giving up Havre, had stipulated for three hundred thousand crowns of gold and four thousand soldiers, but the queen now told his envoys that she would prefer to give fewer crowns and more soldiers, and they could do nothing but accept, pressingly though they wanted the money for the pay of Flemish and Swiss soldiers engaged to serve in their cause. After some further debates, needlessly protracted, to the despair of the Huguenot ambassadors, Elizabeth signed the treaty of Hampton Court, September 20, 1562, engaging that England should send three thousand soldiers to take possession of Havre, and three thousand more to succour Dieppe and Rouen, and pay likewise one hundred thousand crowns towards the payment of Condé's foreign allies. To secure herself against all emergencies, Elizabeth professed, in the preamble of the treaty, to make war, not against, but in favour of the king of France, to "deliver him from the tyrannical house of Guise." It was a lame pretence, expressive only of timidity, and little fitted to stem the tide of priestly hatred and popish malediction certain to be expected after England's alliance with the Huguenots.

There was no delay in the execution of the Hampton Court treaty. In less than a fortnight after its ratification, the first half of the English army sailed from Portsmouth, and on the 4th of October, three thousand men, commanded by Sir Adrian Poynings, took possession of Havre. In the meanwhile, however, the city of Rouen, looked upon as the headquarters of the Huguenots, had been closely invested by an army of twenty thousand, commanded by the duke de Guise in person, accompanied by the constable Montmorency and the king of Navarre. Rouen, surrounded by no other fortifications than a line of ancient walls, strengthened by earthworks thrown up in a hurry, could not possibly withstand the Catholic army for any length of time, and to raise the siege and protect the fifty thousand Protestants of the city from the massacre awaiting them on capture, Condé, as soon as he heard of the landing of the English allies, sent courier after courier entreating assistance. Sir Adrian Poynings, a staunch Protestant, felt the deepest sympathy with the Huguenot cause, yet nevertheless dared not stir from his post. His positive orders were to take possession of and remain at Havre, while the task of assisting in the defence of Rouen was left to the rest of the expedition, under the command of the earl of Warwick, elder brother of Lord Robert Dudley. But Warwick did not arrive, and the cry of distress from Rouen became so great that Poynings at last consented to the urgent entreaties of a number of volunteers under his command, brave, warm-hearted youths chiefly from northern counties, to let them slip away secretly from his lines and fight the battle of Protestantism. The little force, five hundred in number, led by Killigrew of Pondennis, and a bold adventurer known as "Strangways the Rover," set out from Havre in the second week of October, to hew their road through the whole Catholic army into Rouen. They went in boats up the river Seine, but had not got further than Caudebec, half way between Havre and Rouen, when they were fired upon by a detachment of Guise's soldiers. The attack, coming unawares, and mortally wounding "Strangways the Rover," created confusion among the five hundred; but they pushed onward with undaunted courage, and cutting their path through overwhelming numbers, found their way into the besieged city, not, however, without leaving one half of their comrades, all more or less disabled, among the enemy. The duke de Guise had the wounded men carried before him, and with a coarse oath, ordered them to be strung up on trees in front of his tent. They were hung accordingly, the brave English volunteers, each with a paper on his breast stating their crime as having come into France "au service des Huguenots." The act would have justified Elizabeth in setting a price upon the head of the duke de Guise, as a common malefactor and assassin. However, the English government bore the outrage without remonstrance, evidently unable to see that the men whom the Huguenots were struggling against were not really soldiers, fighting in accordance with the rules of civilized warfare, but fiendish maniacs, driven mad by the wildest of superstitions—that of pleasing God by murdering their fellow-men.

The arrival of the handful of English volunteers, cheering as it was to the defenders of Rouen, was unable to protract the capture of the city for any length of time. To the twenty thousand troops under Guise, the citizens had to oppose not more than five thousand fighting-men, about one thousand of them regular soldiers and the rest armed Huguenots. In spite of those overwhelming odds, and the utter uselessness of the fortifications for withstanding the raging fire of Guise's artillery, the city held out for nearly a month, by dint of all but unparalleled heroism. Day and night the defenders remained at their post, neglecting rest and food, and repairing their battered walls under the fire of the enemy's guns, while the women themselves kept working in the trenches, casting bullets, and loading the muskets of their husbands, sons, and fathers. But it was all in vain. The priestly army, which had commenced to invest the city on all sides on the 29th of September, succeeded in carrying the fortified convent of

St. Catherine, by which Rouen was commanded from the Paris road, on the 9th of October, and posting masses of cannon here, poured down a hailstorm of iron upon the defenders below. Whole quarters of the city having been battered down, and large breaches made in the walls, the besieging army attempted a storm in the night from the 13th to the 14th of October, but was repulsed with great loss, the Huguenot women as well as the men engaging in the hand-to-hand struggle, fighting like enraged lions. The apostate king of Navarre was wounded in the left shoulder in the attack upon the city, and this and the unexampled courage shown by the besieged, which even Guise could not help respecting, induced the commander to suspend the siege for a few days, to enter upon negotiations. The Huguenots were offered complete amnesty and the free exercise of their religion, on condition of annulling the treaty with England, and of assisting to drive the English from Havre. The terms were rejected with indignation, although it was well known to the brave defenders of the city that the English alliance for which they sacrificed so much, would be of no earthly use to them. Elizabeth, with unpardonable greed, insisted upon clutching, above all things, her own prize, the town of Havre, not allowing a man to assist Rouen till the arrival of the second detachment of her forces, under Warwick. But Warwick, indolent and incapable like his handsome brother the favourite, did not come, so that there was abundant time for Guise to convert all Rouen into a heap of ruins. This was accomplished by the 26th of October, on which day the Catholic host poured into the burning city from all sides, murdering, as usual, every soul, violating women in the streets, and hacking little children to pieces. Of the English volunteers, thirty succeeded in hewing their road once more through the priestly army, to carry back the sad tale of Rouen's loss.

The report, heart-stirring as it was, created not much excitement in England all eyes being bent for the moment on an issue of even greater importance than the cause of the French Protestants. The very same night when Rouen was attempted to be stormed, Queen Elizabeth fell ill, and the alarming symptoms increased so rapidly that for some time her life was despaired of. It was an attack of the small-pox, made dangerous by incautious exposure to wind and rain, while the queen was walking with Dudley in the gardens of Hampton Court. The eruption having been thus checked, Elizabeth suddenly fell prostrate, and on the 16th of October the attendant physicians sent for Cecil, informing him that unless there was a rapid change for the better, the life of the queen was numbered by hours. There was an immediate meeting of the privy council and the most anxious consultation. Never before in the history of England had the welfare of the realm depended so much upon one life as at this moment. Religion, liberty, national independence, all was hanging on the breath of the pale woman, now resting unconsciously on her couch in the adjoining room. Cecil shuddered when contemplating the future that might arise should that faint breath cease; but while intently alarmed, neither he nor his colleagues broke through the calm of their deliberations. The question of succession to the throne, all agreed, was beset with a thousand difficulties, but yet not absolutely insoluble, once the point settled that the claim of catholic Mary Stuart should not be allowed. Barely a voice was raised in her favour, and it was finally arranged, on the proposition of the aged earl of Winchester, that the matter should be submitted to the crown lawyers and judges of the realm. While this earnest discussion was taking place, the privy council deliberating in a small chamber of the royal residence, and the queen lying prostrate in the next, the crisis had come and was past. All on a sudden, the fever ceased, the skin of the sufferer grew moist, red spots began to appear on her face, and the physicians cried, "She is saved!" After having been unconscious for five hours, Elizabeth awoke, and saw all the members of the council standing round her bed. Her first feeling was that she was dying, and before her reasoning faculties seemed clear she began to talk of Dudley, expressing her wish that he might be made protector of the realm after her decease. "I love him dearly," she exclaimed, "and have always loved him." Cecil shook his head in sadness. It was perplexing to think, indeed, that so great a queen, so noble a woman in many respects, should yet be so utterly vulgar as a woman. Whatever happened, Cecil and his colleagues were quite decided not to appoint the pretty horse-master protector of the realm.

Elizabeth recovered as rapidly as she had sunk, and in the course of a week was sufficiently well to attend again to the affairs of government. Cecil at first feared the effect which the news of the fall of Rouen and the loss of the brave men who had left Havre against her orders would have upon the queen; but, to his great surprise, she bore it calmly, only expressing regret of not having "dealt more frankly" with the Huguenots. To make up for the past, she commanded Warwick, still loitering about lazily, to start without an hour's delay, and gave orders to Cecil to "stuff Newhaven with men" to be thrown over into Dieppe. Eight ships of war were sent to cruise in the Channel, keeping up communication between France and England, and carrying troops to and fro, which was done with so much activity that by the beginning of December the army collected within the lines of Havre, under the earl of Warwick, was more than seven thousand strong. The seven thousand might have saved Protestantism in France had they arrived a couple of months earlier; as it was they came too late to be of any use, either to the Huguenot cause, or to the personal interests which induced Elizabeth to take a share in it. By the time the earl of Warwick arrived, the affairs of the French Protestants had become desperate. The fall of Rouen brought with it that of Dieppe, and in a few weeks the whole of Normandy was overrun by the troops of Guise, so as to force the prince de Condé to concentrate all his strength within the walls of Orleans, now the only city of importance remaining in possession of his party. Thus, from a military point of view, the cause of the Huguenots was lost, and their chance of holding out against the Catholic army was to be measured by weeks, if not days. However, on the other hand, they gained an immense political advantage a few weeks after the capture of Rouen. Anthony of Navarre wounded in the attempt to storm that city, expired on the 17th of November, at the age of forty-two, and according to the law of France, was succeeded in the regency of the kingdom by his brother, the prince de Condé. The death of the king of Navarre greatly heightened the confidence of the Protestants, not only because it raised their chief leader to a position from which it was not easy to thrust him, but as a supposed sign of heaven in favour of their cause. It was said that Anthony of Navarre had been wounded by a shot fired from a breach in the walls by a little child, and that though at first only a seeming scratch, the wound had become venomous in a mysterious manner, inducing mortification, and, finally, the death of the apostate king. This was true, in so far as the wound of the regent was not considered dangerous at first, but was made so by his subsequent mode of living. Anthony of Navarre was an inveterate libertine, and instead of keeping quiet, as ordered by the camp surgeons, he summoned his beautiful mistress, Mademoiselle de Rouet, to his tent, making merry till gangrene had seized his body and he felt the shades of death approaching. Repentance, real or feigned, came over the dying king in his last hours. Summoning his friends around his couch, he declared to them that he expired, as he had lived, in the faith of the Bible, disowning the Church of Rome. The confession of Anthony of Navarre was listened to by his only son, Henry, aged nine, destined to be the greatest king that ever ruled in France.

The death of his brother encouraged the prince de Condé to hazard a bold stroke. Being entitled to the place of regent, and seeing no hope of continuing the resistance to the Guises within walled towers, he resolved to leave Orleans, and gathering all the remaining forces of the Huguenots, to throw himself upon Paris, to assume the reins of government, and to declare the boy-king a prisoner, retained forcibly by his enemies. In pursuance of this plan, Condé quitted Orleans at the beginning of November, accompanied by eight thousand infantry and five thousand horse, the latter under the command of Admiral Coligny, most trusted of Huguenot leaders. The movement of Condé being entirely unexpected by his opponents, he found the road to Paris open, and after a ten days' march was enabled to establish himself at Montrouge, a suburb of the capital. There was a strong body of Protestants in Paris, and although the Catholic mob terrorised over them, Condé might have made himself, with their assistance, master of the city, had he battered down the gates, and marched into it at once. He did not do so, however, but kept hanging about the environs for more than a week, in the vain hope that the priestly rulers of the capital, who kept him at bay with negotiations, would end by acknowledging him regent of the kingdom. Discovering at last that he was being deceived by his adversaries, and hearing at the same time of the approach of the Catholic army, coming up in rapid strides from Normandy, Condé turned away from the capital, in the hope of either gaining ground in a successful battle, or of reaching Havre and effecting a junction with the main body of the English allies, whose arrival had just been reported to him. Marching along the valley of the Seine, the Catholics upwards and the Huguenots downwards, the two armies met on the 18th of December, near the town of Dreux, on the left bank of the river. The shock of the opposing factions was terrible. From early dawn till late at night, eighteen thousand Catholics, commanded by Montmorency and Guise, kept fighting; hand to hand and face to face, with eleven thousand Huguenots, led by Condé and Coligny, the carnage not coming to an end till the cold wintry earth was strewn by the bodies of nearly one half the opposing forces, and the very river was running red with blood. The corpses of eight thousand men were lying stiff and stark on the battle-field, and as many more crept about wounded in the damp grass, rending the air with their cries, seeking help and finding none, utterly alone among pyramids of the dead. Neither the Protestants nor the Catholics could claim victory; the frightful contest was simply a drawn battle. Like two gladiators, dashing forward at the same moment, each thrusting his sword into the body of his opponent, and both sinking down mortally wounded, so the two armies stood, and so they fell on the field of Dreux. The Huguenots made Montmorency, commander-in-chief of the Catholics, their prisoner; and the Catholics made Condé, commander-in-chief of the Huguenots, their prisoner; so that the laurels here were as equally divided as the bloodshed. But though a drawn battle, the field of Dreux was fatal to the Huguenot cause: the huge frame of ancient popery was able to bear many such wounds, but the young body of Protestantism spent its best strength here, receiving a stroke from which it never recovered.

The all but complete annihilation of Protestantism in France, and the frightful cruelties committed by the Catholic bands engaged in the work of extermination, had a strong effect upon public opinion in England. Even those who were advocating reunion with the church of Rome, dazzled by its external splendour, and reverencing its age, were horrified at the fiendish conduct of the priestly leaders in the Huguenot war—conduct justified by them on principle, and openly approved by the head of the church; while the adherents of the reformed doctrine, constituting the great majority of the English people, were more than ever loud in their denunciations of Rome, and the principle of persecution inherent in its faith. The first consequence of this universal feeling became visible in the constitution of a new parliament, the writs for which were issued in the latter part of 1562, and which met for the first time at Westminster, on the 12th of January, 1563. The spirit of the assembly was shown at once in the choice of a speaker, which fell upon an ardent church reformer, Sir Thomas Williams, who entered upon office by addressing a quaint oration to Elizabeth. "We now assembled," the speaker exclaimed, "as diligent in our calling, have thought good to move your majesty to build a fort for the surety of the realm, to the repulsing of your enemies abroad; which must be set upon firm grounds and steadfast, having two gates—one commonly open, the other as a postern, with two watchmen at either of them—one governor, one lieutenant, and no good thing there wanting. The fort to be named the Feast of God; the governor thereof to be God; your majesty the lieutenant; the stones the hearts of your faithful people; the two watchmen at the open gate to be called Knowledge and Virtue, and the two at the postern gate to be called Mercy and Truth." The address of the speaker was followed by discourses of the leading members of the house, all expressing, with great energy, the necessity to uphold and strengthen the reformed religion, and to break the power of its enemies within the realm. This naturally brought on the question of succession, uppermost in all men's minds. The late serious illness of the queen had created universal alarm among the Protestants, and the representatives of the nation had not been a week together before they showed their intention to make this the most important matter of the session. It was well known that the queen, whose chief object in assembling the faithful commons was that of getting supplies, was greatly averse to the discussion of the important points involved in the succession, but this did not for a moment stay the zeal of the new parliament. The matter having been opened by various violent attacks upon Mary Stuart, whose accession to the throne of England was declared on all hands to be impossible, the House of Commons, at the end of a fortnight, resolved by a large majority to present an address to the queen. Cecil in vain tried to moderate the zeal of the commons by telling them that all their efforts would be defeated by "the unwillingness of her majesty to have a successor known." The reply was a curt remark of the speaker that the voting of the address to the queen would have to take precedence of the voting of the supplies. Sir Thomas Williams understood the queen, and the queen understood the hint.

The delivery of the address, looked upon by all as an event of great importance, took place on the 28th of January, in the throne-room of Hampton Court Palace. Nearly the whole of the four hundred members of the House of Commons stood around the speaker when he read, in deep and sonorous voice, the collective speech, outpouring of their common feelings, to Elizabeth. After the usual flatteries, and congratulations to the queen on her recovery from severe illness, Sir Thomas Williams dwelt upon the machinations of the Catholics, as revealed in the plots hatched at the residence of the Spanish ambassador. There were, the address stated, a faction of people in the realm, "contentious and malicious Papists," who, "most unnaturally against their country, most madly against their own safety, and most treacherously against her highness, not only hoped for the woful day of her death, but also lay in wait to advance some title under which they might revive their late unspeakable cruelties." The commons, further remarked the speaker, "saw nothing to withstand the desires of the Catholics but her only life;" and fearing to what attempt the "hope of her death might drive the enemies of the realm, they thought it was "entirely necessary that there should be more set and known between her majesty's life and the unkindness and cruelty the papists intended to revive." In consequence, the commons desired two things, the first being that the queen would choose a husband, and the second that she would use the opportunity of the session to allow her successor, in default of heirs of her own body, "to be determined by act of parliament." In return for it, the address promised, parliament would devise "the most penal, sharp, and terrible statutes against all who should practise against her majesty's safety." Elizabeth made a short and angry reply to the petition of her faithful commons. Informing the speaker that it was impossible for her to give an answer to the grave questions submitted to her without careful consideration, she darted a lofty glance at the representatives of the nation, after which she abruptly turned her back upon them, and swept out of the room. The members of the House of Lords, who presented themselves before the queen the day after, with an address similar to that of the House of Commons, were not treated with more consideration. The petition of the peers stating that it was "possible" she might have children, Elizabeth told them, with ill-concealed bitterness and anger, that "the lines which they saw in her face were not wrinkles, but marks of the small-pox;" further, that "God had given children to St Elizabeth; and, old as she was, He might give children to her." The reference to the saint of her name, insane fanatic and patroness of the Inquisition, was deemed not very happy by either the lords or the commons of Elizabeth's parliament.

The evasive replies of the queen to the demands made in respect to the succession gave rise to great dissatisfaction. It was generally believed that the reasons which determined Elizabeth not to comply with the wishes of the nation were to be sought in her affection for Dudley, and her secret dislike for the tenets of the more advanced forms of Protestantism, which made her prefer even the Catholic queen of the Scots to any candidate brought forward by parliament. Though interrupted for a moment, after the discovery of de Quadra's intrigues, the queen had never given up her correspondence with Mary Stuart, and there were many who feared that this intercourse might become year after year more intimate, so as to drift finally into recognition, tacit if not otherwise, of her claims to the throne. To prevent this, as far as possible, the commons enacted a number of severe laws against Roman Catholics. Under the title of an "act for the assurance of the queen's royal power over all estates and subjects within her dominions," a statute was passed which provided that all persons who had been in holy orders, or taken a degree in the universities, or practised as lawyers, or held office in the execution of the law, should "take the oath of supremacy when tendered to them, under the penalties of praemunire, in the first instance, and, after refusing for three months, under pain of high treason." The law was specially aimed at the Catholic bishops of the late reign, who, though nearly all in prison, were still acknowledged the leaders of the priestly party, and kept working hard to secure the succession of Mary Stuart, as the one great means for the restoration of the Romish faith. Under the new act, the whole of these bishops were doomed to death, as it was certain they would refuse the oath of supremacy when tendered to them. The execution of the hated prelates, originators and instruments of the frightful persecution of the preceding reign, was ardently desired by many of the Calvinist preachers: and sermons were preached at St. Paul's on the "absolute necessity of "killing the caged wolves." But the wolves escaped.

after all, through a singular little loop-hole. As soon as the new statute had received the royal assent, Horne, bishop of Winchester, most zealous of Protestant leaders, had Edmund Bonner, the late tenant of the see of London, fetched from his rather easy confinement in the Marshalsea, to administer the oath to him, or on refusal to send him to the block. The great priestly bloodhound felt no desire to incur the martyrdom which he had prepared for scores of innocent beings; and laying hold of a legal quibble as of a straw to save himself, he declared, not that he would not take the oath, but that his interlocutor was not the right person to administer it. It was enacted in the statute that only bishops, or archbishops, should tender the oath, and Horne having been nominated while his predecessor was still alive, his appointment was void by the canons of the church. The judges of the court of Queen's Bench, when appealed to in the matter, decided in favour of the objection, and thus Bonner's life was saved, all the other Protestant bishops and archbishops, and, most of all, Matthew Parker, Cardinal Pole's successor in the see of Canterbury, showing themselves strongly opposed to inaugurate a new reign of religious persecution. It was a noble victory of the church of England over the church of Rome.

Having shown its ultra-Protestant character in the passing of the "act for the assurance of the queen's royal power," parliament hesitated no longer to vote the supplies so much desired by Elizabeth. To put her majesty in the best possible good humour, and as a last inducement to incline her ear to the wishes of her faithful commons, the grants of money were on a scale of profuse liberality, amounting to two fifteenths and tenths of personal property, and an income-tax of ten per cent. for two years. The queen declared herself extremely satisfied with this munificent contribution to her exchequer; but remained as vague as ever in her replies to the reiterated hints and demands of both the lords and commons to take unto herself a husband, and to appoint a successor. When very hard pressed, at last, she announced her intention to prorogue parliament, and to respond, fully, freely, and most candidly, to the addresses presented by both houses, in the form of a speech from the throne. Anxiety as to the contents of this speech now grew extreme; and there was breathless silence when, on the 10th of April, the queen rose in the chamber of the lords, and, in a clear, ringing voice, opened her mind on the subject uppermost in the thoughts of all.

"Since there can be no duer debt," Elizabeth exclaimed, "than prince's word, to keep that unspotted, for my part, as one that would be loth that the self thing which keeps the merchant's credit from craze, should be the cause that prince's speech should merit blame, and so then honour quail: an answer therefore I will make, and this it is. The two petitions that you presented me, in many words expressed, contained these two things in sum, as of your cares the greatest—my marriage and my successor. Of these two, the last I think is best to be touched; of the other a silent thought may serve, for I hold it hath been so desired that no other tree's blossoms should have been minded ere hope of my fruit be denied to you. Yet to the last, think not that you had needed this desire, if I had seen a time so fit, and it so ripe to be denounced. The greatness of the cause, therefore, and need of your returns doth make me say that which I think the wise may easily guess: that as a short time for so long a continuance ought not to pass by rote, as many telleth tales, even so as cause by conference with the learned shall show me matter worthy utterance for your behoof, so shall I the more gladly pursue your good after my days, than with my prayers be a means to linger a living thread. And this much more will I add for your comfort, I have good record in this place that other means have been thought of than you mentioned, perchance for your good as much, and for my surety not less, which if presently could have been executed had not been deferred. But I hope I shall quit with Nunc dimittis, which cannot be without I see some glimpses of following after my graved bones. And, by the way, if any doubt that I am as it were by vow or determination bent never to trade that life, put out that heresy: your belief is awry. For as I think it best for a private woman, so do I strive with myself to think it most meet for a prince; and if I can bend my will to your need, I will not resist such a mind."

Such was the speech, textually—preserved in the manuscript version at Hatfield House—delivered by Elizabeth, on the 10th of April, 1563, before the lords and commons of the realm. Lords and commons listened as if their lives depended on getting at the meaning of all the information conveyed to them, with so clear a voice, and in words undeniably English. Yet there was not a man who could affirm that he had caught a single idea from out the flow of words, beyond the one that her majesty meant to say something for the general "comfort," but did not say it. Reflection and intercommunication of thought leading to no enlightenment on the matter dwelt upon by her majesty, and the all-important question as to whether she meant to take a husband or not, the parliamentary representatives went back to their homes with a heavy heart, more than ever dreading the dangers of the dark future. There was some cause for taking a gloomy view of the political state of the country. The miseries and the ruin sown by five years of priestly terrorism were not so far forgotten in a few years of liberal government as to leave a fear of their return behind; and the fear increased with the consideration that the dark power from which the realm had but just escaped was spreading everywhere on the continent of Europe, and in actual conflict with English arms. The alliance with the French Protestants, necessitated as it was by the true policy of England, created great and serious alarm when once it was seen that it was not likely to stop in the sending of a few shipfuls of soldiers and the loan of a few thousand crowns, but had all the chances of leading either to a war of conquest, or to a disgraceful defeat. This alternative, indeed, presented itself soon after the terrible encounter of Catholics and Huguenots on the field of Dreux. Though not vanquished, the martial strength of Condé's followers received its death-blow at this battle; and the shattered forces which, after the capture of the leader, admiral Coligny led back to Orleans, were scarce sufficient to man the walls of their last stronghold. Swiftly in their rear followed Guise, with fresh troops from Spain and Italy, raised by his ever zealous Catholic allies, prepared to crush the last breath of gaunt heresy in Orleans, and then to throw himself, with full force, upon the hated foreign invaders at the mouth of the Seine. By the middle of January, 1563, a month after the battle of Dreux, the city of Orleans was completely invested, and the feeble band of defenders within knew that all chances of resistance were gone, and that they must prepare for death. The only hope left in every Huguenot heart was that of falling in the fight, struck down by a sword or a bullet; for woe to man, woman, or child who should survive the battle, to fall a prey to the nameless atrocities of the conquerors. With flashing eyes and beating hearts, all through the besieged city men and women repeated to each other the renowned declaration of the duke de Guise that the massacre of Vassy and the carnage of Orange should sink into nothingness before the horrors of Orleans. The duke intended, it was said, to make an example of Orleans, by killing every living soul after unheard-of tortures, destroy every vestige of wall and building, and to sow grass upon the ruins of the city.

The duke de Guise, whether he intended or not, was not enabled to make an example of Orleans. Towards the end of January, a week or two after he had sat down to the siege of the city, there was introduced into his tent a young nobleman from the Angoumois, Poltrot de Méré, handsome of figure and well-spoken, who offered his services. He told the duke that he had been fighting with the Huguenots, but had been ill-treated, and from a love of their faith had come to hate it. Guise, fond of apostates, was pleased with the speech and the man, and, after complimenting Poltrot de Méré on his discrimination in selecting the right cause for which to fight, attached him to his immediate suite. Weeks passed on, and with them the siege of Orleans. Towards the middle of February, the thick walls of the city had been battered sufficiently to allow an assault, and Guise fixed it for the night from the 18th to the 19th. Towards sunset on the evening of the 18th of February the duke set out from the camp towards the castle of Cornei, to examine all the preparations made for the storm. He was followed by Poltrot de Méré and two other gentlemen; and the little group of four horsemen had just arrived at the outskirts of the camp, when, quick as lightning, Poltrot drew a pistol from his saddle, fired it at the duke, gave the spurs to his steed, and galloped away across the fields. The shot was well aimed; there was a short, sharp cry, a spurt of blood, and Guise fell upon the neck of his horse. When the two attendant gentlemen, paralyzed by surprise and fear, came hurrying up, they found their chief unconscious; they took him in their arms, and carried him to Cornei castle. Here the duke lingered for six days, with two balls in his breast which no surgeon dared touch without giving instant death. But there was not the faintest hope of life being saved; and Guise, being made aware that his end was approaching, resolved to spend his last hours in prayers. Calling his friends and the generals of the army around his couch, he exhorted them to be mild and forgiving to all, even to Protestant heretics, and to make every attempt in their power to restore peace to France. Then his confessor gave him absolution; and, with prayers on his lips, and preaching, fainter and fainter, those lessons of love and peace which he had so little done to exemplify, the duke de Guise closed his eyes for ever, on the morn of Ash Wednesday, the 24th of February. Thus expired, in the bloom of manhood, at the age of forty-four, the conqueror of Calais, greatest general of the age.

The death of Guise saved Orleans, but it could not save the Huguenot cause. There was utter stupefaction in the Catholic camp at the news of the great leader having fallen under the stroke of an assassin, and the only man able to succeed him, the constable Montmorancy, continuing a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, an immediate cessation of hostilities was the consequence. Catherine de Medici—not lamenting very deeply the loss of Guise, dangerous to her ambition as an enemy, and almost more dangerous as a friend—made use of this suspension of arms by entering into negotiations with the Huguenots, which promised to be the more successful as supported by the full influence of the prince de Condé, kept in honourable confinement at the royal court. It was a great opportunity for the disciples of Calvin to regain in the cabinet what they had lost in the field; but they were not in the position to make use of it. Immense as had been the relief caused by the death of the man who had shown himself the mightiest of their enemies, and the very soul of the tremendous power arrayed against them, even this gain was not without corresponding loss. The popularity of Guise had been vast among the majority of the French people, and his murder brought forth such a burst of hatred against the Huguenots as had never before been manifested. There was a cry that they were traitors to their country as well as assassins, Guise having conquered Calais from the English, and they his murderers having made over Havre to the foreigner. Many of the Huguenots winced under this accusation, their national feelings being nearly as strong as their religious convictions; but there were others who boldly fronted the charges brought against their party, defending their right, if not to hand over a slice of France to the foreigner, at least to commit assassination. Maddened by the fiendish persecution they had undergone, they believed, and loudly asserted their belief, in the lawfulness of tyrannicide, quoting the Bible to prove it. Even Admiral Coligny, noblest of Huguenot leaders, seemed to lean to this view. The assassin of Guise having given himself up to the Catholics, and accused Coligny of inciting him to the deed, the admiral frankly stated that Poltrot had spoken to him of his intention to commit the deed; and that though he had not incited him to it, he also had not dissuaded him from it. "I confess, moreover," Coligny added, in a communication to Catherine de Medici, "that, so far from regretting the death of monsieur de Guise, I hold it to be the greatest benefit that could have happened to this kingdom and to the church of God,"—le plus grand bien qui pouvait advenir à ce royaume et à l'église de Dieu.

There were many among the Huguenots who did not share Coligny's views respecting tyrannicide, and still more who were opposed to Condé's policy of making over a portion of French soil to a foreign power, in order to gain freedom of conscience. Divergences of opinion such as these, while greatly weakening the Protestant party, made the peace negotiations of Catherine de Medici comparatively easy, allowing her to fix her own terms. These were that a general amnesty should be proclaimed, and that all nobles professing the reformed faith should have the free exercise of their creed, with permission to let as many persons as they liked assist at the religious service; but that all other Protestant subjects of the king should not be free to assemble in public worship, except the inhabitants of the towns still held by the Huguenots. Orleans, and a few other places being the only towns of this description, the propositions of Catherine de Medici amounted to little less than the suppression of Protestant worship; nevertheless, the terms were adopted by the prince de Condé and a large party of his adherents, and a formal treaty of peace to the effect was signed between them and the government on the 19th of March, at the city of Amboise. Admiral Coligny refused to give his adherence to the treaty. "To restrict us," he cried, with indignation, "to worship God anywhere else but in the mansions of nobles is to destroy more churches with one stroke of the pen than war could have destroyed in many years." The admiral insisted, besides, that his party ought not in honour to enter into any treaty without consulting their English allies; but in this as in his other arguments, he was outvoted by a majority of his adherents. To drive the troops of Queen Elizabeth from French soil was the chief object of Catherine de Medici in making peace with the Huguenots; and by working zealously on the patriotic feelings of Condé and other leaders, she succeeded in getting their promise to assist in the work. Soon after the signing of the treaty of Amboise, an attack upon the English army was decided on; and, with the exception of Coligny, all the military chieftains of the Huguenots gave their assent. Towards the end of April, after the slayer of the duke de Guise had been put to death under monstrous cruelties—tortured for weeks, nailed to a plank with red-hot pikes, and then torn to pieces by horses—the royal army received the command to leave the camp of Orleans, and to put itself in movement towards Havre.

If the French were determined to take Havre, the English were as determined to hold it at all risks. Hitherto Elizabeth's zeal in the assistance of her Huguenot allies had been very feeble; no sooner, however, had these allies turned against her, when she roused herself into high passion, swearing a great oath that she would be revenged. It was in vain that the young king of France, instigated by Condé, who went very unwillingly with Catherine de Medici, despatched a special ambassador to England to enter upon peace negotiations for the restoration of Havre, making large pecuniary offers, and holding Calais as final bait in the background. Elizabeth at first refused to see the envoy; and when she received him at last, it was only to upbraid him, and to launch forth against "the false prince de Condé," as "a treacherous, inconstant, perjured villain." Meanwhile the French forces drew nearer and nearer to Havre; and to meet the coming attack, the garrison worked day and night at the fortifications, and established a constant communication with England by daily packets, crossing the channel between Spithead and the mouth of the Seine. Reinforcements, too, kept pouring in quickly, in obedience to the commands of the queen, who ordered the despatch of seven thousand men to Havre, and finding that volunteers were slow in coming forward, opened the great prisons of the metropolis, the Fleet and Newgate, and drafted the whole lot of thieves, burglars, cut-throats, and other gallows-birds whom good luck had made "tall fellows" into the army. By these and other means, the English garrison had been strengthened by the end of May to the extent of numbering nearly ten thousand, of which, however, only a few were veteran soldiers, a great proportion being young recruits, and another, still less reliable, Newgate-men. These last were a dangerous addition, in more than one sense, to the troops at Havre; they carried to them, not merely vice and immorality, but pale death itself, in the shape of the typhus, or gaol-fever.

The French troops had completely enclosed Havre at the beginning of June; but the negotiations still continuing, there was no open declaration of hostilities till the 6th of July, on which day a herald from the camp of Constable Montmorency, who had taken the command-in-chief, formally summoned the earl of Warwick to surrender the place to its lawful owner, the king of France. A haughty defiance was the reply, whereupon the French sat down to the work of siege in good earnest. Montmorency was not by any means sanguine as to the rapidity of the undertaking, fully aware that his enemies had all the advantages of brave men, high ramparts, and, what was as important as all else, a constant communication with England, on their side. The ships of Elizabeth had chased every vessel, great or small, manned by Frenchmen, from the seas; and the road from Portsmouth to Havre had become, for the time being, as absolutely English as the road from Portsmouth to London. From the heights of Ingouville, where his camp was pitched, Montmorency saw with alarm the crowd of sail hovering at the mouth of the Seine, disembarking men, guns, and ammunition; and his alarm was shared by Catherine de Medici and the young king and court, who had taken up their residence at the port of Fécamp, to watch the success of the important operations upon which, for the moment, the safety of the crown depended. But Montmorency's fears were soon allayed by the result of his first proceedings, which were so eminently and against all expectation successful, as to create absolute surprise in the French camp. The constable perceived with astonishment that the English troops, of whose undaunted valour he had personal experience, replied but feebly to the attacks from without; and it was not long before his eye, keenly watching the doings in the besieged town, became aware of a strange kind of restless movement there, which had nothing in common with the ordinary clock-work march of disciplined masses. Groups of soldiers, without arms, carrying mysterious burdens, went tramping up and down the narrow streets of Havre; dim crowds of men in black went fluttering from the ships in the harbour to the citadel in the centre of the town; and, over and between the thunder of the guns from the walls, there was heard the solemn tinkling of bells from the ancient chapel of Notre Dame. All at once the truth burst upon Montmorency—the plague, grim and ghastly, was stalking abroad in Havre town.

The plague, indeed, had clutched with fierce grip the English garrison. On the 7th of June, Earl Warwick wrote to Cecil that a strange disease had made its appearance among the troops under his command, and seemed to be spreading; and a fortnight after he reported that the pestilence, to which he could give no name, was becoming more and more fatal, that “those who fell ill rarely recovered,” and that the men were dying at the rate of sixty a day. Another week, and the deaths had risen to a hundred a day; and the grave-diggers flagged in their work, and corpses were found lying in the streets, and floated rotting about the harbour. Now Montmorency’s cannon set to work in full earnest, battering the walls, castles, and turrets, with bullets flying as far as Notre Dame chapel, the mournful bell of which kept tinkling day and night. Pale, like shadows, the soldiers mounted the ramparts day after day, courting almost the fire of the French guns; there was death in front, and there was death behind, and the death in front seemed much the easier. On the 1st of July but three thousand men were left at Havre fit for duty; and though fresh troops kept pouring in unceasingly, they did not fill the dreadful gap made more unceasingly by the fell destroyer who was striking death right and left. Shipload after shipload of troops, stout Cornishmen, raw-boned peasants from Gloucestershire, and quick-eyed lads of London city, were landed at the fatal harbour-side, arrived healthy, fresh, and rosy in the morning, and were lying outstretched, stiff, and stark in the streets in the evening, food for the dogs and Montmorency’s guns. On the 10th of July but fifteen hundred Englishmen were left at Havre. Their case now had become utterly hopeless, and they had made their reckoning with the dead; but they stood out stubborn as ever against all appeals of the French commander to surrender the town, and depart home unmolested. They stood out although famine as well as pestilence was raging in the doomed place. There was plenty of corn, but no mills to grind it into flour nor bakers to make it into bread; the mills had been burned by the French, and the bakers had been killed by the plague; and, helpless as always in the divine art of cookery, the English soldiers knew not what to do with their corn, and went starving in the midst of plenty. On the 11th of July Warwick despatched an express to the queen, informing her that in another week there would not be a hundred Englishmen left to defend Havre against the enemy, and that the only chance of keeping the place would be to send a fresh garrison without an hour’s delay. “Haste! post haste, for thy life! Haste, haste, haste!” was the endorsement of Warwick’s despatch.

Warwick’s messenger hastened fast enough; but the grim messenger of death who had taken up his quarters at Havre hastened much faster than he. By the time that twenty men-of-war, the flower of the English navy, came hurrying across the Channel from Portsmouth, all sails set, with three thousand men on board to throw into Havre, Warwick felt himself reduced to extremities. Had the constable been aware of the utter weakness of the handful of tottering men who kept up a show of resistance on the ramparts, he would have marched into the town at once; but the awe of English valour kept him in his camp, timid to attempt anything else than to take Havre according to all the rules of military art. But the fire from the ramparts grew fainter and fainter; and on the 25th of July, the report of Montmorency’s officers was that enormous breaches had been made in the walls, and that a storm might take place with the greatest possible chance of success. The attack was ordered for the early morn of the 27th; and a few hours before, the constable sent a last summons to his gallant adversary to surrender. The offer was for the English garrison to leave Havre with arms and baggage, at their leisure, and with all the honours of war; which offer was accepted by Warwick, not without some surprise on the part of the French commander, who was prepared for a desperate resistance. But Montmorency was surprised no more when he marched into the town on the 28th of July, and found scarce any living men within the walls; found the streets strewn with corpses, and the houses full of corpses, and the silence of death all around. Tears came into the eyes of the stanch old warrior at sight of this boundless misery, more frightful than the carnage of the battle-field; and, hastening to the English commander, he warmly expressed his commiseration for all the sufferings he had undergone. Warwick was in no mood, however, to accept and be grateful for expressions of condolence. At the very moment when the French troops marched into Havre, the English fleet, which had been beating about for some days in the Channel, under stress of weather, appeared in sight; and the booming of a hundred guns announced that England’s queen had resolved to try another sharp tussle before giving up the last foot of soil in France. It took some time to inform Admiral Clinton, commander of the fleet, of the great change of events, and to reconcile him to it. The young king and queen-mother, who had entered Havre with their army, sent a courteous message to him to dine at the royal table—honour seldom accorded to others but princes of the blood. The admiral, however, refused the invitation, telling monsieur de Lignerolles, the courtly messenger, in very uncourtly manner, that if English soldiers had been beaten for once, it was a consolation to know that it had not been done by French troops, but by no less a power than the plague.

But a few hundred men out of the many thousands who had been poured into Havre escaped the plague-stricken shore of France; and the return even of these few hundred was fraught with endless misery. Huddled together with the three thousand troops which Admiral Clinton was carrying, in the hulls of narrow vessels, under a burning hot July sun, the infection spread rapidly; and before Portsmouth harbour was reached the whole fleet was one mass of sweltering disease. The men were disbanded as soon as the ships cast anchor; but this only aggravated the evil. Returning to the wretched homesteads of their friends and relations, they carried with them the fatal pestilence, the seeds of which were lying ever ready in ill-drained houses, ill-swept lanes, and ill-fed bodies. London was the first place to feel the effects of the French disaster. In the last days of July, while Montmorency's soldiers were taking possession of Havre, the deaths in London had been at the rate of two hundred a week, or little above the average; but in the first week of August, with a few Havre soldiers scattered among the population, the deaths rose to six hundred, in the second week to eight hundred, in the third to one thousand, and in the fourth week to the appalling number of two thousand. Thus it went on increasing, till the stoutest hearts grow faint at the fluttering of the wings of the pale angel of death. The daily work of the great city got suspended for the time; and those who did not fly sought relief in prayer, fasts, and meditation, the clergy and bishops being foremost in proclaiming that the fatal disease was sent as a punishment by the Almighty for the sins of the people, particularly the great sin of visiting theatres and other places of amusement. It was fortunate that Cecil, when called upon by the bishops to prohibit all plays and pastimes, attempted to put a stop to the whining and despair by treating the matter from a statesmanlike point of view. Fasting and praying, he said, were very good things in themselves, but, under the circumstances, the work of sweeping dwelling-houses and cleaning gutters was the most pressing, and one which he strongly advised to undertake before appealing to Providence. The high-church prelates set up a great howl at the irreverence of the head of the government; but Cecil went on his way undisturbed, issuing proclamations against uncleanness and the overcrowding of dwellings, and taking other sanitary measures to stem the progress of the disease, which, in fact, was nothing but a bad form of the typhus fever. So effectual were these measures, that with the help of some heavy November rains, which washed the kennels and sewers of London better than the good citizens had done for half a century, the pestilence was got under before the end of the year. Before its final disappearance an outbreak occurred in the Tower, which furnished Cecil with a convenient opportunity for releasing the Roman bishops confined there for disobedience of parliamentary statutes. Cecil shrewdly judged that the best way to make these gentlemen harmless would be to set them free, and the worst way to make them martyrs.

The typhus plague—last memorial of English conquest on French soil—confined its ravages in London almost solely to the poor; and among its victims there was only one man of high standing and fame, the ambassador of King Philip. Alvarez de Quadra, bishop of Aquila, died in the last week of August, and his disappearance from the political scene was an event affecting not a little the relations both between England and Spain, and England and Scotland. Representing at the court of England the most powerful monarch of the world, and being, in his own person, one of the shrewdest and most accomplished diplomatists of the age, de Quadra, in spite of his advocacy of a fallen cause, was possessed of vast influence; and Elizabeth herself not unfrequently stood in awe of the man whose will was able to direct the legions of Spain and of Rome, and whose keen dark eyes, as he stood erect and proud before the maiden queen, seemed to search the very depths of her soul. Elizabeth had reason to fear the bishop of Aquila as by far the most powerful enemy of her throne within her own realm, and not the less powerful because fighting with no other weapons but those of intrigue. The heart and centre of every conspiracy against the government, he made it his business to study intimately the weak part of all the measures of Cecil and the other advisers of the queen, to thwart their policy whenever possible, and to look upon failures in no other light than sources of fresh experience. The assistance given by Elizabeth to the Huguenots naturally roused, as his whole anger, so all his energy; and, to aim a final stroke at her, he devised a scheme far-reaching in every respect, and the greatest he had yet prepared. It was nothing less than to marry Don Carlos, eldest son of King Philip, and heir of his vast dominions, to Mary Stuart, and thus to give the influence of the latter, and of the Roman Catholic party in England, a preponderance which might lead to the destruction of Elizabeth's throne and Cecil's power at the first favourable opportunity. The scheme was not greatly either to the interest or to the liking of King Philip, who had not only higher interests in view than the gain of a poor, half-barbarous country in the north, but felt little desirous to encumber himself with more Protestant subjects, while the rebellion of the Netherlands kept all his inquisitors, soldiers, and hangmen at work. But in spite of his master's expressed reluctance, de Quadra succeeded in bringing him over to his own views; and in a letter dated June 15, 1563, King Philip consented to the opening of secret negotiations with Mary Stuart, in hopes, as he distinctly informed the ambassador, that "it might be the beginning of a better state of things in England." The bishop of Aquila did not lose a moment, and instantly despatched his private secretary, Luiz de Paz, to Holyrood, to confer with the queen of Scots. Mary Stuart was overjoyed at receipt of the message; even the dreams of her wildest ambition faded before the almost reality held out before her by de Quadra's envoy, of holding on her brow the quintuple diadem of a queen of Spain, the Netherlands, England, Scotland, and the boundless realm of America. It did not take long to settle particulars. Don Carlos, to whom the young queen was to give her hand, was known, by common repute, to be a gloomy, ferocious savage, a half-wolf, if not a madman, possessed of no other passion but lust, and of no other desire than that of gorging himself to repletion. It little mattered to Mary Stuart; she felt that she had strength enough, and cunning enough, to tame a man-wolf, and once tamed, or killed, or driven into helpless idiocy, her life might run on in endless tumult of joy in the golden land of Spain, with crowds of admirers at her feet, and crowds of priests at her last bedside to forgive all her sins. The pact was soon made, and in the second week of August Luiz de Paz left Holyrood, to report to his employer that the queen of the Scots was ready to give her hand to Don Carlos, and to submit to all the conditions imposed upon her in a secret treaty of agreement. Travelling in disguise, the private secretary arrived in London on the 26th of August, and, hastening at once to de Quadra's residence, was struck by the air of consternation prevailing there. The servants went hurrying about wildly, some trembling under visible fear, and others in a state of excitement. Wending his way to the chamber of his master, the secretary found him lying on his bed—his deathbed, as the new-comer saw at a glance. The plague, the fatal plague which Newgate prisoners had carried from England to France, and which the soldiers of Protestantism had brought back from France to England, had laid hold of the great Spanish ambassador, friend of King Philip, at the very moment when he hoped to set the keystone to the edifice at which he had been labouring for years. Already the death-rattle was in the throat of Alvarez de Quadra when his secretary entered the room; but his arrival made life flicker up once more. "He recognized me, and answered bravely when I spoke to him," Luiz de Paz wrote to his government, describing the last moments of the proud bishop of Aquila. "But," the private secretary added, "he was grieved to end his services at a moment when he hoped to be of use; his last words were, 'I can do no more'—no puedo mas!" It was the death knell of all the high hopes of Mary Stuart—no puedo mas!

The existence of the plague, the miseries of which were aggravated by a frightful dearth of food, did not affect the spirits of Queen Elizabeth, who exhibited more than usual merriment, and made her court one round of fetes and entertainments, while the death-rate in London was at two thousand per week, and the people were perishing of hunger in the streets. Elizabeth had several causes for merriment, besides the death of the Spanish ambassador, which could not be but welcome to her. Although she professed to be greatly concerned about the defeat at Havre, the loss of the town in reality furnished grounds for real satisfaction, as bringing to an end a war the complications of which threatened to involve her whole reign, and might lead to disturb the security of her throne Elizabeth instinctively felt, and the feeling was greatly encouraged by Cecil, that the less England had to do with continental politics the better it would be for the welfare of the realm. There could be no doubt, indeed, that however small or great the strip of French soil which English sovereigns might succeed in occupying by force of arms, its secure holding would always prove extraordinarily costly, would involve the two nations in constant broil, and would, after all, be of no appreciable benefit to the English people, except that of satisfying a vain sentiment of glory, detrimental to all the nobler objects of human progress. Seeing this clearly, and being, in this respect, far ahead of the mass of her subjects and the old instinctive hatred of the two races, the queen hurried to come to a definite peace with France as soon as the last of her soldiers had left the plague-stricken town at the mouth of the Seine. Catherine de Medici, nearly as anxious for peace as Elizabeth, was quite willing to come to terms, and it was arranged accordingly that plenipotentiaries of the two countries should meet at Troyes, in Champagne, to settle the particulars of the treaty. There were no great difficulties in the matter, except the delicate point of the restoration of Calais to England, as settled in the peace of Cambray, concluded in the spring of 1559. Although by the terms of this agreement the French government was bound to give up Calais at the end of eight years, and had given hostages for the fulfilment of the bond, there was from the commencement no real intention to fulfil the stipulation, nor was there any serious expectation on the part of the English government that the bargain would be carried out. But to make peace secure between France and England, it was clearly necessary that the Cambray agreement should be openly repealed, and it was this which became the chief work of the new commissioners at Troyes. The matter finally resolved itself into a money bargain. Elizabeth instructed her two envoys, Sir Thomas Smith and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, to consent to the waiving of all English claims upon Calais, and the restoration of the French hostages, on payment of a sum of six hundred thousand crowns, payable at once; and Catherine de Medici, on her part, authorized her plenipotentiaries, M. de Bourdin, her private secretary, and the cardinal of Lorraine, to offer one hundred thousand crowns, payable in instalments. It was not very easy to reconcile these greatly varying estimates as to the value of a town and so many human beings; and both the royal ladies being equally fond of money, they set to huckstering about the cash like two fish-wives. At last Catherine, who was thoroughly aware that her antagonist wanted peace even more than herself, made an ultimatum of a hundred and twenty thousand crowns, declaring that if this sum was not accepted the negotiations should cease at once. To parry off the stroke, Elizabeth set her two faithful envoys at loggerheads, instructing the one to refuse with energy the proffered cash, and, if this decided action should have no effect, empowering the other to accept the money and give receipt in full. The consequence of this pretty little diplomatic game was that Sir Thomas Smith very nearly cut the throat of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and that, after drawing their daggers, and exchanging very ugly compliments, such as "liar," "knave," and worse terms, they shook hands with the French plenipotentiaries, became rosy with smiles, took out their pens, and signed the treaty of Troyes, establishing everlasting peace and friendship between the two realms of England and France, on payment by the latter of a hundred and twenty thousand crowns—cash down.

The peace of Troyes, and the money it brought, put Elizabeth in exceeding good-humour; but still more delightful to her was the simultaneous appearance of one old and two new wooers for her hand. This was a movement entirely due to Cecil, who had become acquainted with the secret negotiations that had taken place between the court of Spain and Mary Stuart, and, dreading the effects of it, felt more than ever anxious to get a husband for Elizabeth, as the sole means of stemming the perils of succession, and the possible advent of a new reign of despotism and bigotry. The matrimonial candidates whom he succeeded in bringing into the field, were, in the first place, the Archduke Charles of Austria, "the prince with the big head," old wooer of the majesty of England, with whom came forward now, as rivals, Duke Casimir of Bavaria, son of the Elector Palatine, and the young king of France, Charles IX. The candidacy of the last-named was scarcely serious, although brought forward with great zeal, he being not yet fourteen years of age, while Elizabeth was twenty-nine; but there was little to be said against the other two matrimonial aspirants, both of princely rank and suitable age. Duke Casimir, whose family had adopted Protestantism, was nominally the best of the candidates; nevertheless, Cecil would have preferred the Austrian archduke, a good quiet man, fond of smoking his pipe and of leaving things to go their own way, to the son of the Elector Palatine, who was known to be more ambitious than wise, and likely enough to attempt to drag England into the bottomless pit of German politics. As to Elizabeth herself, the chance was nearly alike for all aspirants to her hand, being very slight for either, lord Robert Dudley, the handsome scoundrel, still holding supreme possession of the royal heart—standing, as all could see who had eyes, very much above the position of a mere Platonic lover and master of the horse. At the same moment, when both the Bavarian duke and the Austrian archduke entered the field as matrimonial candidates, Elizabeth, to give a distinguished mark of her favour to Dudley, resolved to raise him to the cardinal of Leicester, accompanying the gift with the grant of the castle of Kenilworth and other large estates. The ceremony of investiture took place on the 29th of September, 1563, with all befitting pomp and splendour, the solemnity of the spectacle being scarcely marred by a slight playfulness on the part of the maiden queen. Her master of the horse having knelt down in front of the throne, the whole of the courtiers, ministers, and foreign ambassadors, standing around in a circle, the queen in her own person condescended to hang the mantle on his shoulders, and to add to the kindness by tickling him just a little on the neck and back. Then, turning round to the French ambassador, baron de Foix, who—accomplished diplomatist—looked as grave as if staring at a funeral, Elizabeth asked, "How do you like my earl of Leicester in his new robes?" "Madam," replied the baron, "happy is the land which has a princess who can discern and reward good service."

The new earl of Leicester, envied by hundreds, and hated by thousands as supposed murderer of his wife, was doomed not to feel altogether easy in his position, his royal mistress having prepared for him a trial at the same time with lifting him to a more exalted rank. The opening of a great game of deceit between the fair sovereigns of England and Scotland had just commenced, and in this game the handsome earl was made to take a prominent part, in utter ignorance of the meaning of the plot. While negotiating through the Spanish ambassador the proposed marriage with Don Carlos, Mary Stuart, the more effectually to blind her dear sister of England, despatched a special envoy to London, offering to accept any husband recommended to her by Elizabeth, in return for being recognized as successor, in default of direct heirs. To this offer Elizabeth responded by designating her own favourite as the most suitable husband for her beloved sister of Scotland, which recommendation was strongly backed by Cecil, who, either ignorant of the real designs of the queen, or in the secret hope that it might lead to the ultimate ruin of the detested master of the horse, did everything that was in his power to make the proposal appear as serious to Mary Stuart. The latter, on hearing the subject mentioned for the first time, broke out in a burst of anger. "What," she addressed the envoy of Elizabeth, "think you it will be honourable in me to imbase my state, and marry one of your mistress's subjects?" But deceit soon got the upper hand in Mary Stuart. Profoundly dissembling as ever, she selected a new ambassador to proceed to her dear sister, with instructions to treat about her marriage, to take secret counsel with the chiefs of the Roman Catholic party, to watch the doings and behaviour of the queen and earl of Leicester, and to keep his eye open with regard to Cecil. The delicate task of carrying out all these operations was intrusted to Sir James Melvil, a skilful diplomatist and high-bred courtier, still under thirty years of age, but with vast experience, gathered in the surroundings of great and petty thrones in Germany and France. To his other accomplishments, Sir James Melvil added that of taking notes of his daily doings, which, left to an inquisitive posterity, have served to illuminate the outer and inner aspect of the court of Queen Elizabeth.

The queen received Mary Stuart's envoy in a most friendly and almost affectionate manner, and the conversation at once went upon the great marriage question. Her majesty told Sir James Melvil, with a confidential air, and looking wonderfully serious, that she "esteemed the Lord Robert as her brother and best friend, whom she would have herself married had she ever minded to have a husband. But, being determined to end her life in virginity, she wished the queen, her sister, might marry him, as meetest of all others with whom she could find in her heart to declare her person; for, being matched with him, it would remove out of her mind all fears and suspicions to be offended by any usurpation before her death, being assured that he was so loving and trusty that lie would never suffer any such thing to be attempted during her time." To this fine speech, the insincerity of which was obvious, Sir James replied by a few well-set compliments, keeping his countenance quite as well as the royal virgin before him. Thereupon Elizabeth grew still more confidential in her communications. "She took me," Sir James noted down, "to her own bedchamber, and opened a little cabinet, wherein were divers little pictures wrapped in paper, and their names written with her own hand upon the papers. Upon the first that she took up was written 'My lord's picture.' I held the candle, and pressed to see the picture so named; she appeared loth to let me see it, yet my importunity prevailed for a sight thereof, and I found it to be the earl of Leicester's picture. I desired that I might have it to carry home to my queen, which she refused, alleging that she had but that one picture of his. I said, your majesty hath here the original—for I perceived him at the farthest end of the chamber." He was evidently the only fool in the comedy, unable to see the drift of the play that was going on, and the trial of his affections which his loving mistress had prepared. However, brainless as he was, the handsome earl bore himself like a courtier, and, looking warily at the trap set before him, took care not to compromise himself by the slightest word or hint of being willing to wed the beautiful queen of the Scots. Elizabeth's keen-eyes probably could detect no change in his countenance while showing her "little cabinet" to Mary Stuart's ambassador; so the portraits were once more carefully wrapped in paper by the hand of the maiden queen, with "My lord's picture" at the top of all.

Sir James Melvil remained for many months at the court of Elizabeth; and being polished to perfection, full of pleasant talk, a good intriguer, and with keen insight into the character of the wonderful woman before whom he was playing his part, he soon became a great favourite, and had occasion to see a number of curious things. On one occasion the queen insisted upon getting his opinion on the delicate subject of her personal appearance. "She had," Sir James registered in his pocket book, "many clothes of every sort, which every day she changed, wearing one day the English, another the French, and another the Italian weed, and so forth." The happy abundance of things in which ladies delight brought on a question. "She asked me which of the dresses became her best. I answered, in my judgment, the Italian dress; which answer I found pleased her well, for she delighted to show her golden-coloured hair, wearing a caul and bonnet as they do in Italy." Here Sir James marked in parenthesis, "Her hair was rather reddish than yellow, and curled, in appearance, naturally." But now came a more ticklish question. "She desired to know of me what colour of hair was reputed best, and which of them two was the fairest," that is, whether she, Queen Elizabeth of England, or her dear sister, Queen Mary of Scotland. The accomplished courtier felt the ground slipping under his feet, and replied, evasively, that the fairness of both was very remarkable. However, Sir James was not to escape thus easily. "She was earnest with me to declare which of them I judged fairest." The courtier went off again at a tangent. "I said she was the fairest lady in England, and Queen Mary the fairest in Scotland." This was anything but satisfactory. Sir James found himself in good grasp; "she appeared earnest," he remarked to himself. The maiden queen making a fresh onset, "I answered, they were both the fairest ladies in their countries, that her majesty was whiter, but my queen was very lovely. Then she inquired which of them was of highest stature; I said my queen. Then, saith she, she is too high, for I myself am neither too high nor too low. Then she asked what exercises she used. I answered, that when I received my last despatch, the queen was come from the Highlands hunting; that when her more serious affairs permitted, she was taken up with reading of histories; and that sometimes she recreated herself in playing upon the lute and virginals. She asked if she played well. I said, reasonably, for a queen." The remark was not complimentary, and quite unworthy of clever Sir James; in consequence of which, with much tact, her majesty dropped the conversation.

Curiously enough, regarded in the light of an accident, "that same day, after dinner" Sir James goes on to report, "my lord of Hunsdon [cousin of Elizabeth] drew me up to a quiet gallery that I might hear some music, but he said he durst not avow it, where I might hear the queen play upon the virginals. After I had hearkened awhile, I took by the tapestry that hung before the door of the chamber, and, seeing her back was before the door, I ventured within the chamber, and stood a pretty pace, hearing her play excellently well. But she left off immediately, so soon as she turned about and saw me; she appeared to be surprised to see me, and came forward as if to strike me with her hand, alleging that she used not to play before men, but when she was solitary, to shun melancholy. She asked me how I came there. I answered, that as I was walking with my lord of Hunsdon, when we passed by the chamber door I heard such melody as ravished me, whereby I was drawn in ere I knew how; excusing my fault of homeliness as being brought up in the court of France, where such freedom was allowed, and declaring myself willing to endure what kind of punishment her majesty should be pleased to inflict upon me for so great an offence. Then she sat down low upon a cushion, and I upon my knees by her, but with her own hand she gave me a cushion to lay under my knee, which at first I refused, but she compelled me to take it. She then called for my Lady Stafford out of the next chamber, for we were alone. She inquired whether my queen or she played best. In that I was obliged to give her the praise. She said my French was very good, and asked if I could speak Italian, which she spoke reasonably well. I told her majesty I had no time to learn the language, not having been above two months in Italy. Then she spoke to me in Dutch, which was not good; and would know what kind of books I most delighted in, whether theology, history, or love matters. I said I liked well of all the sorts. Here I took occasion to press earnestly my despatch, to which she said I was sooner weary of her company than he was of mine. And [after this audience upon cushion, on the ground]

I was stayed two days longer, that I might see her majesty dance, as I was afterwards informed; which being over, she inquired of me whether she or my queen danced best. I answered, the lady Mary danced not so high or composedly as she did." Charming Sir James, pink of courtiers, was summing up, perhaps unconsciously, the character of the maiden queen, in saying she danced high and composedly. Queen Mary Stuart, whose dancing throughout life was of the wildish kind, sometimes very high, and at others very low, and never composedly, was sure to be pushed aside, in the end, by such an antagonist.

Queen Mary, however, for once, beat Elizabeth when sending her Sir James Melvil. The clever diplomatist, secured to the interests of the Scottish queen by an annual pension of a thousand marks, or twice the income of the richest nobleman in the northern kingdom, fairly outwitted not only Elizabeth, but Cecil, and, returning to his mistress, was able to tell her that he had negotiated an alliance which would greatly raise her prospects of succession to the English crown. Until the arrival of her ambassador in London, Mary Stuart's hopes of becoming the consort of Don Carlos had remained unabated; but Sir James discovered at once that the whole edifice of her ambitious dreams had fallen to the ground with the death of do Quadra, all ties between King Philip and Scotland having been broken by his final "no puedo mas." But Mary felt, and her sincerest friends repeated it to her daily, that she would have to take a husband to secure her position in Scotland, as well as her prospects in England; and the shadow of Don Carlos having vanished from the scene, the selection of the husband became the great question of the moment. For some time before negotiating the Spanish alliance, and almost since her arrival in Scotland, Mary had kept her eyes, among other admirers, upon a near relative, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, whose descent brought with it claims upon the crowns of the two kingdoms, and whose personal character seemed singularly fitted to reconcile the conflicting interests which opposed the relations of the two queens. Henry Stuart, born 1546, and consequently about four years younger than Mary Stuart, was the son of the earl of Lennox by the lady Margaret Douglas, daughter of King Henry VIII.'s sister Margaret, from her second marriage with the earl of Angus, so that his relationship was that of first cousin to Queen Mary, and second cousin to Queen Elizabeth. Setting aside the will of Henry VIII., which excluded the descendants of Margaret Tudor from the succession, his claim to the English crown, on failure of direct heirs, stood next to that of Mary Stuart, and was even preferred by many who objected to female government, especially as represented by a lady with the antecedents of the Scottish queen. To give her hand to Lord Darnley was consequently good policy on the part of Mary Stuart, as long as her great aim was the English succession, and it became still more so through the connections of his mother, who, a good Roman Catholic, counted numerous friends among this small and powerful party, all willing, more or less, to run high stakes for reintroducing the old religion.

On the other hand, this very position of the young descendant of both Tudors and Stuarts made Elizabeth very distrustful of Darnley, and still more so of his mother, Lady Margaret Lennox, well known as a bold and scheming woman, who made no secret of her intense desire to see her offspring married to the queen of Scots, and, with this object in view, had entered into a correspondence with the latter. The contemplated marriage was strongly opposed by Cecil, and not by any means approved of by Elizabeth; however, Sir James Melvil had no sooner made his appearance at the English court, when a visible change began to take place, if not on the part of the minister, at least on that of the queen. Sir James lost no opportunity, while kneeling on low cushions before her majesty, or walking at her side and admiring her golden hair, her Italian dress, her elegant diction, and the godlike proportions of her form, to sneer at the young Lord Darnley, whom he described as the "long lad," which was pictorially correct, and the brainless fool, which was likewise a close approach to truth. Influenced by these sneers and comments, the ground for which was but too apparent, the maiden queen at last came to consider that perhaps the "long lad" might make a capital husband for her dear sister of Scotland, and that, so far from opposing the match, she ought to encourage it. The inward struggle was not long revealing itself to a man of the experience of Sir James Melvil, who thereupon lost no time in putting himself in secret communication with the Lady Margaret, exhorting her to renewed efforts in bringing about the marriage of her son with the queen of Scotland. She required little incitement, and freely and eagerly offered the whole of her jewels and all the money in her possession to aid in the great object. Intimately acquainted with the usefulness of diamonds, the diplomatist quickly arrived at an agreement with Lady Lennox, promising to get permission, first for her husband the earl, and, subsequently, also for her son Lord Darnley, to go to Edinburgh, and put themselves in personal communication with the queen of the Scots. Lady Lennox was almost despairing of success, for the permission for the much-desired journey to the north had often been asked, and as often been refused; however, Sir James managed matters better than they had ever before been managed, and in the summer of 1564, when Queen Mary's envoy took his farewell audience of Elizabeth, the earl of Lennox received the royal licence, expressed in the kindest terms, to visit the land of his ancestors. To all acquainted with the secret courses of politics and diplomacy, the permission foreshadowed the union of Lord Darnley with Queen Mary Stuart.

The earl of Lennox arrived at Edinburgh on the 23rd of September, 1564, and was received with the greatest marks of affection by the queen. The ostensible object of his journey was to demand the restoration of his family estates, confiscated for treason, which took place at once, to the intense displeasure of the Hamiltons, who had got possession of the greater part of the property. There were many other of the great Scotch nobles who looked with undisguised hatred upon the earl and the portending exaltation of his family, but they had to subdue their feeling, strongly conscious that the vast majority of the nation was intently bent upon seeing the queen married, and that the union with Lord Darnley was more popular than any other that might have been proposed, he being, though Scotch by descent, not personally involved in the bitter political and religious strife of the times, and being reported, moreover, of handsome person, chivalrous character, and, to crown all, extremely liberal in money matters. Among the best friends of Mary, and leading men of the government, the desire that she should take a husband was quite as great, if not greater, than in the ranks of the people. These friends, at the head of whom was James Stuart, the queen's half-brother, now invested with the title of earl of Murray, had strong moral as well as political reasons for looking upon the marriage as an act of necessity, and one that could not possibly be postponed much longer. In the first days of 1563, some twenty months before the arrival of the earl of Lennox, there had come to Edinburgh, in the suite of the count de Moretto, ambassador of the duke of Savoy, a native of Piedmont, David Riccio by name, twenty eight years of age, of handsome face, very fine figure, and with a splendid bass voice. Though possessed of all these distinguished qualities, David Riccio filled no better position than that of valet in the household of the Italian count; but being a man of ambition, he attempted and succeeded in getting into the queen's service, not, indeed, with a higher rank, but with better pay. The now royal valet soon attracted the attention of Mary Stuart by his external advantages, as well as his fine bass voice, and before long she made him her music-master, and, after that, her private secretary. "He succeeded so well in this employment," the Tuscan ambassador reported to his sovereign, Duke Cosmo I., "that the greater part of the affairs of the kingdom passed through his hands. He managed them with so much prudence, and behaved so exceedingly well, that he was very greatly beloved by her majesty." It was the opinion of the earl of Murray and other members of the government, that if the queen could be made to love her Italian private secretary a little less, it would be to the advantage of her Scottish subjects; and they accordingly did all in their power to advance the marriage with Lord Darnley. The necessary preliminaries having been arranged by his father, and some opposition overcome by a liberal distribution of money and other favours, the young candidate for the queen's hand was invited to come to Scotland, and, having received the permission of the English government, he left the court of Elizabeth in January, 1565, and, on the 16th of February following, presented himself before Mary Stuart at Wemyss Castle, in Fifeshire.

Mary received her cousin with the greatest demonstrations of tenderness, leaving no doubt that the "long lad" found immediate favour in her eyes. Well schooled by his shrewd mother, Darnley at once proceeded to worm himself into the affections of all who might have power to advance his marriage with the queen. To please both Protestants and Roman Catholics, he alternately attended at Knox's sermons and at the half secret mass in the queen's private chapel; and, going a step further, he sought an intimacy with David Riccio, to gain through him, who was generally considered in the pay of the pope and the king of Spain, the favour of the great Catholic powers. In the latter object Darnley was successful, inasmuch as King Philip, who had shown considerable displeasure at the news of the projected marriage, declared himself strongly in favour of it as soon as he heard of the "good dispositions" of the matrimonial candidate. But this very success, highly as it was valued by the scheming young suitor, was most unfavourable to his general popularity. The bulk of the Protestants, that is, of the people of Scotland, seemed not disinclined, on Darnley's arrival, to welcome him as their future king, the report being that though his father and mother were Roman Catholics, he himself was attached to the reformed religion and had never exhibited the least inclination to follow the old faith. That this was false, and the suitor to the queen's hand either a disguised Romanist, or a hypocrite with no religion at all, became apparent very soon. His constant intercourse with the leaders of the Papal party, and his growing intimacy with the detested David Riccio, which went so far that the two frequently slept together in one bed, brought on an absolute revulsion of feelings, and from being fairly popular, Darnley became strongly detested before he had been two months in Scotland. John Knox, with accustomed boldness, was the first to give expression to the public voice from the pulpit; and he was followed by the queen's half-brother, chief representative of the political form of Protestantism, who united his voice with the great religious leader in declaring against the marriage of the queen with her cousin. Darnley was both too vain and too weak to appreciate the magnitude of the rising storm. Deeming himself strong in the passion which he had infused in Mary Stuart's sickle and sensitive heart, and which she freely showed in nursing him, during a temporary illness, as if she was already his wife, he soon threw off all restraints, and, in absurd boastfulness, declared himself the open enemy not only of Knox, Murray, and the Scotch Protestant leaders, but of the English government itself. He talked of invading the southern kingdom, and of re-establishing the old religion as of a mere play, repeating to all who would hear it that his adherents in England were far more numerous than those of Queen Elizabeth, and that the king of Spain was going to send an army to his assistance. As in duty bound, the English ambassador at Mary's court, Sir Thomas Randolph, reported the matter to his government, giving his opinion that the "long lad" was a brainless idiot; likewise, however, a dangerous idiot.

Elizabeth trembled at receipt of the news. In allowing Darnley and his father to go to Scotland she had been playing a game, and there were all appearances that the play was going against her. That Mary Stuart should marry a fool was well enough; but that the fool, in his mad career, should stir up the dormant volcano of religious passions, and attempt to sow the seeds of civil strife in her own and the neighbouring kingdom, was more than she had reckoned upon, and far more than she was prepared for. Yet every week the reports from the north became more threatening. In May, Sir Thomas Randolph informed Cecil that the Roman Catholics of Scotland were holding their heads higher every day and that great efforts were being made by them to stir up the north of England, which news was confirmed by despatches from Berwick and other parts of Northumberland, descriptive of general agitation. "The Papists in these parts do rouse themselves," the governor of Berwick wrote to Cecil; "look to yourselves and her majesty's safety." To prepare for defence was the only thing remaining in this emergency, and Cecil lost not a moment's time. His first step was to place Lady Margaret Lennox, who had not gone with her husband and son to Scotland, but remained behind, the centre of all intrigues against the government, in close confinement; his second, to assemble troops in the northern shires, sufficient to stay any sudden raid across the border. But before proceeding to extreme measures in the way of defence, Cecil made a great effort to arrest the queen of Scots in the career of destruction into which she was being led by her senseless passion for a foolish youth, and the horde of priests who had taken possession of him. Thinking that the voice of reason might yet have influence over her, he despatched, at the beginning of May, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, a warm friend of Mary, and well known to her by his long sojourn in France, to the court of Edinburgh, with instructions to use all possible efforts to prevent the marriage with Lord Darnley, and to represent to her the immeasurable evils that must flow therefrom. The ambassador, intensely anxious to render the queen a service greater than he could ever hope to do her again, hurried off to the north, resting not an hour on the road. There was no time to be lost, for, to get the object of her desires without further hindrance, Mary had appointed the 15th of May as the day on which Darnley, preparatory to the marriage, should be created earl of Ross and Albany at Stirling Castle, thus becoming her own subject, and shaking off the English allegiance without the permission of Queen Elizabeth. The ceremony was tantamount to throwing the gauntlet down to the English government, and to put a stop to it, if possible, Throgmorton hastened on to Stirling, although Mary Stuart sent him an express message to remain at Edinburgh till her return. He reached the castle on the morning of the eventful day, but only to see the gates shut in his face. Late in the evening, Elizabeth's special ambassador was admitted to audience, and found the queen bold and triumphant, leaning on the arm of Darnley, and surrounded by a circle of Highland lairds, each with a priest at his back. Mary Stuart had cast the die.

Mary's boldness, unexpected as it was, for the moment threw confusion into the ranks of Elizabeth's advisers. There was a hurried meeting of the privy council on the receipt of Throgmorton's despatches, and the result of many hours' deliberation was an even division. One half the members were in favour of immediate action, insisting that the queen ought to demand the formal extradition of Lennox and Darnley, and declare war if it was refused; while the other half wished to temporize, to substitute diplomacy for action, and to keep on the defensive, awaiting the natural course of events. The latter recommendation was too much after Elizabeth's own inclinations not to be accepted by her; and the fresh instructions to Throgmorton, accordingly, were that he should hold his head high, but measure his words, and, above all, keep in communication with and encourage the Scotch opponents of Mary Stuart's marriage. The latter task was easy enough, inasmuch as the great and powerful religious party in Scotland opposing Mary's union with Darnley was infinitely more earnest in the matter, and more resolved not to succumb, than the English privy council. As soon as the queen's determination to ally herself to the man now standing forward as the open champion of Roman Catholicism became known throughout the country, the general assembly of the church of Scotland met at Edinburgh, and in a series of resolutions proclaimed the strong adherence of the people to the reformed faith, at the same time throwing a challenge to Mary, by requesting her to abstain from celebrating the mass in her private chapel. Against all expectation, Mary replied to this demand, conveyed to her, while staying at Perth, by the earl of Glencairn and five commissioners, in a highly conciliatory manner, protesting solemnly that she had not the least thought of interfering with the religion of her subjects; and, to give a proof of her good will, she publicly attended the next Sunday's sermon in the Presbyterian kirk. This, however, had not the desired effect, it being looked upon as mere hypocrisy, and, instead of conciliating the Protestant leaders, it only put them the more upon their guard. Murray, when summoned to appear at court, absolutely refused, asserting that his life was in danger through the machinations of Darnley and Lennox, who had formed a plot for his assassination. The queen retorted by accusing her half-brother of scheming against her and her intended husband, and of having attempted to kidnap the latter and deliver him up to the English government. Accusations and counter-accusations followed each other, ending by an appeal to arms on both sides, Murray calling upon the Protestants to prepare for defence, and Mary summoning the vassals of the crown to meet her without delay at Edinburgh, ready for a campaign. There seemed no longer a doubt of Scotland being on the eve of civil war. Randolph described the situation, and the working behind the scenes, in a letter to Cecil. "David Riccio," the ambassador wrote, "is he that now worketh all, his chief secretary to the queen and only governor to her good man. The bruits here are wonderful; men's talk very strange; the hatred towards Lord Darnley and his house marvellous great; his pride intolerable; his words not to be borne, but where no man dare speak again. He spareth not also, in token of his manhood, to let blows fly where he knows they will be taken. When men have said all, and thought what they can, they find nothing but that God must send him a short end, or themselves a miserable life."

Mary boldly faced the growing storm around her, the new passion in her breast impelling her to brave all, and, if needed, to risk all. Her call to arms was obeyed by many of the northern lords, adherents of the old religion; and having filled Edinburgh with them and their retainers, having summoned Murray once more to appear before her on pain of being declared a traitor, and having sent a message to the king of Spain imploring his aid against her rebellious subjects, she entered upon the preparation of her nuptials with Darnley. On the evening of Saturday the 28th of July, 1565, a glittering cavalcade issued forth from Holyrood Palace, and parading the streets of the capital by sound of trumpet, three heralds proclaimed to the citizens, who stood in their doors with bated breath, that the queen had decided to take Henry earl of Ross and Albany for her husband, and that it was ordered that thenceforth the said Henry should be called king of Scotland, and his name be associated with her own in all public acts and deeds. The deep tones of the heralds re-echoed in the silent streets, all listeners being taken by surprise that the queen should dare to infringe the first prerogative of the representatives of the nation, and give away a crown without the consent of parliament. Silence, deep and uninterrupted, was the only protest against Mary's proclamation, and the cavalcade was returning to the palace when its passage was greeted by the first living voice. "God save his grace the king!" came forth from the lips of an elderly gentleman. All looked at him with astonishment; it was the earl of Lennox, father of "his grace."

A scene more striking still, and far more important than the heralds' proclamation in the streets of Edinburgh, took place the day after, Sunday the 29th of July, in the royal chapel of Holyrood. Soon after sunrise, as early as five o'clock in the morning, the queen, dressed in a black velvet robe—the same she had worn in mourning for the death of her first husband—presented herself at the altar of the chapel to become the wife of Lord Darnley. The "long lad" looked morose and fitful; Mary Stuart pale, anxious, and careworn; while David Riccio was standing in the background, a sarcastic smile overspreading his handsome features. The marriage ceremony was performed by a Catholic priest, with the usual rites of the church of Rome; but Darnley did not stay out the whole, and, after the nuptial knot had been tied, left his wife at the foot of the altar to hear the mass. Perhaps it was fear of wounding too deeply the feelings of the reformers, or, more likely, anger at the doleful appearance of his newly-wedded bride, which made Darnley leave the chapel thus abruptly and unceremoniously. Mary Stuart had ceased to be the gay beautiful creature who once, at the French court, in the heyday of her charms, delighted all hearts, and turned grey-beards into fervent lovers. According to Randolph, who had known her almost from her childhood, she had greatly changed within the last few years, so as scarcely to be recognized by those who had seen her as young queen of France. Her fair form had become thick and swollen, her brilliant eyes heavy and lustreless, and her delicate features coarse and vulgar, expressive of little else but the storm of low passions. Thus, as she stood at the side of her young husband, in a dress of deep mourning, he probably felt a slight pang of disgust, and went away, leaving her to say her prayers, with floods of tears gushing from her eyes. David Riccio kept standing in the background, his bitter smile turned into a look of wrath.

Mary Stuart's nature was not of the kind to be long a prey to melancholy, real or imagined. The nuptial ceremony over, she threw off her black garments and assumed a gay costume, as if determined to give herself up to pleasure and enjoyment. The wedding-Sunday was spent in great feasting at Holyrood, the earls Athol, Crawford, and Morton serving the queen as carvers and cupbearers, and three other noble earls, Cassillis, Eglinton, and Glencairn performing the same office for Mary's consort; and while the golden cup went round at the royal table, money in abundance was scattered among the mob at the palace gates, eliciting cheers grateful to the ears of the sovereign, who had not heard such sounds for a long time. During the next few weeks, the queen seemed filled with gaiety and happiness, and to all appearance deeply enamoured of her young husband. The English ambassador, whose lynx-eyes were keenly fixed on all the movements of the royal pair, wrote home to his maiden mistress, not without a shade of malice, that the queen of Scots seemed absolutely lost in the intoxication of love for her youthful partner. "All honour that may be attributed to any man," he reported, a week after the wedding, "he hath it wholly and fully. All praise that may be spoken of him, he lacketh not from herself. All dignities that she can endure him with are already given and granted. No man pleaseth her that contenteth not him, and she hath given unto him her whole will, to be ruled and guided as himself best liketh." The intensity of love on the one side was productive, according to the ambassador, of intensity of pride or vanity on the other. "His words," Randolph wrote of the king consort, "be so proud that he seems a monarch of the world, and yet it is not so long we have seen and known him here as the Lord Darnley."

The effect upon Elizabeth of the determined proceeding of Mary Stuart was singular. While the English privy council, influenced by reports from the northern counties, plainly foreshadowing rebellion on the part of the Roman Catholics, was leaning more and more to open declaration of war against the queen of Scotland, and Cecil himself, though valuing the blessings of peace as much as any statesman living, seemed in favour of aggressive measures, Elizabeth showed herself strongly disinclined to adopt any hostile proceedings whatsoever. Instead of breaking all diplomatic relations with the court of Edinburgh, as she had threatened a hundred times by the mouth of her ambassadors, she had no sooner received the news of the actual marriage when she despatched another special envoy to Mary, in the person of Tamworth, a gentleman of the bedchamber, charged with a most friendly message. The Scottish queen not unreasonably attributed this movement to fear, and, instead of responding in the soft and amiable style, assumed a haughty tone, using, as the poor envoy reported to his mistress, "words that bit to the quick." As if actually believing in the silly boast of her husband that he had more adherents in England than Elizabeth, and that he needed but to show himself to upset her throne, Mary went so far as to prescribe conditions of peace to the English government. At his final audience, the gentleman of the bedchamber—sufficiently "bit" at former interviews to be reduced to the valet condition—was informed by Mary that the terms on which alone she was willing to acknowledge the existence of a queen of England, would be her own immediate recognition, by act of parliament, as successor to the throne, and the entail of the English crown, failing direct issue, on Lady Margaret Lennox and her children, "as the persons by the law of God and nature next inheritable." The audacity of the language, warranted scarcely had Mary Stuart been a conqueror at the gates of London, was followed by an open act of defiance. Having received his final message to take back to England, Tamworth made haste to get away, and had a passport delivered to him signed by Darnley as king of Scotland. To this signature he objected, pleading that as yet neither the English government nor the parliament of Scotland had recognized the Lord Darnley as king, and that his instructions went no further than to acknowledge him as the husband of the queen. But the plea remained unnoticed, and, setting out for England without a passport, Tamworth was arrested and carried as prisoner to Hume Castle. It was impossible for Mary Stuart to fling more directly the gauntlet into Elizabeth's face.

But even this insult did not rouse the queen of England, although it roused the Scotch reformers. The chiefs of the latter party, under Murray, had assumed an aggressive attitude from the moment of Darnley's proclamation as king, and assembling as many armed followers as could be gathered around them, declared their intention to uphold the liberties of the people of Scotland with all means in their power, even with the sword. In a manifesto, signed by Murray, the earl of Morton, and others of the Protestant leaders, the nation was called upon to rise in rebellion, as the queen was violating the constitution by imposing upon the realm a king without the consent of parliament. Murray at the same time wrote to the English government for assistance in the coming struggle, and also addressed a letter to the earl of Bedford, Elizabeth's commander in the Border-counties, to "crave his comfort, as of one to whom God had granted to know the subtle devices of Satan against the innocent professors of the Gospel, to stir up the powers of the world against the same." Bedford warmly advocated the cause of the Scottish Protestants, and Randolph was equally zealous in recommending that armed assistance should be given to Murray and his confederates; but though Elizabeth lent a willing ear to both, expressing her entire sympathy with the northern reformers, she did nothing but send them a very little money and a great many promises. Trusting to the latter to some extent, Murray issued a circular to the Lords of the Congregation to assemble at Ayr on the 24th of August, to take council on the situation of the country. But before the day of meeting arrived, the news came that the special envoy of Queen Elizabeth had been forcibly seized and carried off to prison. It seemed impossible to Murray and his friends that, after this event, the English government should any longer hesitate to send an army into Scotland, and full of this belief, they precipitated measures by gathering in haste a force of about a thousand men, and marching with them upon Edinburgh. But Queen Elizabeth had far less, and Queen Mary far more of warlike energy than the reformers calculated upon. Immediately upon hearing of the movement of the Protestant leaders, Mary ordered the bugle to be sounded, declaring her determination to meet her enemies in the open field, to let the God of battles decide between them and her. Five thousand men, all good Catholics, forthwith mustered in front of Holyrood Palace, and on Saturday the 25th of August, four weeks after her wedding-day, Mary assumed their personal command. Before quitting the capital, on the morning of her departure, the queen had a tempestuous interview with Randolph, who demanded the release of Tamworth, which was refused under threats. Then she issued forth at the head of the five thousand, pistols at her saddlebow, and pistols in her hand. At Mary's left hand rode King Darnley, fitted out in magnificent gilt armour, but looking rather uncomfortable, as if greatly inclined to stop at home. He had begun to discover, the poor "long lad," that he was destined to be the wife and Mary the husband—a dangerous husband, with far too many pistols.

The grand expedition did not come to anything after all, lapsing into what the people called a "Round-about-raid." The queen out-manœuvred the Protestants, and the Protestants out-manœuvred the queen; and at the end of a week, Mary found herself at the head-quarters of Murray, near the mouth of the Clyde, while Murray and his friends marched into Edinburgh. The change of position seemed favourable at first sight to the reformers, but was not so in reality. While the cannon from Holyrood's battlements fired down upon their heads, the citizens of the capital, protestant to a man, but more inclined to think of their chattels than their religion, refused to make common cause with them, and it became clear in a few days, the piteous wailings of the owners of shop property getting stronger and stronger, that Edinburgh could not be held. With a heavy heart, the Lords of the Congregation resolved to retreat to Berwick, hoping to the last that assistance might come across the Border. Mary in the meanwhile swept onward in furious mood, utterly exasperated to have missed her enemies. It was not only political but personal revenge which was to be gratified in this campaign, the queen having conceived a mortal hatred against Murray, and making no secret of her intention to kill her half-brother whenever and wherever she could meet him. The causes of this fierce animosity of Mary Stuart against a man on whom she had hung for years with the deepest affection were somewhat mysterious, and were even in Randolph's despatches to the English government—usually very clear and concise—more alluded to than explained. 'The hatred conceived against my lord of Murray,' the ambassador reported to Cecil, "is neither for his religion, nor yet for that she now speaketh—that he would take the crown from her, as she said lately to myself—but that he knoweth some secret fact, not to be named for reverence sake, that standeth not with her honour, which he so much detesteth, being her brother, that neither can he show himself as he hath done, nor she think of him but as one whom she mortally hateth. Here is the mischief, this is the grief, and how this may be solved and repaired passeth man's wit to consider. This affection, for all that, he hath to his sovereign, that I am sure there are very few that know his grief; and to have this obloquy and reproach of her removed, I believe he would quit his country for all the days of his life." The allusions of Randolph pointed to the intimacy of Mary Stuart with Riccio, of which Murray probably knew too much. It was publicly asserted that the queen's brother on one occasion had threatened to hang the man with the fine bass voice—a fact which a woman of Mary's temper was not likely either to forget or forgive, and which went far to explain the mighty array of pistols with which she issued from Holyrood Palace.

However, she returned to Holyrood from the "Round-about-raid" without having shot anybody. In the midst of all her frenzied courage, Mary could not help feeling that her power was standing on very insecure basis, that the hearts of the vast majority of her subjects were alienated from her, and that she herself was surrounded by persons whom she was barely able to trust. Her husband she could not help despising, as soon as the first gush of passion had evaporated, and of the other friends around her, David Riccio was the only one she absolutely confided in. It was he who now directed all her counsels, and gradually assumed the government of the realm in her name. But with the inborn genius of his race, Riccio trusted more to intrigue and diplomacy than fighting and warfare, and his constant advice to his mistress was to connect herself more and more intimately with the pope and the king of Spain, and to obtain from them that assistance which she could never hope to find in her own country. Acting upon this counsel, Mary, returned from her fruitless expedition to the banks of the Clyde, placed herself in fresh communication with her great continental protectors, by despatching envoys to Rome and Madrid. At the latter important post she accredited as plenipotentiary an Englishman named Yaxlee, a vain and boastful adventurer, formerly in the service of Lady Lennox, and the consequence of this choice was that Queen Elizabeth got her secret despatches many days earlier than King Philip, to whom they were addressed. With another adversary than Elizabeth, this kind of diplomacy might have ended fatally; but as it was it turned rather to the advantage of the reckless Scottish queen. Reading the notes to the Spanish court, which left no doubt of the existence of a secret pact between Philip and Mary, and of the fact that Philip had at least promised an army for invading England and restoring the ancient faith, Elizabeth became more ir resolute than ever, and more than ever opposed to commence the dangerous game of arms. Either ignorant of, or overlooking the circumstance that King Philip was fully as liberal in making promises, and fully as niggardly in carrying them out as she herself, Elizabeth began to think that the only way of successfully opposing her sister of Scotland would be to enter publicly the lists with her in the battle for King Philip's love. This great feminine scheme the queen proceeded to carry out at once, Cecil's opposition notwithstanding, to the intense surprise of her subjects.

After the death of de Quadra, Philip had felt half inclined not to appoint another ambassador at the English court, seeing the growing hostility of Cecil's policy; however, the peace of Troyes, and the improved relations between Elizabeth and Catherine de Medici, changed his views, and in the summer of 1564 he despatched a fresh representative in the person of Don Diego Guzman de Silva, a Castilian gentleman of good birth, less experienced than de Quadra in the arts of intrigue, but of more outward polish than his predecessor. Elizabeth received Don Diego with marked distinction, giving balls and other entertainments in his honour, and telling him with emphasis, and in the most elegant Latin, that her court would be desolate without the presence of an ambassador of his Spanish majesty. However, after this very cordial reception, Don Diego was somewhat neglected, owing to his palpable want of skill in spinning diplomatic webs. Conspiring with Dudley to overthrow Cecil, the latter made him feel that he was not clever enough for the task, by giving out sarcastic hints at the contents of his own despatches, and those received in reply from the court of Spain. This proved somewhat humiliating, for Philip's letters were written in a style far more blunt and straightforward than was becoming to so great a king. "So long as Cecil remains in power," his majesty wrote under date of the 6th of August, 1564, "you must be careful what you do; but if means should offer themselves to overthrow him, every consideration should move you not to neglect the opportunity." And further on, "I avail myself the occasion to tell you my opinion of that C. I am in the highest degree dissatisfied with him. He is a confirmed heretic; and if with Lord Robert's assistance you can so inflame the queen's mind as to crush him down, and deprive him of all further share in the government, I shall be delighted. But if you try and fail, be careful that your hand is not seen in the matter." This was too direct, and Elizabeth liked it no more than Cecil. With all her womanly weaknesses, her suspicious character, her absurd personal vanity, and her constant inclination to act upon impulse rather than reason, Elizabeth felt that Cecil was indispensable to her, and that without him she could never hope to steer the vessel of state through all the shoals and quicksands that beset its course. Philip's intrigues, therefore, were anything but pleasing to the queen, and the sharp eye of Don Diego could not fail to mark the royal displeasure.

Mary Stuart's union with Darnley, and subsequent intrigues to get foreign help, entirely altered the position of Philip's ambassador. Having once resolved upon pleasing the king of Spain, Elizabeth did not stop half way, but at once offered her own person in exchange for the good-will of his majesty. Six years before, in the summer of 1559, when marriage negotiations were very brisk, Philip had expressed great approbation of her contemplated union with the Archduke Charles of Austria, his cousin, and Elizabeth now sent for Don Diego, and pointedly asked him, in presence of the whole court, whether he thought the king was still wishing to see her the wife of his near relative. The honest Castilian gentleman needed no special instructions to inform the queen that his master would look with the greatest pleasure upon such an alliance with a member of his family; to which Elizabeth replied, in her turn, that although she could not bind herself to marry a man whom she had never seen, yet that if the archduke would come to England, and they both liked each other, she should not refuse her hand. All this seemed very precise and beyond cavil, and the Spanish envoy was deceived to the extent of actually believing what the royal lips had told him. "The queen," Don Diego forthwith reported to Philip, "has taken alarm at the divisions among her subjects. A great many of them, she is well aware, are in favour of Lord Darnley and Mary Stuart, and several of the most powerful noblemen in England have long withdrawn from the court, and are looking to this alliance for the union of the two crowns. The queen has now come to a resolution about the Archduke Charles. She understands fully that a marriage with him is the sole means left to her of preserving her alliance with your majesty, of resisting her enemies, and of preventing a rebellion." Too grave a Spaniard to see the joke of the maiden queen, with the earl of Leicester at her side, Don Diego heartily recommended the scheme of the marriage, and his counsels had so much weight with Philip that negotiations in due form were entered upon. Fortunately for Elizabeth, as preventing the bubble to burst too soon, Archduke Charles felt disinclined to undertake the long journey to London, including the detested passage across the Channel. Hard as King Philip tried, he was unable to inspire the "man with the big head" with sufficient enthusiasm for the union with a great queen to induce him to give up, or even interrupt, his peaceable life at Vienna, where he was smoking his pipe in peace. The thought that the great queen, when once she had him in her grasp, might stop his tobacco, was quite enough to keep the archduke at home.

Elizabeth felt somewhat nettled at the indifference of Philip's big-headed cousin. She had not the least idea to marry him under any circumstances, but she would have liked to receive his homage and admiration, and to add him in permanence to the train of illustrious suitors. To dress to perfection, to sing well, to talk seven languages, and to "dance high," for the mere gratification of courtiers and stray ambassadors, was naturally unsatisfactory, leaving a void not to be filled by imagination. As a royal maiden now waxing upon thirty-three, Elizabeth keenly felt the necessity of royal suitors, and to stir up the heartless apathy of the Austrian archduke, she threw herself with zeal into another game of flirting. The queen-mother of France had offered her, soon after the conclusion of the peace of Troyes, the hand of her son, King Charles, aged fourteen, which made her laugh at the time, but now brought on serious reflections. Considering that a little courtship with the French boy could do no harm, and might be of good political and moral effect upon King Philip, Elizabeth hinted to the French ambassador that a renewal of former offers would not be unwelcome, and soon after had the gratification of receiving another message from the queen-mother, couched in the most affectionate terms, expressing the intense desire of Catherine that the marriage already proposed should take place. When the ambassador, Paul de Foix, read the despatch to her, Elizabeth professed to be deeply affected. No greater honour, she said, could have been presented to her than the proposal of such an alliance, and the only obstacle in her own mind to it was that she was not sufficiently worthy of it, and, perhaps, also a little too old. She wished, the queen remarked—and here her words bore the accent of truth—that she was ten years younger. Baron de Foix, as in duty bound, made opposition to the complaints about age; and, breaking forth in a charming dissertation about the exceeding youthfulness of her majesty, wound up by stating his firm belief that it would be impossible to think of a more suitable marriage than that of the young king of France with the young queen of England. Elizabeth blushed with delight, and told Paul de Foix that every fibre of her heart had been touched by his eloquence. Then, dismissing the ambassador in the most gracious manner, her majesty informed him that she would take the advice of her privy council. The baron, an old courtier, and who played his parts exceedingly well, thought the queen an inimitable actress.

The negotiations about the French marriage were carried on for more than a year, with imperturbable gravity on both sides. Messengers kept flying to and fro the Channel with despatches and love-letters, and the whole time of half-a-dozen ordinary and special envoys was taken up with discussing matrimony. The part of the royal maiden of England was to make objections, and that of the queen-mother of France to answer them. The latter was done very beautifully, and the descriptions of it by her Paris ambassador,

Sir Thomas Smith, furnished no slight gratification to Elizabeth. One report, given with graphic minuteness, of a long interview with Catherine de Medici and her royal son, was particularly interesting. "The queen-mother," Sir Thomas Smith wrote, in a letter directly addressed to Elizabeth, "told me that she was married when King Henry had but fifteen years and she fourteen; and that Mr. Secretary Cecil had a child at fourteen years of age, as her ambassador had written to her. Then, said she, 'You see my son, he is not small nor little of growth.' With that the king stood upright. 'Why,' said she, 'you would show yourself bigger than you be,' and laughed. 'But what, think you, will be the end, Mr. ambassador,' said she; 'I pray you tell me your opinion frankly.' 'By my troth, madame,' quoth I, 'to say what I think, I believe rather it will take effect than not; and yet in my letters I see nothing but deliberation and irresolution, and request of delay to consult. But methinks it groweth fast together and cometh on hotter than I did imagine it would have done; and that maketh me judge rather that at the last it will take effect than otherwise. But methinks on your part and the king's you make too much haste. If the king had three or four more years, and had seen the queen's majesty, and was taken in love with her, then I would not marvel at his taste.' 'Why,' said the king, 'I do love her indeed.' 'Sir,' quoth I, 'your age doth not yet bear that you should perfectly know what love meaneth, but you shall shortly understand it, for there is no young man, prince nor other, but he doth pass by it. With that the king blushed." All this trifling and gossip was after Elizabeth's own heart, not the less so on account of the spice of scandal about "Mr. Secretary Cecil" and others with which it was interwoven. It mattered little that in some of his more intimate communications Sir Thomas Smith described the royal youngster now courting the stately queen of England as a pale, sickly, and plain-featured boy, slightly bow-legged, of ungainly manners, and with scarcely any education whatever. Discouraging as was the portrait of the royal hero, the heroine of the diplomatic romance nevertheless enjoyed her flirtation.

* The play in which Elizabeth was engaged, amusing as it was to her and some of the other actors, was strongly disliked by Cecil. He had great fears that all this double-dealing would end in grief, and either increase the animosity of England's foes, or else draw the queen more within their influence. The latter happened before long. In the development of the affectionate intercourse that had sprung up between Elizabeth and the French and Spanish ambassadors, the latter did not lose sight altogether of political affairs; and the opportunity of Murray, with other Lords of the Congregation, having crossed the Border and sought an asylum in England, was seized by them to offer a sharp remonstrance against the aid which the queen was giving to rebels. Anxiously desirous to set herself right with her new friends, Elizabeth had the effrontery to deny that she had ever aided, in word or deed, the Scotch reformers, or even encouraged them indirectly to oppose Mary Stuart and her husband; and to strengthen this assertion, which the ambassadors could not but entirely disbelieve, as they had clear proofs to the contrary, the queen arranged a comedy which was utterly disgraceful to her honour as a sovereign. The earl of Murray, having come to London to take counsel with Cecil and other well-wishers of his party on the affairs of Scotland, Elizabeth summoned him to a private interview, and, under promises and threats, induced him to give a public denial of the fact that she had furnished assistance to him or his friends. Sadly against his own will, the earl was forced to accept the humiliation imposed upon him, which the queen proceeded to execute the following day, with such excitement of words and gesture as greatly added to its bitterness. The comedy, with much of the tragic element in it, was enacted on the morning of the 22nd of October, 1565, in the presence of the chief members of the privy council and the foreign ambassadors, for whom the performance was specially intended. Entering the room, the noble earl, accompanied by the abbot of Kilwinning, one of the Hamilton family, went up to the queen and, sinking on one knee, commenced the address concerted beforehand. The address, naturally, was English; but Elizabeth, interrupting the earl, demanded that he should speak French. Murray objected, saying he was "out of practice," on which the queen began a long harangue in French, finishing with, "Are you not branded as rebels to your sovereign? Have you not spurned her summons, and taken up arms against her authority? I command you, on the faith of a gentleman, to declare the truth." The earl, utterly confused by this speech, delivered with great violence, tried to defend himself against the charge of treason, but said he would allow that her majesty had not encouraged him to take up arms. Thereupon Elizabeth, afraid that he might speak too much, interrupted him again, crying, "It is well that you have told the truth. Neither did I, nor any one else in my name, ever encourage you in your unnatural rebellion against your sovereign; nor, to be mistress of the world, would I maintain any subject in disobedience to his prince. It might move God to punish me by like trouble in my own realm." After several strong invectives, the queen finally commanded Murray to leave her presence, calling him a traitor, and indicating that he must consider himself a prisoner. The ambassadors could scarcely suppress a smile at this transparent farce, wondering only how a noble earl, with royal blood in his veins, could bear such degradation—as wilful as it was useless for the purpose for which it was intended. As a piece of diplomacy, the painful scene had no effect whatever; and all it did was to stamp Elizabeth's character as a shameless hypocrite.

Had Mary Stuart but possessed a grain of wisdom, or but the slightest perception of her own real duty, she might have profited by the monstrous hypocrisy of Elizabeth to the extent of erasing the errors of the past, and laying the foundation of a new reign of peace. But the queen of Scots showed herself never more blind than at this moment, the turning-point of her whole career. Ignominiously driven from the presence of the English sovereign, the noble leader of the Protestants of Scotland returned to the Border, to brood in shame and indignation over the treatment which he had received, resting not only upon his personal honour, but that of the great cause he represented. His indignation was fully shared by the Lords of the Congregation, and all declared themselves anxious to return to their country, preferring to bear despotism at home rather than perfidiousness abroad. Mary was fully informed of the revulsion of feeling in her favour that was taking place, for from over the Border, and from all parts of Scotland there came humble petitions asking her to extend the hand of mercy, and by pardoning the Protestant leaders, to gain the love and attachment of all her Protestant subjects. The grant of a general pardon was strongly advocated by Sir James Melville, high in Mary's favour, as well as by Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, who, though Elizabeth's envoy, was well known to her as a real friend. But Mary would not listen to the counsel of her friends, dictated though it was by every consideration of good policy. Against it stood the advice of David Riccio, furnished from Rome; and against it, still more, stood the feelings of intense hatred which Mary had conceived against the Lords of the Congregation, and especially towards her brother. To strengthen this insane hatred, and fortify the queen in her resolution to do battle against her subjects rather than give them peace, there came, on Riccio's instigation, a hurried embassy from France, bringing Darnley the order of St. Michael, and informing Mary that a solemn pact had been concluded between the pope and the kings of Spain and of France for the extermination of the Protestant faith. Into this "Holy League" Mary was asked to enter. Her eyes glistered on hearing that the queen-mother of France, while amusing the queen of England with matrimonial offers, had been deeply engaged in conferences with the duke of Alva, representative of the king of Spain, the result of which was the secret pact to outroot heresy from the face of the earth, by any means best suited to accomplish the great object in the shortest possible time. It was to the working of the newly-founded society of the Jesuits that the origin of the pact was due, as well as the essence of its contents, resolving itself in the clear formula that means were sanctified by the end. The duke of Alva, soul of the league, in his conferences with Catherine de Medici, expressed his decided opinion that, for the time being, cunning would lead to greater results than mere force left by itself. In his attempt to suppress Protestantism in the Netherlands he had found the latter unavailing, and he therefore proposed to the queen-mother to assemble the chief leaders of Protestantism in France and Flanders at a conference, under pretence of treating with them, and, when fairly together, to assassinate every one. Catherine de Medici was easily persuaded to fall in with Alva's views, and in the autumn of 1565 set her name to the pact of murder at Bayonne. Mary Stuart followed her example without hesitation, on the demand of the French envoys, declaring herself proud to become a member of the "Holy League."

The rashness of the queen in engaging to steep her hands in murder, and subscribing her name to a great act of villany, which could not fail creating abhorrence among all her subjects, whether Protestants or Catholics, was due partly to her mental condition, which seemed verging towards madness. The short honeymoon of bliss after marriage was followed by a season of unmitigated wretchedness, the mist of love having fallen from her eyes, leaving nothing but disgust behind. Strutting at her side, drinking hard, and swearing hard, assuming kingly airs and giving himself up to the lowest vices, the youth Mary had clung to with such sudden passion soon became hateful to her eyes, and her intercourse with him was marked by daily growing bitterness. Neither the queen's temper nor her education had fitted her to suffer in silence, and to take the consequences of things brought on by herself; but as soon as she got tired of her husband, her passion took a fresh turn, in renewed intimacy, less disguised than ever, with David Riccio. Her dislike, rising to detestation, of Darnley, before long broke out with a sort of fury which the vain youth could not help feeling, obtuse as was his brain. He had been called king before; but, by Mary's express orders, was addressed by her servants only as "my lord;" coins had been struck with "Henricus et Maria" on the face, which were called in, and others issued in their place, his name and portrait left out; and, as a culmination of the insults purposely directed against his vanity, when the French embassy arrived to present him with the order of St. Michael, the queen coolly ordered his name to be enrolled, not as king, nor even as her husband, but as earl of Ross. Soon after, Mary withdrew her company entirely from Darnley, sleeping in a separate room, and spending the greater part of the day, and often part of the night, with David Riccio. It was but natural that rumours of the strangest kind should grow out of this intimacy, which many asserted to be criminal, and which seemed the more extraordinary as the queen was generally known to be pregnant. Darnley was visibly affected by the behaviour of his consort; his entire manner changed; he spoke little, and only with intimate friends; and his former boisterousness got converted into dull gloom. Mary was warned on all sides that a conspiracy was being formed against her, but paid no heed to it, as if entirely lost to the sense of her own position. In February, 1566, a month after the arrival of the French embassy, the rumoured plot was the talk of the capital; and while the queen was full of thoughts of revenge against heretics, as a new devout member of the Holy League, another sort of revenge was openly prepared, almost in her sight—so openly that the English ambassador sent the report of it to his government. "I know now for certain," Randolph wrote on the 13th of February, "that this queen repenteth her marriage, that she hateth the king and all his kin; I know that he knoweth himself that he hath a partaker in play and game with him; I know that there are practices in hand contrived between the father and the son to come by the crown against her will; I know that if that take effect which is intended, David, with the consent of the king, shall have his throat cut within these ten days. Many things and grievous, and worse are brought to my ears, yea of things intended against the queen's own person."

The event thus predicted took place three weeks after the date of Randolph's letter, in the evening of Saturday, the 9th of March. Mary Stuart this evening had ordered a rich supper to be prepared in a little chamber adjoining her bedroom, intending to spend a few hours in joy and merriment with her favourite. The queen was in high spirits; that very day a meeting of the estates of Scotland, carefully chosen under Riccio's directions, had taken place, to prepare laws for the restoration of the old faith; and that same day Mary herself had gone down to the Edinburgh Tolbooth, and in an eloquent speech had persuaded the peers of the realm to vote an act of attainder against Murray and his associates. Good news, too, had come from Rome, the pontiff promising his active assistance in establishing her on the throne of two kingdoms; to which she replied, in the gushing gratitude of her heart, that "with the help of God and his holiness she would leap over the wall." The future seemed all golden to Mary: already, in imagination, she saw herself at the head of an immense army, entering the gates of the English capital, already she saw the whole host of her enemies in the dust around her; already she saw the greatest of her foes, her brother, whom she hated with the hatred of hell, brought before her in chains, midway between the dungeon, the scaffold, and the grip of the hangman. The queen of Scotland felt intensely happy at her little supper in her little room. She was sitting on a sofa; opposite her, in a soft arm-chair, was David Riccio, and, a little aside, sat the countess of Argylo, a lady reputed to be of easy morals, and a great admirer of the handsome Italian. Merrily went the talk, and merrily ran the wine, when on a sudden heavy steps were heard on the outside, coming from the queen's bedroom. A moment more, and the curtain at the door was uplifted, revealing the form of Darnley. The queen looked at him with surprise, making a gesture as if to order him away; but he walked forward unconcerned, and sat down at her side on the sofa. Mary had not yet recovered from her astonishment when another figure appeared under the crimson curtain at the door. It was the earl of Ruthven, Darnley's uncle, a gaunt, grim figure, in steel armour and helmet, with cheeks pale from recent illness, and eyes glaring like fire. At sight of the terrible apparition, the queen stood bolt upright, and in trembling tone asked the meaning of the intrusion. "Let you man come forth," the earl replied, slowly, pointing to Riccio; "he has been here over long." "What has he done?" Mary cried, terrified: "What has he done? He is here by my will." "Madame," said the earl, slowly as before, and in deep sepulchral voice, "he has offended your honour; he has offended your husband's honour; he has caused your majesty to banish a great part of the nobility that he might be made a lord, and he has been the destroyer of the commonwealth." Then, striding forward, and addressing Darnley with "Take the queen your wife to you," the gaunt earl stretched forth his arm to seize Riccio. Mary shrieked aloud, and started forward to save her lover, who went on his knees behind her, clinging to the fold of her garments, and crying like a child. The shrieks of the queen brought forth a number of servants; but a look from the earl sufficed to keep them at bay. "Lay no hands on me," Ruthven cried, drawing his dagger, "I will not be handled." Then he stamped with his foot, and the crimson curtains opened once more, to let in a throng of armed men, headed by two nobles, Ker of Falconside, and George

Douglas, brother of Ruthven. While the latter thrust the queen into the arms of her husband, Falconside laid hold of Riccio, gripping him by the neck till he shrieked with pain, and let go his hold on Mary's dress. "Do not hurt him! Oh, do not hurt him!" the queen shrieked, faintly; but her words were lost in the tramp of armed men pouring in at the door. "This shall justify him," Falconside cried, drawing a cord from his pocket, and throwing it around the Italian. Again Mary shrieked, and, rushing forward with the strength of despair, upset the table before her and the lamp on it, leaving the chamber in utter darkness. Louder still grew the tramp of heavy feet, and the ringing of armour, but high above it sounded Riccio's voice, as he was dragged away from his mistress and into her bedroom. "Madame, madame, save me! save me! Spare my life!" he cried, fainter and fainter. Then, on a sudden, all was still.

Mary Stuart did not faint away on seeing the man dear to her as her own life murdered before her eyes. Hers was a soul above fainting—a soul in which the mighty passions of love and of hate were struggling together in one everlasting battle. Riccio gone, and she thought of nothing but revenge—of revenge deep as hell, and frightful as the gloom of despair in her own heart. Darnley kept beside her, as well as Ruthven, and with gigantic power of dissimulation she mastered her feelings so far as to appear calm and collected. At a glance she perceived how things stood; how her imbecile husband was pushed forward by others; and how the dark deed accomplished before her eyes could be nothing but the prelude to further and greater deeds. That she would not be allowed her liberty to punish the murderers was clear without reflection, and the only doubt was what they meant to do with her. To discover this, and escape, if possible, from the meshes of her foes, was the one great immediate object, and to accomplish it Mary determined to flatter the knave to whom she was wedded, although feeling as if she could tear him to pieces. She begged Ruthven to leave her alone with her husband; but the earl, who saw through her object, and who fully knew the craven nature of Darnley, refused to do so. All that she could obtain at last was to be allowed to go to rest; and midnight drawing near, the gaunt earl locked the queen's bedroom, leaving her alone with her boundless grief. Early next morning, Darnley, overcoming the scruples of his uncle, was allowed to visit Mary, and was received by her with the most affectionate caresses. Flattering his inordinate vanity, and exhausting herself in promises of honours to come, she was not long in gaining entire control over the weak minded youth. He then revealed to her the whole plot in which he and his friends were engaged, telling no more lies than sufficient to redeem his own character. Mary Stuart learnt with astonishment and horror that the murder of Riccio was but the prelude of more important events, tending to nothing less than the restoration of Murray to power, and the reascendancy of the great Protestant party. She learnt that the conspiracy of which her lover had been the first victim had been slowly formed, almost before her own eyes, that a solemn agreement had been signed and sworn to by the earls of Murray, Morton, Argyll, and other lords of the Congregation, as well as by her husband and the members of his family, "to establish religion as it was at the queen's home-coming;" and that while Murray and the other banished lords had been gained over by the stipulation of being secured in all their possessions, and reinstalled in their former offices, Darnley had been placed at the head of the plot by one of the fundamental conditions of the bargain, by which all undertook "to be liege subjects to Prince Henry, to take part with him in all his lawful actions, causes, and quarrels, to be friends to his friends, and enemies to his enemies." Mary's caresses redoubled when she found how easily she might uncoil the formidable plot. The puppet-king, "Prince Henry," was lying in her arms simpering his woes, telling lies, and accusing his friends. It was with wild exultation she felt how she might use this puppet-king; how she might put him forward, and fondle and caress him—and then crush him under her feet.

Leaving the chamber of his wife, Darnley sought his co-conspirators. He told them the queen had fallen very ill, and it was absolutely necessary that she should have the company of some of her ladies, and also that a midwife should be called, a miscarriage having become likely in consequence of the excitement of the previous night. Ruthven looked with suspicion upon these proposals, knowing the wonderful power of dissimulation of the august lady whom he had caged, and having not much confidence in her husband, his nephew. However, he as well as Douglas and the other conspirators did not wish to be harsh; and considering that the palace and castle of Holyrood was occupied by their retainers, and that the overwhelming majority of the citizens of the capital was in their favour, they resolved to conform to Mary's wishes, and allow the ladies of the court access to her. They had no sooner made their bow in the royal chamber, when they received instructions to act as spies and secret messengers, to put themselves in communication with the queen's friends, and to report on the condition of her enemies. The dusk of evening—Sunday evening the 10th of March—had set in by this time, and the queen was still busy with her ladies, when there was a loud knocking at the outer palace-gates, and a long file of horsemen were seen galloping forward in furious speed from the Dunbar road. Mary's heart beat high; it seemed as if the hour of deliverance was nearer than expected, the faithful county of Haddington being the first to show its zeal for royalty and religion. Louder grew the knocking; great crowds came hastening from all sides to meet the dusty horsemen on the road, and the queen, leaning out of the window, doubted no longer that they were friends. But, all on a sudden, the gate flew open, and in rode the earl of Murray. The brother whom she hated more than any living man, whom she would have gladly killed under thousand tortures, stood before Mary Stuart. There he stood, in the courtyard of Holyrood, proud and erect, with the mien of a conqueror: he a conqueror, and she a prisoner.

Mary gasped for breath, leaning heavily against the window. One other look, fierce, snake-like, she darted at Murray, and then recovered self-possession. Turning round, she ordered a servant to invite the earl, her dear brother, to visit her in her solitude and cheer her with his counsel. In another minute Murray was in the queen's chamber, Ruthven and the other conspirators trying vainly to keep him back. "Oh, my beloved brother," Mary cried, throwing herself on Murray's neck, a flood of tears streaming down her pale face, and her lips trembling convulsively; "Oh my beloved brother, if you had been here I should not have undergone the sufferings I went through, not have had the humiliation I met with." The earl felt deeply touched; he knew that but the day before the sister now appealing to his love had shown her hatred by enforcing, through personal demand, his attainder, wildly anxious to send him to the block; he knew that she had planned his destruction a hundred times before: but he forgot and forgave it all in the spectacle of grief now before his eyes. Murray really believed that suffering had chastened, if only momentarily, the heart of the queen; and in the fulness of his generosity he promised to become her friend and protector once more. The earl was as good as his word. The next day a long conference was held among the allied nobles to decide on what should be done next; a few, most intimate with the character of Mary Stuart, insisted that she should be kept in perpetual imprisonment; others that she should be tried before a committee of the estates of the realm; others again, that she should be held in honourable confinement in Stirling Castle until she had approved the new government, and given secure guarantees never more to interfere with the constitutional liberties of the realm and the free exercise of the reformed religion. While the debate was going on, Darnley entered the room, fresh from the embraces of his wife. He told his friends that the queen had consented, on his entreaty, to issue a full and complete amnesty, to establish a new government, with the earl of Murray at the head, and to submit for the future entirely to the counsel of his party. The majority of the conspirators looked dubious at this sudden conversion; but though they did not trust Darnley, they were far from deeming him an absolute traitor and villain. Murray warmly pleaded the part of his sister; and after some further conversation, in which the earl reminded his friends that Darnley was compelled, by his oath and signature of the common bond, to stand and fall with them, it was resolved to accept the queen's offer, given in writing. The agreement was to be drawn up at another conference the same day, and Darnley solemnly promised to get it signed by his royal consort early the next morning. In the meanwhile he pleaded that the guards be withdrawn from her door, to spare the queen the ignominy of being any longer considered a prisoner. Even this was consented to, with some opposition, Ruthven keeping his eyes fixed upon Mary's husband, as if to read his soul. Quitting the room, the voice of the grim earl rang in his ears: "Whatever bloodshed follows be on your head."

Darnley trembled at the voice, and hurried away as if driven by furies. Instead of returning to the queen's room, in accordance with a promise given to Mary, he fled in another direction, and privately sent a message to her that all was going on well. Late at night, he mustered courage to tread the small staircase leading from his own bedroom on the basement of the palace, to the queen's chamber on the first floor. Softly he crept, followed by three gentlemen, very young, but devoted friends of the royal cause, Sir Arthur Erskine, Anthony Standon, and Stuart of Traquair. To stir the blood of the youths coming before her in the dead of night, by a passionate appeal to their loyalty, was easy work for Mary; and they all promised on their knees to save her, or to perish in the attempt. Then they went back as quietly as they had come, to make preparations for the flight. At the sound of the midnight bell, when all was silent, Darnley having visited his friends, still sitting in conclave, a last time to lull suspicion, the queen wrapped herself in a large mantle, and cautiously made her way down the narrow staircase to her husband's room, where he was waiting for her. So far escape was easy, but now began the difficulty. The guards set by the conspirators had been withdrawn from all entrances to the royal apartments; but the outer gates of the palace were watched more narrowly than ever, Ruthven having given strict orders to let not a soul pass in or out without a passport, and the closest personal examination. But the queen knew one outlet not dreamt of by the most watchful of her enemies. Close to the palace stood the half-ruined abbey of Holyrood, place of sepulture of many monarchs; and an old servant had told Mary that there was a secret passage connecting the residence of Scotland's living sovereigns with the tomb of the dead kings. The passage was discovered after some search: it was narrow, damp, and with a stream of foul, mephitic air issuing from it. But Mary hesitated not a moment. A servant leading the way, and Darnley following, she crawled along the horrible vault, amidst broken coffins, bones, and skulls, with skeletons rustling close to her ear in the thick midnight air. The road through the grave seemed never ending, and Mary began to feel faint when emerging at last from the charnel-house into the old abbey, lightened up by the full moon. At the gate stood Erskine, Standon, and Stuart of Traquair, with neighing horses stamping the ground. In a second Mary was in the saddle, taking her seat behind Sir Arthur Erskine, on the same steed. Away they went, with the swiftness of the wind, the feet of the noble coursers scarcely touching the ground. Past Arthur's Seat, spectral-looking in the yellow light of the moon; across the Esk, and the battle-field of Musselburgh; past Seton and Prestonpans, with the shining sea to the left: onward the riders spurred, faster and faster, till, at the end of two hours, the foaming horses drew breath under the castle-walls of Dunbar. "Who is there?" the warder shouted from the tower. "The queen," Sir Arthur's voice sounded through the night. Down came the heavy drawbridge; the chains clanked; the iron gate swung on its hinges, and Mary Stuart and her five companions rode into Dunbar Castle.

The night-ride from Holyrood to Dunbar restored the shattered fortunes of Scotland's queen. Even the greatest enemies of the sovereign could not help admiring the invincible courage of the woman. Mary, on her part, lost no time to heighten this feeling in her favour. She sent out proclamations in all directions, complaining of the treatment she had received, accusing her enemies, dwelling upon the bright future arising from her maternal prospects, and summoning all her faithful subjects to arms, to protect her and the unborn hope of two kingdoms in her womb. The call was obeyed with enthusiasm. In less than five days, a hundred nobles and their retainers, Protestants as well as Catholics, had hurried up to Dunbar, and before a week was over Mary found herself at the head of an army of eight thousand men. Without losing further time, she at once unfurled the royal standard to lead her troops to Edinburgh. There was no danger on the route, for dismay had seized the confederate culls as soon as they discovered that they had been betrayed by their nominal chief; and, finding the current of popularity suddenly turn against them, nothing remained but flight across the Border, or humble submission to the queen. Ruthven, Morton, Falconside, and two or three others, chose the former course, aware that their active participation in the murder of Riccio would for ever make reconciliation impossible; the rest, including Glencairn, Rothes, and Argyle, sent in their submission, having previously ascertained that a pardon would be granted to them on giving security for future good behaviour. The earl of Murray alone refused either to fly or to crave pardon, although implored by Ruthven and Morton, as the rest had fallen off, not to endanger himself on their account, but to make his peace if possible. Great was Mary's temptation to satisfy at last her burning hatred, when riding into Edinburgh at the head of her troops, and finding Murray where she had left him a few days before, alone, and abandoned by all his friends. Revenge, gratitude, and calculations of policy, kept struggling in her breast for a moment, till both the queen's and the woman's weakness united in pointing to the right path. To kill a brother, a powerful noble, a week after having called him her deliverer, and smothering him under kisses, was above what Mary Stuart was yet prepared for; she therefore ran up to the earl, kissed him once more, and once more called him her dear brother. Towards her husband, Mary showed less ceremony; and before even they returned to Edinburgh Darnley had to find that she hated him more heartily than ever, although to save her he had become a traitor to his party. The vain, contemptible youth, despised and shunned by all, had to drain the cup of dishonour to the dregs. He was compelled to take his oath, by special order of the queen, who held in her hands the incontestable proofs, under his own signature, of having planned and organized the great conspiracy, that he had never "counselled, commanded, consented to, assisted or approved" the death of Riccio, which confession was published at the market-cross of every town of Scotland. After accomplishing this piece of revenge, and sending to the gallows a dozen miserable wretches, who, in the shape of servants and gatekeepers, had taken part in the Holyrood events, the queen ordered a magnificent burial for her murdered lover. The ceremony was gorgeous; but its very splendour destroyed the halo of romance hanging round the shadow of the poor Italian valet. The finest funeral sermon becoming his memory had been preached already by one of the porters of the royal palace. When Riccio's body—mangled, pierced, and torn, with Darnley's own dagger, taken from its sheath by Douglas, left sticking in the mangled corpse as justification of the deed—had been carried downstairs from the queen's bedchamber, and thrown into a lumber-room, like a dog's carcase, the porter at the door came in to have a last look at her majesty's favourite. Then, having stuffed Riccio's corpse into an old box, the man fell moralizing: "Here is his destiny! On this chest was his first bed when he came to the place, and there now he lieth, a very niggard and unknown knave."

The physical courage displayed by Mary Stuart after the Holyrood tragedy, greatly increased the number of her English friends; and her prospects of a heir seemed to add immensely to the chances of the queen becoming the successor of Elizabeth. It was getting beyond doubt that the latter never meant to marry, and kept dillying and toying with the many aspirants to her hand merely as a kind of amusement, with not the least regard for the often-expressed wishes of parliament. Thus it became the gradually-narrowing choice of all looking to the future of the country, either to admit Mary and her heirs to the succession, under such constitutional limits as to insure civil and religious liberty, or to leave everything unsettled and risk a probable war of succession. The inclination to choose the lesser of the two evils, in acknowledging the rights of Mary to the throne of England, was gradually becoming more general, to such an extent as to make itself felt in the actions of Elizabeth. Afraid of facing parliament and of raising another storm of discussion about her marriage and the succession, she postponed its meeting from month to month, until all her supplies were utterly exhausted, while at the same time she strove hard to keep on friendly terms with Mary, submitting even to indignities. These were not wanting from the beginning of the Darnley marriage, and went on increasing when Mary perceived that every successive affront brought on nothing but increased tenderness on the part of her sister of England. The arrest and imprisonment of Tamworth,

Elizabeth's special envoy, not leading to anything else but protestations on the part of the English government, Mary tried a bolder step, by expelling Randolph, the regular ambassador, from the court, and sending him over the Border like a felon, under pretence of being in relation with her enemies. This took place a few days before the murder of Riccio, and appeared for a moment to rouse the ire of Elizabeth almost to the war point. But, true to old habits—not altogether unwise in her position—she waited awhile, and kept watching events before committing herself; and, seeing the quick turn of Mary's fortunes after the flight from Holyrood, she once more presented herself in the guise of affectionate friend. No sooner was the Scottish queen reinstalled in her capital, at the head of a goodly army, when love-notes from the throne of England came pouring in streams. The dim shadow of past troubles was still sufficiently before Mary's eyes to subdue her passions, so as to give a soft reply to the flattering letters, and to express her thankfulness, moreover, by the despatch of a special ambassador to London. For this office the queen selected a person named Thornton, who had long filled the post of her confidential agent at Rome. Thornton took his road by way of Berwick, where he had a long interview with the earl of Bedford. The latter, in a note to Cecil, written the same day, introduced the new ambassador as "a very evil and naughty person, whom I pray you not to believe."

In the interchange of compliments between Elizabeth and Mary, the latter was not long to see her own advantage. Having made the warmest offers of aid and assistance, Elizabeth was asked, in an innocent way, to oblige her sister by surrendering to justice the murderers of Riccio, notably the earls Ruthven and Morton, who had taken refuge in England. The demand came startling upon Elizabeth, putting her for the moment in the greatest perplexity. To help to send Ruthven and Morton to the block was nothing less than to break for ever and hopelessly with the reformers of Scotland, as well as to give deadly offence to their sympathisers in England, while, on the other hand, to refuse the surrender of the earls, clearly criminals in the eyes of the law, was to make all previous expressions of friendship for the queen of Scots appear hollow and treacherous. In order to get out of the difficulty, Elizabeth once more practised double deceit. She promised Mary to have the murderers arrested, while at the same time she sent messengers to the fugitive earls, ordering them to keep out of the way, with a hint that they would find plenty of room in England to live in, but that they must not stay near the Border. The message was useless in the case of Ruthven, who, when Elizabeth despatched her summons, had gone to a land beyond the reach of queens, judges, and hangmen. The grim earl, smitten with incurable disease, had risen from his deathbed to be the arm of the great conspiracy, and, by a supreme effort, compelled the body for a brief hour to obey the mind; but no sooner was the work over, when, like a lion mortally wounded, he sank down to rise no more. His companions-in-arms and his son William made him a lowly grave, near Newcastle, and, praying God to have mercy upon his soul, rode off, not knowing whither. The queen of England was able now to assert, with some show of truth, that she did not know where to find the men whose daggers had struck down David Riccio.

Mary Stuart's anxiety to take revenge on the murderers of her lover was lost for awhile in weightier events. In the second week of June, three months after the midnight ride from Holyrood to Dunbar, the pangs of childbirth came over the queen, setting all eyes to watch the least of her movements. To be quiet, Mary retired into the inner apartments of Edinburgh Castle; and here, on the 19th of June, 1566, she gave birth to a son, called James at the baptismal font—destined thereafter to be the sixth royal James of Scotland, and the first of the United Kingdom of Scotland and England. The birth of the child took place between nine and ten o'clock in the morning; and as soon as its sex had been proclaimed, Sir James Melville, waiting in the ante-chamber, spurred and booted, sprang on his steed, and rode off southward in furious haste. He reached Berwick the same evening; slept, and rushed off again southward, scarcely leaving the saddle till, at the end of three days, he drew breath at the gates of London. It was late in the afternoon of the 22nd of June that the familiar face of Sir James appeared before Cecil, who was not a little startled on learning the great news brought by the dusty traveller. Without losing a minute, Cecil posted down to Greenwich, where the queen had taken up her residence, to enjoy the fine season in merriment and festivities. Elizabeth was dancing after supper, when she was told that Mr. Secretary wished to see her on important business; not wishing to be interrupted in the charming exercise of her limbs, she ordered him to come up and deliver his message quickly. Then Cecil, stepping forward gravely, whispered in her ear, "the Queen Mary has been delivered of a son." Elizabeth started as if struck by invisible hands. Losing all self-control, she sank into a chair, and covering her face, burst out crying, "The Queen of Scots is mother of a fair son, while I am but a barren stock."

A few hours sufficed to chase all traces of the woman in Elizabeth, and bring out the queen and accomplished actress. Early on the morning after his arrival, her majesty received Sir James Melville at a solemn audience, to hear from his lips the great news from the north. Elizabeth was all smiles and cheerfulness, expressing her intense delight at the message; and, in answer to a request of the ambassador to stand godmother to the new-born infant, consented at once "to be a gossip to the queen." A little private conversation followed, in which the astute Scotch diplomatist, "to give her majesty a scare from marriage, and from Charles of Austria," informed Elizabeth that "the queen of Scots had dearly bought her child, being so sore handled that she wished she had never been married." The "scare" was somewhat unnecessary in respect to the big-headed archduke, and the cleverness of Sir James only proved that he had got very little insight into the true nature of Queen Elizabeth. It was partly for this reason that he was not successful either in the management of the most important part of the business which had brought him to London. The news of Mary's delivery might easily have been transmitted by any ordinary duke, baron, or other gold-laced official; but what had driven him into the fatigues of the saddle and top-boots was something very different. Her late successes had made the queen of Scots sanguine, and she hoped that the birth of a heir would sufficiently startle her affectionate English sister to settle the great succession question. However, Elizabeth was not startled for more than an hour or two, and after that became more wary than ever. To all the polite requests of Sir James, and still more polite hints as to what his mistress might do in case her just demands were entirely refused, Elizabeth replied with nothing but compliments and vague promises, devoid of even the shadow of a tangible engagement. At last, the diplomatist was compelled to draw the final arrow from his quiver, in remarking upon the attitude of the English parliament in former sessions, and the probability that the next would bring forth more serious debates on the succession. The thrust came home, for the queen was fully aware that a storm was brewing in the political sky, which, this time, could not be allayed by further parliamentary prorogations. It had been settled that the representatives of the nation should meet at the end of September, the state of the royal exchequer allowing no further delay. Melvil's argument, nevertheless, had no effect upon Elizabeth, who was making her own preparations for getting the necessary supplies. She had decided to make the faithful commons pliant by a progress through the country previous to the meeting of parliament, trusting that her speeches would prove a fair counterpoise against the new temptations of the Scotch baby. Taught early in the school of adversity, of intrigue, and of suffering, Elizabeth all her life long had a profound belief in the power of words over facts.

The queen set out on her progress at the commencement of August. Passing successively through Bedford, Huntingdon, and Northamptonshire, paying a flying visit to Woodstock—prison of her youth—honouring Cecil by accepting his hospitality at Stamford, eliciting immense enthusiasm at Oxford by speaking pure Greek, and delighting the farmers of Berks and Bucks by talking very broad English, Elizabeth spent seven weeks in gathering popularity, and came back to London just in time to open parliament, well satisfied with the results of her journey. The lords and commons assembled on the 30th of September, and the effect of the queen's progress was so far visible on their deliberations that for more than a fortnight nothing was heard of but compliments to her majesty. Then, however, came a sudden explosion of pent-up feelings. Cecil, thinking the time admirable for passing his money-bills, brought them forward on the 18th of October; but was met at once by the motion, voted amidst great applause "to revive the suit for the succession," and to consider the supplies afterwards. It was in vain that a member of the privy council, Sir Ambrose Cave, declared formally, as if directed to do so by Elizabeth, that "the queen, by God's special providence, was moved to marry; that she minded for the welfare of the nation to prosecute the same, but that she wished to see the sequel of that before further suit touching the succession." It was not difficult to see that this was but a stratagem for getting the money-bills passed, and then prorogue parliament once more; and the commons persistently refused to postpone the subject uppermost in their minds, urging the upper house to assist in the "suit for the succession." The lords having consented, all public business was suspended for two weeks, in order to prepare an address to the crown, which task was left to a committee of both houses. Elizabeth gave vent to her anger at this step in fierce invectives; and, not content with showering abuse upon parliament in general, sent for the principal members of the committee to deliver to them special lectures, made up of alternate promises and threats. But the committee went on notwithstanding, and the great address having been shaped in ten days' labour, the queen was asked to listen to its delivery. Gladly would she have sent her faithful lords and commons home to their families; but Cecil's argument of there being no money in the exchequer was unanswerable. There were no sermons needed to teach the value of money to the maiden queen.

"By her highness's special commandment," twenty-seven members of the House of Lords, and thirty of the Commons assembled at Whitehall, on the 5th of November, to deliver the address. The paper, read by Sir Nicholas Bacon, was very decided in tone, setting it forth as an absolute necessity that the queen should either marry, or, refusing to do so, prepare at once a settlement of the succession. Elizabeth was told that she might marry "where it should please her, with whom it should please her, and as soon as it should please her;" but that, marriage not decided upon at once, and in all sincerity, it was indispensable to pass a law of succession, "carrying with it such necessity that without it they could not see how the safety of her royal person, or the preservation of her imperial crown and realm, could be or should be sufficiently and certainly provided for." The address wound up by saying that the non-settlement of the succession would be "a dangerous burden before God upon her majesty." Elizabeth was startled at this language, and in great excitement gave vent to a most extraordinary speech. After well abusing the members of the lower house, she cried that "she was not surprised at the commons; they had small experience, and had acted like boys; but that the lords should have gone along with them, she confessed, had filled her with wonder. There were some among them who had placed their swords at her disposal when her sister was on the throne, and had invited her to seize the crown, and she knew but too well that if she allowed a successor to be named, there would be men who would approach him, or her, with the same encouragement to disturb the peace of the realm." Then, turning round upon a couple of unlucky bishops, tenants of the sees of Durham and London, whom she espied among the address-bearers, Elizabeth continued, sharply:—"And you, doctors, you, I understand, make long speeches about this business. One of you dared to say in times past that I and my sister were bastards, and you must needs be interfering in what does not concern you. Go home and amend your own lives, and set an honest example to your families." In conclusion, getting every minute into fiercer wrath, the queen told her hearers, in high treble, that although she had promised in former times to marry, and still meant to do so, she was determined to give no further particulars about her intentions. "Did I so choose," she cried, in half hysterical shrieks, "I might make the impertinence of the whole set of you an excuse to withdraw my promise; yet, for the realm's sake, I am resolved that I will marry. But I will take a husband that will not be to the taste of some of you. I have not married hitherto out of consideration for you, but it shall be done now, and you who have been so urgent with me will find the effects of it to your cost. Think you the prince who will be my consort will feel himself safe with such as you, who thus dare to thwart and cross your natural queen." Here Elizabeth felt fairly overcome by her own indignation; and, conscious that her oratory had reached the culminating point, she suddenly turned on her heels, and, tossing her head, swept out of the hall. Lords and commons looked at each other in blank astonishment, utterly amazed at the marvellous exhibition.

Elizabeth's anger, as always, so on this occasion, soon cooled down. She had learned too much in the school of bitter experience not to know, or at least to divine by a sort of instinct, that the time had come when nations were getting stronger than kings; and she now felt, with tolerable clearness of vision, that she could not afford to quarrel with parliament. Besides she wanted money, which consideration overruled all other considerations. Cecil got orders to make her peace with the representatives of the people, she giving the distinct promise either to marry or to settle the succession before the arrival of another session. As a reason for the postponement of the succession-question, the queen alleged that it was necessary to consult the highest legal authorities respecting the will of Henry VIII. excluding the Scotch title, the validity of which was silently implied. Neither lords nor commons demurred to this argument, thus likewise approving, if only indirectly, the claims of Mary Stuart. Those important matters having been arranged in the course of November, Cecil once more, on the 27th of the month, introduced his money-bills. To show their gratitude for the queen's renewed promise to act according to the wishes of the nation, the members of the lower house made up their minds to outdo themselves in liberality; and her majesty was privately informed that the supplies to be voted would be unusually large. The news was delightful, and Elizabeth resolved to improve the occasion by a fine dramatic attitude. The faithful commons were informed that although the queen might require for the public service all that they were ready to offer, yet that she begged them not to go too far, inasmuch as "she counted her subjects in respect of their hearty good-will her best treasurers." Hackneyed as was the phrase—freely used by kings and queens centuries before Elizabeth—it had a wonderful effect upon the "boys" of the House of Commons, who but a few days before stood out in valiant defence of public rights and the public purse. They forthwith voted, with cheerful alacrity, supplies double in amount to what had been granted in previous parliaments, increasing the national burdens, among others, with an income-tax of seven per cent. for two years. With a little economy, the queen found the money might be made to last for four, or perhaps five, years, during which time she quietly resolved to do without the good commons and their speeches.

While Queen Elizabeth was bravely battling with parliamentary friends and foes, Queen Mary was leading a golden life of idleness and pleasure. Never since she set foot upon the soil of Scotland seemed her prospect fairer than at this moment, when, having broken the head of a powerful conspiracy, and reconquered to a great extent the good-will and sympathy of her subjects, she had been acknowledged, in addition, heir to another crown, loftier far than the diadem of her own realm. Mary Stuart was fully conscious of the proud position to which she had risen; but the only use she made of it was to give the rein once more to her untamed passions, and to hurry on headlong in the career of perdition. She had scarcely risen from her childhood, and scarcely wreaked her vengeance for the murder of her old favourite upon a handful of poor wretches, when she was already deeply engaged with a new lover, far more dangerous than the musical Italian pierced by Darnley's dagger. The new wooer, on whom Mary bestowed her smiles with scarcely any attempt at secrecy, was James Hepburn, fourth earl of Bothwell, thirty years of age, not good-looking, but by far the most audacious, clever, and accomplished villain in all Scotland. He had known the queen in France soon after she had become a widow, had laid his youthful homage at her feet; had been employed by her subsequently in Scotland; had then fled the country, accused of attempting to assassinate the earl of Murray, and had, finally, returned in 1565, by special desire of Mary, been restored to his former rank of lord high admiral, been appointed to the lucrative office of warden of the marches, and received in addition extensive grants of crown lands. Reckless, bold, and unscrupulous, fearing neither God nor man, and altogether the very perfection of human devilry, he was just the man to please Mary Stuart, and David Riccio had no sooner been laid in his last narrow box by the poor porter of Holyrood Palace, when Bothwell openly took the place of the murdered favourite. His progress in favour was such that at the birth of the infant prince he had already assumed the chief management of the queen's household, treating the king-consort as a mere cipher, and transacting state business with the earl of Murray and the new ministers. Towards the end of July, the queen and Bothwell went to the castle of Alloa, on the Forth, and from thence to the Highlands, to make merry in hunting parties and carousals; and on Lord Darnley presuming to follow his royal consort, he was ordered back by the favourite, and mockingly told that he ought not to come without an invitation. Had Darnley possessed but a grain of physical courage or of manly uprightness, he might, not only as claimant of the crown-matrimonial, but as descendant of both Tutors and Stuarts, have rallied friends enough around him to chastise the insolence of Bothwell, and, in driving him once more back to his old haunts in France, raised himself even in Mary's estimation. But the youth whom Melville truly characterized as "the long lad," possessed neither courage nor character; and his past career in Scotland having equally disgusted all parties, the favourite had not the least difficulty in driving him from the court. This was not enough, however, and Bothwell, no less than the queen, soon began to aim at something more. "It is an heart-break for her," wrote Lethington, Mary's secretary of state, to his friend the archbishop of Glasgow, in September, "to think that he should be her husband, and how to be free of him she sees no outlet."

The "outlet" was found at last in a lengthened consultation of Bothwell and his friends. The queen was decided to marry her lover, although he had a wife, as well as she a husband. His tie was easily broken by divorce, and the same had been thought of by Mary; but the idea of it was discarded as a dangerous affair, and likely to lead to the royal infant being declared illegitimate, and all agreed that murder would bring about soonest the proposed end. To accomplish it, Bothwell sought the aid of all the chief party men, not forgetting to avail himself of the assistance of those engaged in the assassination of Riccio. The exiled earl of Morton had many friends at court, who promised that if the queen would extend her pardon to him they would join in the complot against Darnley. Mary readily consented, showing herself more anxious even than her paramour to tread the path of blood which was to lead to a new wedding. The arrangements for Darnley's murder were made with the greatest coolness and deliberation. Bothwell's first plan was to kill the king-consort in a forced duel; and, thinking that Morton might be the best man to execute the work, as one of those whom Darnley had most offended by his treachery, he went to meet the banished earl at the Border, with the royal pardon in his hand. However, Morton showed great unwillingness to commit himself, and even on being told "that it was the queen's mind that Darnley should be taken away," excused himself on the good ground that having "but newly come from one trouble, he felt in no haste to enter into another." Seeing this plan failing, and not meeting with anybody else willing to stab or shoot the queen's husband openly, Bothwell had recourse to poison. This offered some difficulty, for Darnley was on his guard, having been repeatedly warned against the machinations of his enemies, and fully aware that they meant to take his life. Once or twice, to save himself, he made attempts to fly the kingdom; but Mary being undesirous that he should thus escape, as it would prevent her marriage, he had become a voluntary prisoner, living with his father at Glasgow. To entice her husband away from this place of safety, the queen all at once assumed an air of fondness towards him, sending the most affectionate messages, and entreating him to be present at the baptism of the infant prince, fixed to take place at Stirling, on the 15th of December. Darnley consented, though with great reluctance. Notwithstanding all the spite, scorn, and disgrace which his consort had heaped upon him, he felt an affection for her which seemed to increase rather than decay when becoming aware that she sought his death. The snake-eyes kept the bird entranced.

The baptism of the royal infant was of the utmost magnificence. Queen Elizabeth had sent a font of pure gold, massive like armour, in which to dip the heir-apparent of England; while the king and queen-mother of France, richer in compliments than cash, had despatched two special envoys to offer congratulations to any amount. The ceremony took place after sunset, when, under the glare of a hundred torches swung by mail-clad warriors, the countess of Argyll, friend of the murdered Riccio, held the prince over the golden font, while the archbishop of St. Andrews, intimate friend of Bothwell, and reputed to be almost as great a villain, performed the baptismal service. Darnley was not present, the fear of being killed having become stronger than ever, and not without very good reason. Mary once more showed herself exceedingly affectionate, and inducing him to take his meals with her, he all on a sudden felt that he had been poisoned. Helpless like a child, the unhappy youth rushed away from Stirling Castle to his father's house at Glasgow, deeming himself nowhere secure but there. But before he had gone far, eruptions broke out all over his body, and he had to be carried into Glasgow more dead than alive. The queen sent her spies after Darnley, to watch the result of his illness, and, awaiting events, proceeded with her lover to Drummond Castle and Tullibardine, to spend the Christmas holidays together as pleasantly as possible. The pleasure was disturbed by the unexpected news of the king-consort having recovered from his illness, and of feeling strong enough to threaten an exposure of the attempts upon his life. Mary saw that no time was to be lost to carry out her designs. Fiercer than ever, and with passions beyond control, she began to feel contempt for the men who were promising daily to rid her of her husband, for even Bothwell seemed wanting courage. She could wait no longer, and resolved to secure in her own grip the helpless figure standing between her and her lover. Sending Bothwell to Edinburgh, to discard suspicion, the royal tigress went forth in search of her victim.

Never in the world's history was there such a journey as that of Queen Mary Stuart, bent upon murdering her husband. On Thursday, the 23rd of January, she left the Highlands with her lover; they spent the night together at Callendar, after which he rode away to the east, and she to the south. Resting not an hour by the way, she galloped along over thirty miles of road, arriving in Glasgow late at night, and proceeding straight to her husband's house. The poor youth's heart was sinking within him when Thomas Crawford, his trusty servant, announced to him that Queen Mary was at the door. Crawford was a bold man, and opening the door to admit her majesty, made no hesitation to tell her that his master was afraid of her. "There is no remedy against fear," Mary exclaimed, abruptly, to which Crawford replied, looking straight into her eyes, "Ah, madam, I know so far of my master that he desires nothing more than that the secrets of every creature's heart were writ in their faces." The queen winced under the look of the old servant, but pushed by; she knew that her face at least told no secrets. Darnley had suffered from a relapse, and was lying in bed when Mary entered his room. She sat down at the foot of the bed, overwhelming him with caresses, till the fire of old passion arising in his breast, he begged she would be his own again. "Take me back to your arms," he cried, "let me be your husband once more, or may I never rise from this bed." The queen's eyes glistened. Her victim was in her hands. "Say you will be mine again," he continued, more eagerly, not hearing her speak; "Heaven knows I am punished for making my god of you, for having no thought but of you." He attempted to kiss her; but she withdrew in disgust—his breath smelt from the quantities of medicine he had been compelled to take as antidotes to poison. Mary saw that the game was difficult, and not to give rise to fresh suspicions, she resolved to postpone further action for another day. Withdrawing herself from her husband's embrace, she told him that she could not remain with him as she wished, on account of a pain in her side, but would visit him early next morning. Before quitting the room, Darnley, passionate unto madness, swore that if she would be his own again, he would follow her to the ends of the world. Mary gave him a glance which made him tremble, he knew not whether of fear or of love.

Quitting Darnley, the queen went to the lodgings prepared for her reception, her head all on fire. Too excited to go to rest, she sat down to write a long letter to Bothwell, acquainting him with the events of the day. After sneering at the many protestations of love from her husband, and describing the suffering she had undergone from his bad breath, Mary told her lover, "I pretended that I believed what he said: you never saw him better, or heard him speak more humbly. If I did not know his heart was wax, and mine a diamond, whereinto no shot can enter but that which comes from you, I could almost have had pity on him; but fear not, the plan shall hold to the death." Speaking of her husband made Mary think of the fact that her lover also was troubled with a wife. "Remember," she admonished him, "that you suffer not yourself to be won by that false mistress of yours. We are coupled with two bad companions: the devil sunder us, and God knit us together, to be the most faithful couple that ever He united. This is my faith, and I will die in it. I am writing to you while the rest are sleeping, since I cannot sleep as they do and as I would desire, that is, in your arms, my dear love, whom I pray God preserve from all evil." The pious sentiment seemed to bring on a train of feeble compunctions in Mary's breast, while recorded by her pen. "I must go forward with my purpose," she continued, "though it is the office of a traitress. He will not come with me except I promise him that I shall be with him as before, and doing this he will do all I please, and come with me. To make him trust me, I had to fence in some things with him; so when he asked that when he was well we should have both but one bed, I said that if he changed not purpose it should be so. . . . He suspects greatly, and yet he trusts me. He suspects the thing you know, and of his life; but to the last, when I speak two or three kind words, he is happy and out of doubt. . . . It is late. I could write to you for ever, yet now must end. Burn this letter, for it is dangerous, and nothing well said in it."

Bothwell received the letter safely at Edinburgh; but instead of burning it, put it into a silver casket, to keep company to others of the same kind. A man of many resources, he thought the handwriting of a royal lady, promising to be, but not yet, his wife, might possibly be useful at some future time. On former occasions, the earl had found grounds to mistrust Mary, so that, to watch all her movements he had placed one of his mistresses, a Lady Reres, as maid of honour at her side; and although the queen's actions could leave no longer a doubt that she was passionately enamoured of him, yet her very cleverness in proceeding to get rid of a husband furnished reasons for making Bothwell unusually thoughtful. Instead, therefore, of replying to the long letter of Mary in writing, he contented himself to send a verbal message back by the bearer—a Frenchman going by the name of Paris. "Commend me to the queen," the message ran, "and tell her that all will go well. Say that everything is arranged, and that the king's lodgings are ready for him at Kirk-o'-Field." By the time Paris returned to her, the queen had finished the greater part of her work. She had persuaded her husband to allow himself to be taken away from his father's house under her own superintendence, and to be installed in another residence, on the promise that as soon as his health should be finally restored, she would admit him again to his conjugal rights. The residence first named by Mary was Craigmillar; but the receipt of Bothwell's message altered her plans, and she informed her consort that, on consideration, she thought it better to take him to a quiet residence just beyond the walls of Edinburgh. Darnley made no resistance whatever, helpless like an infant under the glance of the snake-eyes bending over his couch. It was only when the eyes were gone that he began to doubt whether he was acting wisely, yet even then felt that he had no power to act for himself. "I have fears enough," he said to Thomas Crawford, who vainly tried to retain him at Glasgow, using all the influence possessed by an old retainer, who had served his father before serving him: "I have fears enough, but may God judge between me and the queen. I have her promise only to trust to; but I have put myself in her hands, and I must go with her though she should cut my throat."

Mary set out from Glasgow with her husband on the 26th of January, he being so weak as scarcely to be able to bear the fatigue of being carried in a litter. Crawford, afraid that fresh poison had been administered already to his master, insisted on accompanying him; but that the queen would not allow, and Darnley echoed but what she said. Slowly, like a funeral, the royal cavalcade went forward on the road, travelling in short stages as far as Linlithgow, where it became necessary to rest for two days. Darnley's reluctance to proceed further was extreme; yet Mary would hear of no delay, and on the evening of the 30th of January she had brought her prisoner to the gates of Edinburgh. Here the earl of Bothwell took charge of the royal train, to the intense consternation of Darnley, whose fears culminated when arrived before the low, miserable dwelling, looking more like a gaol than anything else, which was to serve for his residence. St. Mary-in-the-Fields, or, as commonly called, Kirk-o'-Field, was an old, quadrangular building, closely adjoining the town walls, not far from the Cowgate, which had once been occupied by Dominican monks, but, long deserted and in ruins, had gradually become, with the roofless church in its immediate neighbourhood, the refuge of rats and owls. The "king's lodgings," prepared by Bothwell, consisted of only two habitable rooms, one on the ground-floor, and the other in the story above, which latter had been furnished as a bedchamber for the expected royal occupant. To prevent any opposition on the part of her husband to being carried up to this mean bedroom, which, as if not sufficiently mournful, had been hung with black cloth, Mary told him that she meant to watch at his side till his health was entirely restored, and till then would sleep in the room immediately below his own. She partly kept her promise, visiting the lonely dwelling for several days, in company with the Lady Reres, Bothwell's mistress, and stopping for two or three nights in the room on the ground floor. The last night was that from Saturday the 8th to Sunday the 9th of February. Mary Stuart rose early in the morning; and as soon as she had left the room, a number of workmen, strange-looking, some in masks, took possession of it. Their work had not proceeded far, when the queen came back in great haste: she had forgotten a rich coverlet of fur, and was afraid an "accident" might spoil it.

All the evening of Sunday the 9th of February Mary sat at her husband's bedside, joyful and contented, and cheering him with her smiles. She talked so loud and laughed so merrily as to drown the sound of hammering in the house below, the whispering of many voices, and the shuffling of many feet. While the queen of Scots was talking and laughing, dark figures muffled in long cloaks had come into the bedroom just under her feet, superintending the unloading of packhorses, and the deposit of large bags, the contents of which were thrown on the floor. After a while one of the figures stole upstairs, and after listening a minute or two, entered the room where the queen was sitting at the side of her husband's bed. It was the earl of Bothwell. Bowing to the ground, he announced to her majesty that the time had come to proceed to Holyrood Palace, to be present at a masquerade given to celebrate the marriage of two of the royal servants. Mary frowned, as if unwilling to quit her husband, whose eyes were riveted on hers. Expressing deep regret that she could stay no longer, she told him she would return early in the morning; she kissed him affectionately, she bade him good night, and with a last sweet smile quitted the room. Darnley felt oppressed unto death when being left alone, with no other being near but a page. His long illness had made him reflective; sorrow had commenced to teach him wisdom, and a Bible and Prayer-book had found their way into his room. To seek relief from overwhelming melancholy, he called his page to bring him the Prayer-book, and to open it at the service of the day. It was the 55th Psalm, and Darnley read aloud: "Give ear to my prayer, O God, and hide not thyself from my supplication. Attend unto me, and hear me. I mourn in my complaint and make a noise, because of the voice of the enemy, because of the oppression of the wicked, for they cast iniquity upon me, and in wrath they hate me. My heart is sore pained within me, and the terrors of death are fallen upon me. Tearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and horror hath overwhelmed me." Darnley now began praying, and soon after fell asleep, with the page at the foot of the bed. An hour after, both prince and page were found dead in an orchard, forty yards away from the place where they had gone to rest, their faces upturned to the stars.

The queen of Scotland had been exceedingly merry at the masquerade, after she left her husband. She talked much, and particularly with Bothwell, who, however, disappeared from her side towards midnight. The earl was then seen going to his own room, changing his rich dress of velvet and satin for a soldier's cloak, and quitting the palace by way of the garden, giving the password to the sentinels at the gate. He returned in a couple of hours, when the masque was over, the joy of which had not been disturbed by a loud explosion heard in the direction of Edinburgh. The earl had not been many minutes in his room when one of the royal servants appeared at the door, trembling and terror-stricken. "The king's house," he cried, "is blown up, and I trow the king is slain." Bothwell turned round, shouting "treason," and in a moment rushed down into the courtyard, collected a body of soldiers, and went off with them to Kirk-o'-Field. A great multitude was assembled here, called together by the explosion, all busy in examining the ruins of the house, and marvelling how the bodies of Darnley and his page could got so far away from it, with not the slightest hurt visible about them, yet undressed, and their clothes, clean and unscorched, lying at their side. Bothwell at once dispersed the muttering citizens, and, forbidding any one to approach, ordered the two corpses to be locked up in a neighbouring house. From here Darnley's body was carried away, a few days after, with great privacy, to the vault of Holyrood chapel. Extraordinary silence on the part of the people accompanied all these proceedings. Nothing was talked of throughout the whole of Scotland but the murder of the queen's husband, and every hand pointed to Bothwell as the chief criminal, while none had courage enough to hint that the queen herself had participated in the foul deed. All the preparations of the crime, indeed, had been so clumsily made, and its execution itself been so bold and barfaced, as to leave not the slightest doubt as to the originators, and if any remained, Mary's behaviour was sufficient to settle the matter. While Riccio's death had raised her energy to the highest pitch, venting itself in furious hatred against his assassins, and fierce punishment of their merest tools, the murder of her husband left her very quiet and collected, with not the least perceptible wish to bring the murderers to justice. All that she did to exhibit her grief was to shut herself up in her room; not alone, however, but in company with Bothwell, whom the unanimous voice of the people declared to be the murderer. Shouts were heard, at dead of night, in the streets of Edinburgh and under the very windows of the queen, calling the vengeance of heaven down upon the earl; but with no other effect than that of Mary exhibiting more and more fondness for the man thus heavily accused, refusing all intercourse but his, and making him her sole companion. In less than a fortnight after the tragedy of Kirk-o'-Field, the queen, seemingly weary of her affected mourning, removed to Seton Castle, closely followed by Bothwell, who brought with him the archbishop of St. Andrews. Other distinguished visitors dropped in at the castle a day or two after, among them Huntly, Argyle, and Lethington. The widowed queen and her friends enjoyed themselves greatly, shooting at the butts during the day, and drinking and feasting at night. A small amount of business was also transacted during the festivities at Seton Castle. Huntly, brother-in-law of Bothwell, signed his consent to the divorce of his sister from the noble earl, her majesty's favourite, and the archbishop of St. Andrews promised to conduct the little matter to a satisfactory end and to give all his blessing.

The harmony which reigned at the royal court of Scotland was rudely disturbed, a few days after, by a letter from the earl of Lennox, who had the courage to come forward openly, and to demand that the murderers of his son should be brought to justice. "I am forced by nature and duty," Lennox wrote, under date of the 20th of February, "to beseech your majesty most humbly, for God's cause and the honour of your majesty and this your realm, that your highness would with convenient diligence assemble the whole nobility and estates of your majesty's realm, and they to take such good order for the perfect trial of the matter as I doubt not, but with the grace of Almighty God, His Holy Spirit shall so work upon the hearts of your majesty and all your faithful subjects that the bloody and cruel actors of this deed shall be manifestly known. And although I know I need not put your majesty in remembrance thereof, the matter touching your majesty so near as it does, yet I shall humbly desire your majesty to bear with me in troubling your highness therein, being the father of him that is gone." Her majesty remembered that Lennox was the father of her exploded husband, and wrote him a very kind note in return, telling him that she would look into the affair as soon as her time allowed. But the earl was impatient, and renewed his entreaties on the 26th of February, representing to the queen, with solemn earnestness, that this was not a matter for delay, "but of such weight and importance, which ought rather to be with all expedition and diligence sought out, and be punished to the example of the whole world." Mary again replied evasively, calling upon the earl to mention names, and telling him that "upon your advertisement we shall so proceed to the cognition-taking as may stand with the laws of this realm." Lennox was not quite prepared to come forward personally as accuser, with the certain result of being shot like a dog, and for no other end than that of "cognition-taking;" he therefore hid his grief, and said no more for a time. In the meanwhile, however, greater accusers stood up against Mary Stuart.

"Madam," Queen Elizabeth wrote to Queen Mary, three weeks after the Kirk-o'-Field explosion, "my ears have been so astonished, and my mind so grieved, and my heart so terrified at hearing the horrible sound of the abominable murder of your late husband and my deceased cousin, that I have even now no spirit to write about it; and although my natural feelings constrain me greatly to deplore his death, as he was so near a relation to me, nevertheless, boldly to tell you what I think, I cannot conceal from yourself that I am more full of grief on your account than on his. O madam, I should not perform the part of a faithful cousin or an affectionate friend, if I studied rather to please your ears than to endeavour to preserve your honour; therefore I will not conceal from you what most persons say about the matter, namely, that you will look through your fingers at taking vengeance for this deed, and have no intention to touch those who have done you this kindness, as if the act would not have been perpetrated without your consent, and unless the murderers had received assurance of their impunity." In conclusion, the queen told Mary Stuart that the only way to clear herself would be to bring the chief murderer, pointed at by all the world, to open trial, in which if possible, she might establish her own innocence. Similar advice, expressed in almost stronger terms, was given to Mary by the archbishop of Glasgow, accredited as her ambassador at the court of France. The archbishop informed her very frankly that she was looked upon generally as guilty of the murder of her husband, and conjured her to prove publicly that she had been "greatly and wrongously calumniated to be the motive principal of the whole." A trial, he told her, was an absolute necessity, adding, "rather than it be not actually taken, it appears to me better, in this world, that you had lost life and all." The language was strong enough to prove to Mary that the archery amusements at Seton would have to be temporarily interrupted. After due deliberation, it was agreed upon that Bothwell should take his trial.

The trial took place on the 12th of April, at the Tolbooth of Edinburgh. A week before, on the 5th of April, not quite two months after the murder of her consort, Mary Stuart signed a contract of marriage, by which she bound herself solemnly to espouse Bothwell. To facilitate his trial, the earl, now the queen's betrothed husband, took the whole management of it in his own hands, appointing judges and jury, witnesses and lawyers, and filling besides the capital with his armed adherents. Lennox was invited, as a matter of form, to appear as prosecutor; but when on his road to Edinburgh, surrounded by a large number of friends, he received the queen's command not to enter the city with more than six servants. This he prudently declined, and rode back to Glasgow. On the day of trial, Bothwell went to the Tolbooth in great pomp, surrounded by a magnificent retinue, splendidly dressed, and mounted on the favourite charger of the murdered Darnley. Passing the queen's balcony, Bothwell bent his sword, to which she replied by an affectionate greeting, suffused all over with smiles and blushes. The comedy at the Tolbooth lasted but a very short while, the only interesting incident of the proceedings being the ostentatious entry of a royal servant into court, delivering a token and message to the accused. There were no witnesses, and Bothwell having pleaded not guilty to the indictment, which was framed very vaguely, he was unanimously acquitted of all charges, and rode away, as he had come, at the head of his guards. The day after, he obtained grants of the lordship and castle of Dunbar and other extensive domains from the queen; and the rumour that she was going to marry the man looked upon as her husband's murderer, which had been raised for some time, now became general. It created a feeling of deep indignation, mixed with horror, among all classes, so that Bothwell himself, prepared as he was for every emergency by a powerful band of hired soldiers, some four thousand in number, which he had gathered around him, began to fear a powerful insurrection. To stem the force of the tide, he resorted to a singular proceeding. On the evening of the 19th of April, a week after the mock trial in which he had been acquitted, the earl, fully prepared now to grasp the crown of Scotland, invited a number of his adherents to a tavern at Edinburgh, kept by a man named Ansley. The guests included the earls of Morton, Argyle, Huntly, Cassilis, Glencairn, Caithness, Rothes, and Sutherland, with Lords Boyd, Carlisle, Seton, Hume, Invermeith, Oliphant, Sinclair, and about a dozen other nobles, all of whom sat down to a festive entertainment. After the wine had been freely circulating for an hour, Bothwell arose, and in a short speech told his guests that the queen intended to marry him, and that he held her written warrant authorizing him to propose the matter to the nobility. Mary's warrant having been shown, and its validity admitted, the earl produced a paper written as if coming from his friends, in which he was entreated to become the husband of the queen. The paper, or "bond," not only strongly recommended Bothwell, "this noble and mighty lord," as a suitable consort to her majesty, whose longer widowhood was stated to be injurious to the interests of the commonwealth; but the signers of it engaged to maintain the recommendation with their lives and fortunes, and failing to do so, to pass for men devoid of honour and loyalty, unworthy and infamous traitors. All the noble guests at the Edinburgh tavern affixed their names to this solemn agreement, which was immediately afterwards signed by a number of high ecclesiastical dignitaries, including the archbishops and bishops of St. Andrew's, Aberdeen, Dunblane, Brechin, Ross, and Orkney. With the bond in his hand, Bothwell now pretended that he did not wish to marry the queen, but was forced to do so.

TOLBOOTH, EDINBURGH.

The tragi-comedy was not complete without Mary also being forced. An abduction, the queen fancied, might add to the romance of previous events; and she accordingly arranged with her lover to carry her off on returning from a short journey to Stirling.

Nothing was easier than this. Mary left Stirling, where she had gone to see her son for a few hours, on the 24th of April, and on reaching Almond Bridge, six miles from Edinburgh, was met by Bothwell, accompanied by six hundred horse. Taking the queen's horse by the bridle, the earl, bending a knee, bid her to consider herself his prisoner, to which she smilingly consented. The cavalcade then went off in a trot to Dunbar Castle, where sumptuous apartments had been prepared for Mary and her lover. Having spent a merry week at their new residence on the sea-shore, during which time the archbishop of St. Andrew's pronounced the divorce of Bothwell from his wife, captor and captive returned in company to Edinburgh, entering the gate in triumph, the earl's soldiers casting away their spears, as a token of the queen being perfectly free again. Thereupon Mary finished the ceremony by the declaration that she was resolved to pardon Bothwell, and, to show that it was meant sincerely, to take him in marriage. It was a splendid farce; but the Scotch, with usual want of humour, deemed it too ghastly to laugh at. When called upon to publish the banns of marriage at St. Giles's Church, the Presbyterian minister, John Craig, flatly refused, and obeyed only on threats of death, and on learning that his refusal could not be sustained in law. In the absence of Knox, who had left Scotland soon after the murder of Riccio, John Craig, friend and coadjutor of the great reformer, headed the opposition, and though not being able to decline reading the banns, he had the courage to follow the announcement by a sermon of extraordinary vehemence. "I take heaven and earth to witness," he cried, from the pulpit, "that I abhor and detest this marriage, as odious and slanderous to the world, and I would exhort the faithful to pray earnestly that a union against all reason and good conscience may yet be overruled by God, to the comfort of this unhappy realm."

The wave of public indignation was rising higher and higher against Mary; but she heeded it not. On the 12th of May, having been but three months a widow, she repaired in person to the High Court at Edinburgh, to announce her intention of marrying Bothwell, whom she created the same day duke of Orkney and Shetland, placing the coronet on his head with her own hands. Two days after, on the 14th of May, she signed the public contract of marriage, and on the 15th of May, at four o'clock in the morning, the nuptial ceremony was performed in the council-chamber of Holyrood Palace, first after the Roman Catholic ritual, and afterwards after that of the Presbyterian church. Being a Protestant, Bothwell cherished hopes of gaining the assistance of this powerful religious party; and the queen was quite willing, for the sake of a passion which had led her already into murder, to make any concession required by the reformers. But the latter kept aloof in fierce indignation, scorning all offers of alliance, and declaring loudly that they looked upon them as temptations for a pact with Beelzebub. The preaching had a great effect not only upon the people, but upon many of the nobles who had not been ashamed hitherto to be the friends and confederates of Bothwell, both out of hatred to the murdered Darnley, and in hopes of future reward.

QUEEN MARY LEAVING STIRLING CASTLE.

One by one, these great earls and lords fell off from him, when they saw the tide coming in too strongly against the usurper, and were able to calculate that he could not possibly maintain himself in power. The earl of Morton, quite forgetful that Bothwell had recalled him from exile, and that he himself had conspired at, if not consented to the murder of the king's consort, was the first to give vent to virtuous indignation; and, calling all who had been engaged in the great conspiracy ending in Riccio's assassination around him, he proposed that they should form a new league against the man who, with their help, had become the queen's husband. The proposition was responded to with energy on all sides, the success of the enterprise being not in the least doubtful. Mary was kept well informed of the progress of the new confederacy, and of the imminency of a general rising, but treated the matter with the utmost disdain, expressing her firm intention rather to risk a revolution than separate from her husband. "I care not," she cried, "to lose my crown even for his sake, and shall go to the world's end in a white petticoat before I leave him." It was impossible not to admire the woman in this grand burst of love. Had Mary Stuart been the lowly companion of some Leith fisherman, tall and sturdy, with a rope ever ready to his hand, she might have made the pattern of Scottish wives.

Ancient veneration for the house of Stuart, and respect, if not for the character, yet for the personal courage of the queen, made the people of Scotland willing to condone her past career, even at this desperate state of her fortunes. But what was most feared was that Mary, having linked herself to a man who, as all knew, would stop at no crime whatever to gain his own ends, might be drawn further yet into the vortex of evil, accomplishing the utter ruin of the country together with her own. Already there were fears that the life of the infant heir to the crown was in danger from the unscrupulous ambition of Bothwell, which fears were so vividly expressed, that Mary herself, when visiting her child at Stirling, just previous to the comedy of abduction by her lover, was not allowed to enter the room in which the baby was kept with more than two of her attendants, and was closely watched all the time by the earl of Mar, governor and custodian of the little prince. Entertaining such feelings, the nation could not look quietly upon the final accomplishment of the marriage; and though the ceremony itself took place without disturbance, the insurrection of which Mary had been warned broke out immediately after. The growl of the coming storm became audible to the queen even on the morning of her wedding-day, and deeming herself no more safe in her capital, she hastily fled to Borthwick Castle, a seat of the laird of Crookston, some ten miles from Edinburgh. From here she issued summonses to all the nobles to attend her with their feudal forces, assigning as a reason various disturbances at the Border which it had become necessary to quench with energy. The summonses remained almost without answer, and on Mary appointing her husband commander-in-chief of the expected army, the confederate lords seized this as an opportunity for the prepared rising. In a few days the earls of Morton, Mar, Glencairn, and Montrose, together with Lords Hume, Lindsay, Ruthven, and others, had collected around them some two thousand horsemen, with which they marched upon Borthwick. But they acted too precipitately for immediate success. Lord Hume, rushing onward at the head of eight hundred men, was the first to arrive in sight of the castle, and his force being insufficient to surround all the approaches, Mary and her husband had full time to escape. Hume's soldiers arrived in the afternoon of the 10th of June, and were posted at the principal gate; but as soon as it had got dark, the queen, dressed in man's clothes, left by a postern, and was speedily rejoined by Bothwell, who had climbed the wall in another direction, and held horses ready for the flight. Away went the steeds under the spurs of the fugitives, Mary, boldest of riders, almost distancing her companion, till both together entered the gates of Dunbar Castle soon after three o'clock in the morning, while the first rays of the rising sun came creeping over the North Sea.

Disappointed in their hopes of surprising the queen at Borthwick, the confederates turned upon Edinburgh, which they reached on the evening of the 11th of June. The citizens immediately declared in their favour, whereupon the archbishop of St. Andrew's, the earl of Huntly, and other adherents of Bothwell, who had been left behind to look after his interests, retired into the castle. The latter stronghold was under the command of Sir James Balfour, one of the nobles more immediately engaged in the assassination of Riccio, whose pardon Bothwell had obtained from the queen with very great difficulty, for which reason, and his active participation in the murder of Darnley, he looked upon him as one of his staunchest adherents. But Balfour, no more than Morton and other of the Riccio conspirators, deemed himself bound by considerations of gratitude to a man whom he had assisted in a great crime, but who was now evidently going to ruin and instead, therefore, of turning the guns of Edinburgh Castle upon the confederate lords he sent them a message that he would join their cause. This was enough to decide the success of the opening campaign, and on the recommendation of Morton, a proclamation was issued declaring war upon the queen's consort. The proclamation was hypocritical throughout, assuming that the queen was a prisoner in Bothwell's hands, which, as every child in Scotland knew, was an untruth too absurd to serve even as a pretence of insurrection. "Whereas," the manifesto commenced, "the queen's majesty is detained in captivity, and neither able to govern her realm, nor to try the murder of her husband, we of the nobility and council command all the subjects, specially the burghers of Edinburgh, to assist the said nobility and council in delivering the queen, and in trying and punishing the king's murderers. And we command the lords of session, commissaries, and all other judges, to sit and do justice according to the laws of the realm, notwithstanding any tumult that may arise in the time of this enterprise; with certification to all who shall be found acting contrary to these proceedings, that they shall be reputed as fautors of the said murder, and punished as traitors." This proclamation was followed by another, calling the people to arms, to march against Dunbar, and seize the earl of Bothwell, who was accused of "having put violent hands on the queen's person, having proceeded to a dishonest marriage with her majesty, and having already murdered the late king, and now attempting by his gathering together of forces to murder the young prince also." The call was answered by more than six thousand armed men, who marched out of the gates of Edinburgh early on Sunday morning the 15th of June.

Always as great in misfortune as blind and vicious in prosperity, Mary Stuart did not await the attack of her enemies to prepare for battle. To the proclamations of the confederate lords she replied by others, which, if written with no good intention, were decidedly more honest in language. She told her subjects that "a number of conspirators having shown the latent malice borne to her and the duke of Orkney, her husband, by attempting to apprehend their persons at Borthwick, and having failed, had issued a seditious appeal, to make the people believe that they did seek the revenge of the murder of the king, her late husband, and the relieving of herself out of bondage," all which, she solemnly declared, were "false and forged inventions." The words here were on Mary's side, but the facts were against her. The hearts of the people of Scotland had begun to turn against the queen, and when she left Dunbar Castle, on the morning of Saturday the 14th of June, she began to feel her loneliness, not more than a thousand men having come to her aid, the dependants of Lords Borthwick, Seton, and Ross. However, she pushed forward undauntedly towards Edinburgh, mounted on a fiery war-horse, dressed in a scarlet gown reaching to her knees only, and with the royal standard of Scotland fluttering before her in the wind. At Carberry Hill, six miles from Edinburgh, the royal troops rested for the night, and the report of their arrival having reached the city, the confederates marched out at dawn of day. To excite the multitude, they had prepared an immense flag showing the bleeding corpse of Darnley lying under a tree, and the infant prince kneeling at the side, with the motto underneath, "Judge and avenge my cause, O Lord." The effect produced by this lugubrious banner was very great, the people forgetting, or ignoring, that the chief leaders among the nobles now appealing to God to judge and avenge were deeply implicated in Darnley's murder. Like all humanity in mass, the people of Scotland did not think, but felt, yet the feeling, too, was instinctive wisdom.

There was a moment's pause after the queen and her opponents had come face to face—she still encamped at Carberry Hill, and they, with overwhelming masses, on the heights of Musselburgh, with the river between the rival forces. While the confederate lords, sure of victory, were preparing for strife, the French ambassador at the queen's court, Count Ducroc, made an attempt at negotiation. Repairing from the royal camp to that on the opposite hill, he offered the lords a complete pardon in her majesty's name if they would disband their forces. But Glencairn proudly replied, "We have not come here to solicit pardon for ourselves, but rather to offer it to those who have offended." To which Morton added, "We are in arms, not against our queen, but against the duke of Orkney, the murderer of her husband. Let him be delivered up, or let her majesty remove him from her company, and we shall yield her obedience." The hint that the confederates did not care to seize Bothwell, and would prefer that he should make his escape, was sufficiently intelligible to the ambassador, who thereupon returned to the queen, trying to induce her to enter into personal communication with the lords. While the queen was yet wavering, a strong body of horsemen, under Sir William Kirkaldy of Grange, was seen wheeling round in quick trot from the confederate camp to the eastern side of Carberry Hill, so as to close the retreat of the royal troops. On this, desertion became general in Mary's camp, perceiving which she desired an interview with the laird of Grange, known as one of the bravest and most honourable of Scotch soldiers. The laird at once obeyed the summons, and after a short interview, in which no other argument was needed than that of pointing to her flying troops and the dense ranks of the confederate army, he persuaded Mary to follow him to the camp on the opposite hill, faithfully promising that she should be treated as a sovereign, and have due allegiance from all her subjects. Then the queen called Bothwell, and both conversed together for a quarter of an hour, as reported by an eyewitness, the captain of Inchkeith, "with great anguish and grief." The scene ended, according to the same testimony, by Bothwell asking the queen "whether she would keep the promise of fidelity which she had made to him; of which she assured him, and gave him her hand upon it. Thereupon he mounted his horse, with a small company of about a dozen of his friends, and went off at a gallop, taking the road to Dunbar." Mary Stuart never more set eyes upon the man to whom her passionate soul had become a slave.

The confederate ears might have very easily captured Bothwell, but they were in no hurry to do so. Morton and his friends were perfectly aware that the public trial of their old friend might prove a very dangerous undertaking, so that they took care not to interrupt his retreat to Dunbar. Their behaviour towards Mary Stuart was less gracious, for she had not been long in Musselburgh camp before she began to realize the fact that she was no longer a queen but a prisoner. There was some outward show of courtesy on the part of the leaders of the army, but the multitude openly exhibited the hatred they had conceived against her by calling her a papist, a prostitute, and a murderess. Amidst these shouts the wretched queen was led to Edinburgh, where she arrived at ten o'clock in the evening of Sunday the 15th of June, a howling, yelling mob receiving her at the gate, and insisting upon her being led in procession through the streets. But for the protection of the laird of Grange, who, sword in hand, drove back the vilest of the crowd, she would have been torn to pieces; he succeeded, however, in lodging her in the provost's house, which he secured with a strong guard of his own retainers. Arrived here, Mary's courage, which had sustained her as long as she was in sight of her foes, gave way, and she fell into delirium. Although not having tasted food for twenty-four hours, she refused to take any refreshments, but kept pacing her narrow room, screaming and tearing her hair, and, all her physical strength exhausted, threw herself on the floor in unutterable despair. The state of the unhappy woman, great sinner though she might be, was enough to move every human heart; but the furious multitude, mob in every sense, had no pity. When the morning dawned, the big crowd came tramping up to the window of the room where the queen was sitting, half in rags, with dishevelled hair, raving like one bereft of reason, and held up before her eyes the ghastly flag with the picture of her murdered husband. Mary uttered a wild scream, and fell senseless to the ground.

While the provost's house at Edinburgh was surrounded by the mob, the confederate lords were sitting in earnest deliberation. What to do with the queen how they had caught her was the great difficulty to be solved. All agreed that it would be quite impossible to restore her to power; and all concurred likewise that no advantage could be derived from putting her to death. To try her for the murder of her husband was out of the question, for the same reason which made Bothwell's prosecution impossible, even if the public trial of a reigning sovereign had not been without precedent in history. The conclusion came to in the end, after long discussion, was to retain Mary Stuart in safe but honourable custody; and, while shutting her off from all communication with her friends, to carry on the government in her name, until the time that the infant prince, her son, could be proclaimed as nominal king. The plan was carried out without loss of time. At eight o'clock on the evening after her arrival in Edinburgh, the earls Morton and Athol, accompanied by three hundred armed knights, all on foot, went to the provost's house, and taking the queen in their midst, led her to Holyrood Palace, surrounded by a fierce multitude, who kept crying, "Burn the w——! kill her! drown her!" as the armed group tramped through the narrow streets. On the following morning the confederate lords issued another proclamation, making known their intention to imprison the queen, in order, as they stated, that "her highness may not follow her own inordinate passion for the earl Bothwell." Seeing that but two days before the same lords had solemnly proclaimed that the queen was "detained in captivity" by Bothwell, and had given as the chief reason of their insurrection that of "delivering her majesty," this new assertion of her "inordinate passion for earl Bothwell" seemed rather illogical; however, a little more or less logic was of no consequence to the leaders of a great army. The proclamation of the lords was followed by an order, in which they stated that, "after mature consideration, by common advice, it is thought convenient, concluded, and decreed that her majesty's person be sequestered from all society of the said earl Bothwell, and from all having of intelligence with him or any others, whereby he may have any comfort to escape due punishment for his demerits. And finding no place more meet or commodious for her majesty to remain in than the house and place of Lochleven, ordains, commands, and charges Patrick Lord Lindsay of the Byres, William Lord Ruthven, and William Douglas of Lochleven, to pass and convoy her majesty to the said place of Lochleven, and the said lords to receive her therein, and there they and every one of them to keep her majesty surely, within the said place, and in nowise to suffer her to pass forth of the same, or to have intelligence from any manner of persons, or yet to send advertisements or directions for intelligence with any living persons, except in their own presence and audience, or by the commandments and directions of the lords underscribing, or part of them, representing the council at Edinburgh, or otherwise, where they shall resort for the time, as they will answer to God, and upon their duty, to the commonweal of this country, keeping these presents for their warrants." This order was signed by Morton, Athol, Glencairn, Mar, Graham, Sanguhar, Scemple, and Ochiltree; and in pursuance of it the queen was taken, in the night of the 18th of June, from Holyrood Palace, carried to Leith, from thence across the Firth of Forth to Burntisland, and here mounted on a lame old horse and conducted to Lochleven Castle, Kinross-shire. The armed force which conveyed the majesty of Scotland to prison was headed by William Ruthven, son of the earl who first lifted the dagger against David Riccio. It was but fifteen months before that the dagger-scene had been enacted at Holyrood, the grim apparition of the steel-clad earl, half hid under the crimson curtains of the queen's bedroom, rising up like the first storm-cloud in a dream of bliss. They passed, the fifteen months, like hideous spectres before Mary Stuart's eyes, in the dreary night-march from Holyrood Palace to Lochleven Castle.

The rapid and almost bewildering course of events in Scotland was followed with breathless attention in England. It was not only that Mary Stuart had come to be looked upon generally as heir-apparent of Elizabeth's throne, but the high importance attaching to the union of the two kingdoms made all men feel as interested in the affairs of the northern as in those of the southern realm, the still existing barriers being considered administrative rather than political divisions. An early union had been the desire of nearly all thoughtful English politicians for more than a generation; and in the first shock of the terrible events in the north, it seemed as if this union was likely to be postponed for a considerable time. The murder of Darnley created an intense feeling of horror, necessarily augmented by Mary Stuart's nuptials with the supposed murderer, and not at all allayed by the flight of Bothwell and imprisonment of the queen. To the English government the last occurrence was necessarily the most important of all. However outrageous to public morality, the violent death of the husband of the queen of Scots and her marriage with Bothwell were matters within the sole jurisdiction of the tribunals of Scotland, and the nation in the last instance; but her imprisonment directly touched the home as well as foreign policy of England. It made the great question of succession, scarcely solved by parliament, more uncertain than ever in its settlement; and, what was scarcely less momentous, it was likely enough to furnish foreign powers with an excuse to interfere in the affairs of the sister kingdom. After her flight from Northwick Castle to Dunbar, Mary was known to have despatched messengers to the pope, and the kings of Spain and France, imploring their assistance against her own rebellious subjects, and promising in return to carry out in full force the stipulations of the treaty of Bayonne for the extermination of heresy. As a member of the "holy league," the queen possessed an undeniable right to claim the help of her brother monarchs, and two at least seemed not indisposed to give it. The pontiff, Pius V., a man of energetic character, but recently elected to the chair of St. Peter, showed a strong disposition to send an army of Italian and Swiss mercenaries to Mary Stuart's assistance; while King Philip, engaged in a great struggle with his heretic subjects in the Netherlands, promised formally to ship as many troops as he could spare from Antwerp to Edinburgh, to rescue the queen from her subjects, and, at the same time, carry out the provisions of the "holy league" in Scotland. Thus it seemed that the imprisonment of Mary Stuart was likely to increase on all sides the dangers threatening the welfare and independence of Scotland, as well as of England.

To Cecil, and the more thoughtful members of the English privy council, the course to be adopted could not be for a moment doubtful. The confederate lords of Scotland, whatever their faults or crimes, clearly represented the overwhelming majority of the nation, as well as the cause of religious reform, and to assist their work was not only the best policy, but the solemn duty of a government based, like that of Elizabeth, on Protestantism. These views were indisputable, and yet met with strong resistance on the part of Elizabeth herself. She had no love for her royal sister of Scotland, nor much admiration for her clumsy ways of procuring new lovers or husbands when tired of old ones, but she held very high ideas of the divine right of princes, and the imprisonment of a queen by her subjects seemed to her the greatest of all crimes. Consequently, when Cecil proposed to her to enter into friendly relation with the confederate lords, she absolutely and vehemently opposed it, and it was only after long persuasion, and when becoming persuaded of the grave consequences which any taking part on her side in the cause of Mary Stuart might have to England, that she consented to the despatch of an ambassador to Edinburgh, to treat with the now, nominally still monarchical, but in reality republican government. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, of long experience in the politics of the sister kingdom, was selected for the important post, and he started for Scotland in the first days of July, 1567, rather more than a fortnight after the capture of Mary Stuart. Morton and his colleagues, now generally known as the Lords of the Secret Council, did not overlook the importance of the English mission among the whirlwind of home affairs, and, having heard of the departure of Elizabeth's envoy, deputed Lord Hume, together with Sir James Melville, and Lothington, the secretary of state, to meet him at the Border. They had their first interview with Throgmorton at the fortress of Fastcastle, when Lothington proceeded to explain in detail the actual position of the confederate lords, winding up with the expressed hope that the government of Queen Elizabeth would render them full assistance in the great religious and political struggle they had undertaken. In reply, Throg-

morton read his instructions, with the effect of utterly startling his hearers. Elizabeth, at the outset assuming a grand tone, had ordered her ambassador to blame Mary Stuart for her marriage, and the lords for their rebellion. Leaving the past, and coming to the future, Throgmorton was then to propose, as basis of an arrangement between the queen of Scots and her rebellious subjects, that she should be divorced from Bothwell, and restored to liberty and power; that Bothwell and his accomplices should be punished; that the castles of Dunbar and Dumbarton should be intrusted to the keeping of the earl of Morton and his friends; that a parliament should be assembled for the special purpose of appointing the wardens of the marches, the commanders of the army and navy, and the governors of Edinburgh, Stirling, Inchkeith, and the other strongholds of the kingdom; that a great council should be established, with at least five members sitting in permanence, without whose advice and consent the queen should be unable to pass any act, or make any appointment; and, finally, that a general amnesty should be proclaimed. These propositions, aiming to divide the government of Scotland between the queen and the great nobles, were evidently absurd, considering the character of the monarch to be dealt with, and the clear impossibility of curbing passions, tiger-like in their nature, under anything like constitutional forms. When Throgmorton asked Lord Hume what he thought of the success of his mission, he replied briefly and eloquently by clapping his hand to the hilt of his sword.

Elizabeth's ambassador made his entry into Edinburgh on the 12th of July, accompanied by the deputies who had met him, and a numerous escort, but scarcely noticed by the populace. The city at the moment was in a high state of excitement, the Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland having met, and the great apostle of the reformed faith, John Knox, having come to advise the people upon the important changes that had taken place. Knox had left Edinburgh immediately after the murder of Riccio, seeking a refuge in England during the Catholic reaction; but the imprisonment of the queen brought him back at once, again to lift his voice as highest and most venerated representative of the Protestant people of Scotland. His enormous influence was too well known to the confederate lords to make them hesitate to seek his support, and having consented to do so, it was settled that the Presbyterian party should go hand-in-hand with the government, under condition of the latter adopting as laws of the kingdom the acts of the parliament of 1560, which Mary Stuart had refused to ratify. The proposition was accepted by Morton and his associates, and it was determined to abolish the last remains of Roman Catholicism; to deliver the patrimony of the old church to the Protestant clergy; to intrust to their care all universities, colleges, and schools for the instruction of youth, admitting no teachers "but after due trial, both of capacity and probity;" to give the prince-royal a Protestant education; and to make all future sovereigns of the country swear, before being crowned, "to maintain the true religion professed in the kirk of Scotland, and suppress all things contrary to it."

great as were these terms conceded to the Presbyterian party, they were no more than commensurate with its influence, for in reality the reformers had ceased to be a party and become the people. The shrewd diplomatist despatched by Elizabeth had not been a day at Edinburgh before he found that Knox, with his friend, John Craig, and one or two of the leading Presbyterian ministers, were possessed of far more real power than the Lords of the Secret Council. Throgmorton failed not in pushing his propositions to wait upon Knox and Craig, behaving very meekly and very blandly, but to his distress had to see his courtier-airs completely thrown away. "I found them both," he reported to Cecil, "very austere in the conference. They were furnished with many arguments, some of Scripture, some of history, some grounded, as they said, upon the laws of this realm, some upon practices used in this realm, and some upon the oaths made by the princes at their coronation." The diplomatist could find but few counter-arguments to prove that Mary Stuart ought to be reinstated in power, and soon discovered that his mission would be a complete failure, as far as this important point was concerned. He was shocked, or pretended to be, to hear people of education, who ought to have known better, express the horrible sentiment of a queen being responsible for her own actions, the same as any ordinary human being. In a letter, addressed directly to his own sovereign, dated July 18th, 1567, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton told her of these atrocities, asserting that there were men in Edinburgh who declared that "their queen had no more liberty, nor privilege to commit murder or adultery than any other private person, neither by God's laws, nor by the laws of the realm." The report almost made Elizabeth repent having sent an envoy into the land of revolution.

Throgmorton's mission proved very useless. Cecil had many friends in Scotland, his earnestness in the cause of religious reform being beyond doubt; but as it was well known that the instructions of the special envoy had been drawn up, not by him, but by his fitful mistress, there was not the least effort made to come to an understanding. Lethington frankly informed Sir Nicholas of his conviction that Queen Elizabeth "would leave them in the briars if they ran her fortune," and politely declined to pluck for her majesty's benefit the thorny rose of Lochleven. Throgmorton, not to neglect his duty, had long discussions with the Lords of the Secret Council, but found all of them immovable in the determination to retain Mary Stuart a prisoner. Even his request to see her was refused, as was also that of the French ambassador, marquis de Villeroi, who had been despatched by the king and queen-mother to demand her liberation, under promises, at first, but, if these should prove ineffectual, with threats. Knox and his friends cared for neither; and those of the confederate lords who might have felt desirous, from attachment to an old dynasty, to assist Mary in recovering her liberty, felt disinclined to do so when they found that her fall had not yet been a lesson to the queen, and that, instead of listening to the advice of a few real friends, who advised her to seek honestly a divorce from the murderer of her husband, and by sincere repentance effect a reconciliation with her people, she kept talking of nothing but revenge and punishment of her enemies. This was offensive even to Sir Nicholas, in whose instructions it stood that there should be a divorce. "She will not," he informed Cecil, "consent by any persuasion to abandon the Lord Bothwell for her husband, but avoweth constantly that she will live with him, and saith, that if it were put to her choice to relinquish her crown and kingdom or the Lord Bothwell, she would leave her crown and kingdom to go as a simple damsel with him." No wonder, after such avowals, that crowds of poets and romance-writers have stood up for centuries in defence of Mary Stuart. Perhaps she would have been the greatest of queens in a world ruled solely by poetry, passion, and romance, instead of, as the Scotland of Knox, under the guidance of religion, virtue, and good morals.

Lochleven Castle, a small fortress on an island in the loch, or lake, of Leven, in the shadow of the Lomond Hills, was not a harsh prison for Mary Stuart. The castle belonged to Sir William Douglas, half-brother of the earl of Murray, whose mother, Margaret Erskine, long mistress of James V., had the chief charge of the queen, treating her, if not with affection, at least with the full deference due to her rank. Mary was allowed to move about freely within the precincts of the castle, and made such good use of the opportunity, that before many days were over she had bewitched the hearts of all the young men with whom she could come into communication, and from whose acquaintance she could hope to gain any advantage. Chief among these youths was George Douglas, a younger and favourite son of Margaret, who was allowed, against the rules of the Lords of the Secret Council, to converse freely with the royal prisoner, though always under the eyes of his mother, or in the presence of some of her lady deputies. Eluding the vigilance of these, young George, whose susceptible heart had been touched by the sufferings of the captive queen, began making love to her, and finding his feelings responded to in the glance of eyes full of unutterable passion, he declared himself ready to lay his life at her feet, or to risk it in her service. Mary's dark eyes burnt more fiercely than ever, and the youth soon knew that if he could but procure her liberty, the highest of his hopes might reach fulfilment. It was a silent pact, made in but few words, yet enough to leave the queen in full persuasion that her admirer would strain every nerve, and seek every opportunity to transport her out of the castle and over the dark waters of the loch, and make her foot tread once more the free earth. It was with the full knowledge of youthful enthusiasm, and confident in the hope of success, that Mary assumed a defiant air against the delegates of the lords who visited her, refusing to submit to their orders, and declaring her resolution to remain in prison for ever rather than relinquish her sovereign rights. The resolution was shaken only when, after several fruitless conferences, there came a message from Edinburgh, informing the queen that unless she consented to set her name at once to three documents submitted to her, she would be placed in less honourable confinement, and made to undergo a public trial for the murder of her husband. The bearers of this message were Lords Ruthven and Lindsay, and Sir James Melville, the latter the accomplished courtier, Mary's former ambassador at the English court, who had enjoyed the honour of seeing Queen Elizabeth dance high for his especial benefit. Sir James now had become, swimming gracefully with the stream, one of the Lords of the Secret Council, but he still professed to be an ardent friend of the queen, and took occasion to express to her his unalterable loyalty when submitting the three papers for signature. These documents were of the gravest kind. The first was an act by which Mary abdicated the crown in favour of her son; the second contained the appointment of the earl of Murray as regent of the kingdom, or, if Murray should refuse the offer, the nomination of a council of regency; and the third empowered the earls of Morton and Mar, together with Lindsay, to proceed at once to the coronation of the infant king. The queen vehemently refused to sign any of these instruments, notwithstanding the threats of both Ruthven and Lindsay, who made her understand that her life depended upon immediate compliance. This had no effect whatever, and seeing further remonstrance useless, Melville asked his companions to allow him a few minutes' private conversation. The request was granted, and the astute diplomatist, taking Mary aside, whispered in her ear that an act extorted by violence could not possibly bind her in any way whatever; then, touching the scabbard of his sword, he drew out a letter concealed there, addressed to the queen. It was from Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, announcing that his embassy had been fruitless, but advising her to consent outwardly to all the demands of the lords. Sir James Melville added a verbal message to this note by informing Mary officially, on the part of the ambassador, that "at all times she might count upon a sure friend in the queen of England." The queen started for joy on hearing these words. At the moment Ruthven and Lindsay approached, and, hastily seizing the weighty documents in their hands, she signed them without a moment's hesitation. Mary Stuart had ceased to be queen of Scotland. Three days after a babe of thirteen months was crowned king in Stirling Cathedral, Glencairn carrying the sword, and Morton the sceptre.

The selection of the earl of Murray as Mary's successor, under the title of regent, was practically the highest proof of wisdom which the confederate lords had yet given to their country. A few weeks' experience had been sufficient to show them the absolute necessity of the government being made over to a strong hand; and Murray standing forth in all respects as the noblest, wisest, and best political representative of the Scottish nation, the whole crowd of earls and lords, thirsting as they were after power, wealth, and influence, freely and cheerfully consented to resign their position in favour of one who had taken no part in the struggle. The earl of Murray had left Scotland a few days before the murder of Darnley, with the preparations for which he was probably acquainted, but which he was unable to prevent. Retiring to France, he had nothing to do but watch from a distance the terrible drama that was unrolling itself at home, the mock trial of Bothwell, the sham abduction of the queen, her disgraceful marriage, her flight to Dunbar, and final capture at Carberry Hill. After their victory, the confederate lords at once despatched messengers to Murray, informing him of their intention to keep the queen in close imprisonment, and inviting him to return and assume the government of the realm. But Murray declined, blaming his friends severely for laying hands on their sovereign, and announcing to them that, unless his sister was immediately released, he meant to take her part. To carry out his intentions, he at once left France, and set out on his homeward journey by way of England. Before leaving, he had an interview with the queen-mother, who, shrewdly foreseeing that his hands alone could steer the vessel of Scotland out of the stormy sea in which it had been thrown, made great efforts to gain him over to her interests, offering him rank, wealth, and even an army. The earl respectfully declined all the tempting offers, but secretly fearing that after this refusal he might be retained in France by force, he sent a servant across the Channel, who engaged a small fishing-boat at Rye, in which, during a stormy night in the middle of July, he set sail from Dieppe, and landed safely at the English coast. Arrived at London, he had an interview with Queen Elizabeth, who received him with bitter taunts and reproaches, blaming him for being in communication with the lords, and consenting to his sister's imprisonment, and threatening to invade Scotland unless she was liberated and reinstalled in power. Had Murray been a selfish man, with less than his whole heart in the great cause of Protestantism, the senseless threats of Elizabeth, contrasted with the flattering promises of the ruler of France, might have set him wavering in his course; as it was, however, he quietly followed the path of duty he had traced out for himself, and, without paying attention to other whisperings in his ear, continued his journey to Edinburgh. He arrived on the 13th of August, amidst the loud acclamations of the people, greeting him as regent. But he solemnly assured the lords, who desired to invest him at once with the supreme power, that he could not think of accepting it before having had an interview with the queen, his sister. There was a deep silence at this announcement; then the earl of Morton came forward, and placing a silver casket of rich workmanship before Murray, he bid him examine the contents.

"Ane silver-box owergilt with gold, with all misseive letteris, contractis, or obligationis, for marriage-sonetis or luif-balletis, and all utheris letteris contentit thairin, send and past betwix the quene and James, sumtyme Erle Bothwile: quhilk box and hail pieces within the samyn were takin and fund with umquhill George Dalgleisch, servand to the Erle Bothwile, upon the xx day of June, the yeir of God, 1567." Such was the receipt given by Murray to Morton for the casket handed over to his care, destined to be a terrible Medusa head rising up before Mary Stuart. The casket, originally a present of King Francis II. to his beloved young wife, and as such surmounted by his cypher, had been given by Mary, when in her first widow weeds, to Bothwell, who made it serve as a depository of all the letters and documents he received from the queen, taking care, however, to hide it in a place of safety near his own person. But on his sudden flight to Dunbar he had no time to secure the box, and had to leave it at Edinburgh Castle, in charge of Sir James Balfour. To recover the priceless treasure, Bothwell, after the disaster of Carberry Hill, despatched one of his most trusted servants, George Dalgleisch, to Edinburgh, and the casket was given up to him by Douglas. Unfortunately for the fame of Mary Stuart through all ages, Dalgleisch was seized, being betrayed, in all probability, by Douglas, on his return to Dunbar, and the box of Francis II., full of hideous secrets, fell into the hands of the confederate lords. Handed by Morton to Murray, the silver casket had to decide the fate of Scotland, and of her who still believed herself Scotland's queen. Murray, who had hitherto believed, if not in the entire innocence of his sister, at least in her non-participation in the work of murder, found evidence of such infernal, monstrous guilt in the letters and documents hidden in the silver casket, as made him shudder, and almost drove him to despair. There they lay, these letters—letters unmistakably her own, such as no other man or woman in all Scotland, and, perhaps in the whole world, could have written—there they lay, showing an abyss of crime from which the mind recoiled in horror. A dagger-stroke in the heat of revenge, or the pull of a trigger with a quick bullet sent into the enemy's heart, might have been forgiven and forgotten; but the snake-like hissing and kissing, poisoning and caressing, the hellish mood of passion and hatred which led a confiding youth from his bed of sickness to his yawning grave, on which the murderess danced with the murderer, seemed too much for human pardon. Murray, having read all the letters in the fatal casket, horror-struck, and in a mood of fierce despair, ordered his horse to be saddled in the dead of night, and rode off to Lochleven Castle. He meant to tell his sister to make her peace with God, there being none for her upon earth.

Mary Stuart greeted her brother, arriving in the afternoon of the 15th of August, with the most lively demonstrations of joy. He sat down without replying, silent and sad. The long ride had cooled his fevered brain, and he felt as if he had not courage enough to speak all that he wished to say. Thus hours passed; she, surprised at his unwonted coldness, trying everything to charm him into a glow of friendliness, but failing wholly, Murray restricting himself to question her in a formal manner on the events of the last four months. In the evening, Mary and her brother separated for a short while, but met again after supper. What he could not do with the bright sun shining upon his sister's face, she looking as fair and innocent as when playing in childhood at his side, he, by great inward struggle, forced himself to accomplish in gloom and darkness, with the glittering stars of heaven as sole witnesses. Murray told her that he had read all the letters she had written to Bothwell, and that her past career was lying before him, outspread and bare, as some frightful vision of hell. The shock was as sudden and unexpected, that Mary attempted no denial. She set to weeping bitter tears, and then she prayed her brother to forgive her—to forgive her for having acted "unadvisedly." Murray felt that she was far yet from realizing her position, and began speaking again. He spoke till she sank upon her knees, clasping her hands, and imploring heaven's mercy, he spoke till she threw herself on the floor, and in wild despair called upon the Almighty to end her wretched life. And he spoke till she grew calm again, when, one hour after midnight, he left her, telling her to place her sole trust in God, and hope for no more happiness upon earth. Early next morning, Mary and her brother had a final interview, she appearing calm and collected. He now informed her that the office of regent of the kingdom had been pressed upon him, but that he had not yet decided whether to refuse or accept it. She implored him to give his acceptance, if only to save her life. "This is not in my power only," Murray rejoined, "for the lords and others have interest in the matter." "Notwithstanding, madam," he continued, "I will declare to you which be the occasions that may put you in jeopardy. For your peril, these be they: your own practices to disturb the peace of the realm and the reign of your son; to enterprise to escape from where you are, and put yourself at liberty; to animate any of your subjects to disobedience, or the queen of England, or the French king to molest this realm, either with their war, or with war intestine, by your procurement or otherwise; and your own persisting in this inordinate affection for the Earl Bothwell." With these words, Murray turned to go, when Mary threw herself at his neck in a fit of weeping and kissing, as if her heart was ready to burst. She had hated her brother before, but all her old hatred was put av and weak to what she now felt raging in her breast.

Fondly imagining of having infused repentance into the bosom of a woman whose fierce passions angels themselves could not have tamed, Murray went back to Edinburgh, where the confederate lords were awaiting with deep anxiety to hear his final decision respecting the regency. He declared his acceptance on the 19th of August, and three days after was solemnly proclaimed regent of the kingdom in the council-chamber at the Tolbooth. Then, laying his hand upon the Bible, he took the oath. "I, James earl of Murray, Lord Abernethy, promise faithfully, in the presence of the Eternal God, that I, during the whole course of my life, will serve the same Eternal God to the uttermost of my power, according as he requires in his most holy word, revealed and contained in the New and Old Testaments; and, according to the same word, will maintain the true religion of Jesus Christ, the preaching of his holy word, and due and right administration of his sacraments, now received and practised within this realm; and also will abolish and withstand all false religion contrary to the same; and will rule the people committed to my charge and regiment during the minority and less age of the king my sovereign, according to the will and command of God revealed in his aforesaid word, and according to the lovable laws and constitutions received in this realm, noways repugnant to the said word of the Eternal God; and will procure to my uttermost, to the kirk of God and all Christian people, true and perfect peace, in all time coming. The rights and rents, with all just privileges of the crown of Scotland, I will preserve and keep inviolate; neither will I transfer nor alienate the same. I will forbid and repress in all estates and degrees, reif, oppression, and all kind of wrong. In all judgments I will command and procure that justice and equity be kept to all creatures without exception, as He be merciful to me and you, that is the Lord and Father of all mercies; and out of this realm of Scotland, and empire thereof, I will be careful to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God, that shall be convicted by the true kirk of God of the aforesaid crimes. And these things I faithfully affirm by this my solemn oath." For a moment there was deep silence; then all the lords and earls, warlike, booted, and spurred, opened their Bibles, and began singing the seventy-third psalm: "Truly God is good to Israel."

Elizabeth fumed and fretted on hearing of the forced abdication of the queen of Scots and the assumption of the regency by Murray. At a stormy meeting of the privy council, she talked of going to war immediately in vindication of princely right; and, as a preliminary, she insisted that a letter, penned by herself, should be sent to Throgmorton, for delivery to the Scottish lords, informing them that, "if they continued to keep their sovereign in prison, or should do or devise anything that might touch her life or person, the queen of England would revenge it to the uttermost upon such as should be in any wise guilty thereof." Cecil, finding all other arguments thrown away, had to tell his mistress at last that if her letter was actually despatched and delivered, the very first consequence of it would be the execution of Mary Stuart. "The malice of the world would say," added the shrewd minister, "that she had used severity to the lords to urge them to rid away the queen." This took effect, Elizabeth being well aware that her past behaviour had not been such as to generate a belief in her true love for Queen Mary. Seeing no other way to express her anger, Elizabeth decided to recall her envoy; and Throgmorton, not unwilling to leave a country where he could do no possible good, but a great deal of mischief, paid his farewell visit to the regent towards the end of August. Lethington, who was present at the interview, delivered an excellent verbal message to the ambassador to take back to his court. "If there be no remedy," he exclaimed, "but that the queen your sovereign will make war and nourish hatred against us, we can but be sorry for it, and do the best we may. But, to put you out of doubt, we had rather endure the fortune thereof, and suffer the sequel, than to put the queen to liberty now in this mood that she is in; being resolved to retain Bothwell and to fortify him, to hazard the life of her son, to put the realm in peril, and to forfeit her best subjects. You must think, my lord ambassador, your wars are not unknown to us. You will burn our borders, and we will do the like to yours, and, whenever you invade us, and we but like, France is sure to aid us." And, alluding to the violent speeches of Elizabeth, not unknown at Edinburgh, the secretary of state continued, "Much strange language has been used; but it is enough to reply that we are another prince's subjects, and know not the queen's majesty to be our sovereign." Throgmorton keenly felt the truth of all that was said to him, but he could only bow and be silent, glad enough when discharged by the regent in a few last solemn words. "Though I was not here at the doings past," said Murray, "yet I acknowledge them; and seeing the lords and people have laid upon me the charge of the regency—a burden which I would gladly have eschewed—I do mean to go forth in defence of their actions, and will either reduce all men to obedience in the king's name, or it shall cost me my life."

The regent was true to his promise. Before he had been a month at the helm of state, his strong arm was felt from one end of the country to the other, changing strife into peace and chaos into order. His first work was to get possession of all the strongholds of the kingdom, which he effected swiftly and silently, turning out the creatures of Bothwell and other adventurers who held command, and appointing in their stead good men and staunch Protestants. To the command of Edinburgh Castle he nominated the laird Kirkaldy of Grange, honest above all temptation; but before allowing him to sit down in peace as governor, Murray gave him a commission worthy of his character. It was that of seizing Bothwell and bringing him to justice, a task which, as the regent was well aware, he could not intrust to the soiled hands of any of the leading Lords of the Secret Council. Mary Stuart's husband had left Dunbar a few weeks after his separation from her, and as soon as he found her cause to be lost, and after seizing four small vessels, and arming them with guns and ammunition from the castle, had sailed for the Orkneys, to follow the vocation of pirate—a business for which he seemed singularly well fitted. Kirkaldy started in hot pursuit, in the month of September, from Leith harbour, the two largest men-of-war of the Scottish navy having being placed under his orders by the regent. The Orkney Islands were soon reached; but before he arrived there, the bold sea-rover, getting news of the pursuit, had sailed further north, to hide himself within the narrow channels and rocky inlets of the Shetlands. On the way thither, the laird of Grange lost one of his ships, but pushed on with the other until he found himself in sight of his famed antagonist. There he stood, the god of a queen and destroyer of a nation, on the prow of his little vessel, calm and collected, with the spray of the ocean dancing around his head. Kirkaldy could contain himself no longer, but, soldier more than seaman, dashed forward into the surf. In a minute, the heavy man-of-war was sitting high and dry upon the rocks, amidst the loud demoniac laughter of the pirate crew. To continue the chase, the laird jumped, sword in hand, into a boat, yet before he had gone many yards he saw his ship sinking behind, and had to return to save his men. Long before they had reached the shore, Bothwell had sailed eastward, towards Norway's coast, the land of his ancestors. Here, years after, in the shade of the dark eternal pine forests, he found his tomb—a true Norseman, blood-stained, ferocious, and lawless, ideal of poets, and horror of tax-paying citizens.

Kirkaldy's return to Leith without bringing Mary Stuart's husband was of no great consequence, and fortunate on the whole, since his public trial was likely to breed dissension among the lords who had established the new government. Murray himself felt that absolute union was indispensable, in view of the threatening aspect assumed by the English queen, and constant menaces of invasion coming from France and Spain. To fortify his position, and obtain from the nation at large the confirmation of his title as supreme ruler, he issued summonses for the meeting of a parliament at the beginning of December, 1567. The estates of the realm met on the 15th of the month, congregating more numerous than at any previous time in Scottish history. There assembled at Edinburgh eighteen bishops and abbots, fifteen earls or eldest sons of earls, sixteen lords, and twenty-nine deputies of burghs, or altogether seventy-eight representatives of the nation. Their first measure consisted in declaring lawful all that had been done during the revolution, including the abdication of the queen, the coronation of the infant king, and the appointment of Murray as regent. By a further act, "anent the retention of their sovereign lord's mother's person," the guilt of Mary Stuart in the murder of her husband was admitted, on the evidence of the casket letters. "It is most certain," the act ran, "from divers her privy letters, written wholly with her own hand to the earl of Bothwell, and by her ungodly and dishonourable proceeding to a pretended marriage with him, that she was privy to and part of the devise and deed of the murder, and therefore justly deserves whatever hath been done to her." Having thus approved everything that had been ordered by the confederate lords, the assembly went to consider the greatest of all questions laid before it, that of religion. The overwhelming majority of the members were strict Presbyterians, and they at once declared that they would entertain no offer of compromise on the part of those still attached to the old religion. The earls of Argyle, Caithness, and Athol, together with the bishop of Murray, were the chief representatives of the minority, but notwithstanding their energetic plea for toleration, they were completely outvoted. In a series of acts passed before the eventful year 1567 had come to an end, the estates decreed the entire abolition of Roman-Catholicism, and on the ruins of the old faith built up a new power, henceforth recognized as the kirk of Scotland. Its might made itself soon felt in all spheres of Scottish society, showing the character of the church of Calvin and Knox as a true democracy. A month after the breaking up of the parliament, the proudest of Scottish nobles, the great MacCallummore, earl of Argyle, and the bishop of Murray, eloquent defender of Catholicism, were both condemned by the kirk on a charge of adultery, and made to stand in sackcloth in the chapel-royal at Stirling during the service, earl and bishop face to face. Close to the noble pair, also in sackcloth, was the countess of Argyle, sister of the regent, condemned "for having slandered the kirk in assisting at the baptism of the king in papistical robes." There was not a soul in Scotland but could see that Murray was true to his oath of office.

The energetic rule inaugurated by the regent succeeded in restoring order and the reign of law throughout the whole of Scotland before it had been established six months; but there remained, nevertheless, an undercurrent of deep dissatisfaction. It had its chief seat among the Catholic population scattered through the west, its principal leaders in the Hamiltons, who looked to France for help, and to Queen Elizabeth for money, and its main hope in the royal prisoner who, curbed but not dispirited, was living weary days in Lochleven Castle. Mary Stuart, ever since the interview with her brother, had come to see that she had no hope to be released from captivity by the party in power, and that unless she succeeded to escape from prison, she would have to die in it. But this knowledge, so far from lessening her courage, served but to increase it. By means of the youth George Douglas, whose devotion to her she had raised by all the arts in her power into violent passion, she kept in constant communication with the outer world, and hearing, in the spring of 1568, of the growing dissatisfaction in the west of Scotland, and the mutinous spirits springing up in many other parts of the country in consequence of the stern kirk regiment, she made her preparations for an escape. The difficulties in the way did not appear very great at first sight. Lochleven Castle, standing on a small island rather less than an acre in extent, consisted of nothing more than an ordinary tower of three stories, surrounded by a battlemented wall about eighteen feet high, and entered by a low gate with a turret built over it serving for the warder's residence. Once this gate passed, the chief obstacle seemed overcome, for at the landing-place a ferry-boat was lying nearly always ready to carry servants or people bringing provisions to the opposite shore. Fully acquainted with all these details, Mary, aided by her youthful lover, attempted to escape on the 25th of March. Early in the morning, George Douglas crossed the loch to Leven, to procure horses and gather his friends, and the boat which brought him over took back the laundress with linen for the imprisoned queen. Mary, pretending to be ill, had the woman called into her bedroom; clothes were quickly exchanged; and, a few minutes after, she lightly stepped down the tower staircase, crossed the courtyard, her face well muffled, nodded to the sentinel at the gate and the warden in the turret, and in another second or two found herself at the water-side—a sad queen changed into a happy washerwoman. Gaily she jumped into the ferry-boat, and the oars went splashing into the blue water: scarce ever before did the world seem so beautiful to Mary Stuart. Suddenly, when half way across, one of the rowers bethought himself to have a little fun, and, softly advancing from behind, raised the veil of the laundress to give her a kiss. He started back affrighted, the oar falling from his hands. Seeing herself recognized, Mary put on a bold air, commanding the boatmen, under pain of her royal displeasure, to carry her to the shore. Threats, very useless, were followed by promises, but all in vain. The rowers, good Presbyterians, shuddered at the bare idea of aiding a deposed queen, condemned by the kirk, to make her escape and stir up new troubles; and rowing back to the castle, they delivered her over once more into the hands of her gaolers. Mary Stuart, utterly terrified, thought her last hour had come.

The queen's attempt to escape might have been followed by execution, which, as her brother had plainly told her, would be the penalty, but for the momentary protection of Margaret Esquene. Feeling deep pity with the royal prisoner, whose arts in pleasing had been effective here as elsewhere, and fearing, besides, that severe punishment would fall upon her son for aiding in the abortive attempt, she hushed the matter up, restricting herself to keep Mary under harsher supervision than before. George Douglas was forbidden to set foot within the precincts of the castle, and the sole male person allowed to come near Mary Stuart was a little page, not more than twelve years old, a foundling adopted by Margaret's husband, and going by the name of Little Douglas. To bewitch him took Mary but very short time, and before many days were over, the little man told her—what many big men had uttered often enough—of his devotion unto death. The queen was very anxious to accept the devotion, and placing the page in communication with George Douglas, who kept hovering about on the opposite shore, to feast his eyes on the walls within which his beloved mistress dwelt, she began making her arrangements for another attempt to escape. The difficulties this time were exceedingly great, owing to fresh precautions taken by Sir William Douglas, by which the castle gate was kept always locked. But a little page, sharp-witted like a man, promised Mary that he would find her a way out, and she, almost despairing, resolved to place herself under his guidance, risking once more death to gain her liberty. On Sunday the 2nd of May the boy whispered to her to hold herself ready to fly: at dusk, when the household were taking their evening meal, and she would be left alone in her chamber. Little Douglas knew that every day at sunset the castle gate was locked, and the keys carried to the laird, who, sitting at the head of the table, surrounded by his whole household, placed them carefully at his side. On this he founded his plan. Waiting upon Sir William, and carefully watching the effect of the goblets of wine he had to fill, the page, when the meal was nearly over, dropped his napkin on the table, and sweeping off the keys, hurried away to the captive queen. She was ready waiting, dressed in the garb of one of her servants. It was quite dark by this time, and the household being still at their meal, Mary Stuart, her maid, and the page, slipped through the gate unperceived, Little Douglas not neglecting to lock it behind him, so as to prevent immediate pursuit. The boat, manned by trusty friends chosen by George Douglas, was lying ready at the landing-place, and in ten minutes the queen was safe at the opposite shore, with her lover and stamping horses waiting impatiently. Mary was in the saddle before her companions had left the boat: eleven months' captivity made her eager to ride to the world's end.

Away they went, the fugitives, with the speed of the wind: the queen in front, in the dress of a servant-girl; George Douglas and the page next to her; and the laird of Riccarton, a kinsman of Bothwell, closing the rear with a dozen retainers. Galloping along through the darkness, the little troop gradually increased in size, joined at every hamlet and turning of the road by mysterious-looking horsemen, who closed in behind without uttering a word. MacCallummore the mighty, who had conceived the scheme of marrying the queen to his son, Lord Arbroath, had sent the word, and a Hamilton was peeping from every house and tree and ditch, all the way from Loch Leven to the Firth of Forth. Before reaching Queen's Ferry, Lord Seton, with fifty servants, joined the cavalcade, leading the way across the Forth, where fresh horses were ready waiting. The queen was offered some refreshments, but refused, jumping again into the saddle, and storming along through the starless night. Mile after mile they galloped on, till Niddry Castle was reached, the residence of Lord

Seton, where a short repose was found absolutely necessary for men and horses. Mary alone refused to rest, and while the stout warriors were stretching their weary limbs on heaps of straw in the castle-yard, she sat down to write letters. The first was to Bothwell; idol of her soul, still dearer to her than aught else in the world. She knew he had fled to Norway, and addressed her letter thither, telling him that she had escaped from prison, and that soon again she would have the crown on her head and the sceptre in her hand—crown and sceptre worth having only for his sake. Having intrusted the letter to Riccarton, with orders to proceed direct to Norway to deliver it into the hands of his kinsman, Mary wrote a short note to the cardinal of Lorraine, her uncle, entreating the help of France to recover her power and punish her enemies. Then she stirred the heavy sleepers from their rest; the horses were taken from the stables, and forward they galloped once more to the south-west. The first red streaks of the dawning day came creeping up behind when the burgh of Hamilton and Cadzow Castle, on its steep rock, washed by the Avon, burst into sight before the tired horsemen. Mary Stuart was safe—safe after a fifty-mile ride, from Loch Leven to the Clyde.

On the morning of Monday the 3rd of May the royal banner of Scotland was unfurled on the tower of Cadzow Castle; and before evening had set in more than a thousand armed men had come to bend their knees before the prisoner of Loch Leven. Earls, bishops, lords, abbots, priests, and knights followed each other in one long stream, swearing allegiance, and offering Mary Stuart their arms, their goods, and their lives. At the end of five days, six thousand soldiers had gathered around the queen, clamorous to be led to battle and to victory. All Scotland, she was told, was at her side; she had but to raise her finger, and the fabric of hypocrisy, fraud, and deceit that her enemies had raised would fall to the ground. Mary half believed it, yet wondered, nevertheless, that the foes who were to be crushed showed not the least fear of the coming trouble, contemplating her and her adherents almost with contempt. The regent, when she arrived at Hamilton, was staying at Glasgow, not more than ten miles off; but, so far from flying, postponed his departure to Edinburgh, although absolutely without troops. All that he did was to issue proclamations summoning the citizens to arms, which orders were obeyed quietly, and without show and parade, each man buckling his sword-belt, taking his arquebuse, and strapping his wallet to his back, with bread sufficient for a week, and the Bible underneath the bread. The men of Glasgow stood ready armed for battle the day Murray called upon them; and before another twenty-four hours were gone, the men of Edinburgh, of Stirling, and of Perth, had put on their steel-caps and breast-plates, preparing to fight for the kirk and the Lord. While the chivalry of the realm crowded around Mary Stuart on prancing steeds, with gorgeous banners, the citizens, marching on foot, simple in dress and stern of aspect, slowly gathered under the eyes of the regent, not crying for battle, not seeking death, and not fearing it. Thus, at the end of a week after Mary Stuart's flight from Lochleven

Castle, old Scotland and new Scotland stood face to face at Hamilton and Glasgow.

Mary's friends, full of eagerness to try the fortune of battle, were the first to set themselves in movement. The royal army, commanded by the earl of Argyle, left Hamilton on the morning of the 13th of May, marching along the south bank of the Clyde, in high spirits, and confident of victory. They numbered above six thousand, more than half of them Hamiltons and their kin, splendid horsemen, trained to battle, and full of the pride of race; while their antagonists were scarcely four thousand strong, humble foot-soldiers all of them, with the exception of two hundred horse. Perceiving his numerical weakness, yet being forced into battle, the regent, on the 13th of May, had posted his troops in and around the village of Langside, two miles from Glasgow, a long straggling place stretching down the slope of a hill, up which the royal army was expected to pass. Here he awaited the enemy, his main body occupying the brow of the hill, and the vanguard lodged in the cottages and behind the thick hedges of Langside, shaped into temporary fortifications. The Hamiltons were not long in coming up: a dense, unwieldy mass, marching with little order, and thus reaching the top of the village without perceiving the enemy. All at once here a deadly fire opened upon them, in the terror of which the advancing crowd rolled back in utter confusion, coiling in upon itself. At the same moment the laird of Grange, commanding the left wing of Murray's forces, swept down from the hill, falling into the flank of the enemy, and converting the retreat into a rout. There was little fighting, and not much of the murder of battle—only three hundred of the queen's troops wounded or killed in the first fire from the cottages of Langside. To hew down every man in the flying crowd would have been easy to the conquerors; but the regent sternly forbade all bloodshed, leaving the retreating masses to fall back upon their starting point, and thence to disperse in all directions. The victory was complete—so complete, indeed, that Mary Stuart, who had watched the progress of the short struggle from a hill half a mile distant, made no attempt to gather her forces, or even consult with the leaders, but, pressing the spur into the flank of her charger, at once galloped southward, with no other thought in her mind than that of flying the kingdom. Her eyes began to see, dimly and like in a dream, that the heart of Scotland was no longer with her and her brilliant cavaliers.

Mary fled in wild despair, scarce knowing what to do, all her courage gone, but driven along by the terror of being led back to prison, and perhaps to the scaffold. Her life had been stormy, and yet seemed sweet at twenty-six, even without a crown. To every step love was clinging: turning her head to give a last glance at the fatal field of Langside, Mary saw George Douglas and the little page of Lochleven close behind, willing once more to shed their blood for a mere whisper of her lips or a glance of her eyes. Despise as she might these humble worshippers, the sight of them was consoling, and getting calmer by degrees, she began to form new plans for the future. She thought that if she could but get to England she would be safe; none had shown more friendship for her while in prison than Queen Elizabeth, and no one's protection, therefore, seemed better than hers. Once this resolution formed, she spurred onward, full of fresh energy, careless of the long and desperate journey before her. The country was all up and in arms; the high road choked with a dense crowd of fugitives, struggling for life to get onward, and attacked by the labouring population, who, less merciful than Murray's soldiers, sought their revenge on the disturbers of the peace. Mary had to make her way over footpaths and through bye-lanes, peasants cutting at her with their reaping-hooks as she was flying along, and the very children throwing stones at her head, while muttering maledictions. She had had many a hard ride, but this was to be the hardest of all—as well as the last. Due south the horses flew, Mary having made up her mind to get to Dundrennan Abbey, near Kirkcudbright, there to cross the Solway Firth into Cumberland. From Langside to Dundrennan was ninety-two miles by the nearest road, but a straight course being impossible, it had to be a ride of much above a hundred miles, over hills, through streams and morasses, without shelter, without food, and without rest. Indomitable as ever, Mary accomplished more than half of the journey on the first day, resting during the night on the bare ground, and thankful in getting the next morning a little oatmeal and buttermilk. Before this day, the 15th of May, had come to an end she had reached Dundrennan Abbey, with the rocky English coast opposite glittering in the evening sun. Here she was safe, for Lord Herries, one of the Hamiltons, who had come galloping along as if for life in the track of the queen, yet had been unable to overtake her till hours after her arrival at Dundrennan, informed her that he would undertake to guarantee her perfect security for forty days, being able to hold the place for at least that time against all enemies. But Mary refused. A dream had taken possession of her mind to hurry up to London, to throw herself on the breast of Elizabeth, to weep tears of innocence, to flatter the queen, and to employ all her charms till declared successor to the crown, and marching at the head of an army to punish the Scottish rebels. Not all the counsels of Lord Herries and other friends, who calmly explained to her the great risk she was running in placing herself in the power of the English government, were able to disturb this dream of the imagination; and all the concession Mary made to them was to send a letter to Queen Elizabeth, and another to the governor of Carlisle, requesting permission to cross the Border. But long before an answer to either of these messages could reach her, Mary's impulsiveness got the upper hand. Early in the morning of Sunday the 16th of May, three days after the battle of Langside, and but a few hours after her arrival at Dundrennan Abbey, Mary Stuart embarked in an open fishing-boat to cross the Solway Firth. Tossed about in the frail bark by wind and tide, it was late in the day when the flying queen landed at Workington, on English soil. The sun had set; and her sun had set too.

The news of the landing of Mary created utter consternation at the English court. Of all the events within the range of possibility, this was the one least expected, as, indeed, it seemed to baffle all understanding what reason could have driven her to take this more than hazardous step. To Elizabeth's suspicious mind the idea occurred at once that the chief object of this new movement of the deposed queen was to seek adherents in England, and, by creating a party for herself, to stir up sedition. The very district chosen by Mary for her landing appeared chosen for the purpose, being densely inhabited by Roman Catholics, with a strong taste for rebellion, and who, just before her arrival, had shown an inclination to rise in favour of the old religion. Elizabeth's suspicions, not discouraged by Cecil, grew stronger and stronger when learning, from the successive reports of her own officials, that the ex-queen of Scots had established a sort of court for herself immediately after setting foot on English soil, and proceeded to receive the homages of her friends, like a reigning sovereign. This was but too true. With an imprudence verging into madness, though quite in keeping with the character of Mary Stuart, she allowed herself to be intoxicated by the assurances of affection and loyalty offered to her on all sides, and before she had been many hours in the country which she had sought as humble exile, forgot her true position and adopted the airs of a queen. There was considerable temptation to indulge in this weakness, inasmuch as the enthusiasm with which Mary was received among the sons and friends of the old Pilgrims of Grace, who had fought for and been hung for the Catholic faith, seemed to pass all bounds, affecting even the trusty servants of Elizabeth. Lord Lowther, governor of Carlisle, seeing all heads run mad in exaltation, came to fetch Mary Stuart in state from her lowly residence at Workington, to instal her in his own official residence; and his example of paying homage was followed by almost all the great nobles of the north of England, from the earl of Northumberland, who placed Alnwick Castle at her absolute disposition, down to the Fairfaxes and Vavasours, who hesitated not to put their swords as well as their homes at the command of the illustrious guest. Elizabeth was startled at the report of these extraordinary doings, exclaiming, in undisguised bitterness, that England had come to enjoy the felicity of possessing two queens.

Mary Stuart's delight at her reception by the good Catholics of Cumberland was not destined to last long. Besides the note sent from Dundrennan, she had despatched messengers from Workington and from Carlisle, entreating Elizabeth's permission to go to London, and personally to explain her position. She impatiently awaited the reply; but it did not come till the 29th of May, a fortnight after her arrival. On this day Sir Francis Knollys, vice-chamberlain of Elizabeth, presented himself before Mary Stuart at Carlisle Castle with a letter from his royal mistress. It was very brief, and to the effect that the queen was most desirous of receiving her royal sister of Scotland, and to press her to her heart, but could not do so before an investigation had taken place of the causes which had driven her from her own country. Mary stood like one paralyzed when reading this cold note: the whole edifice of her imagination, which had allured her thus far, was dashed to the ground. For a moment all her power of dissimulation was upset, and she burst into genuine tears. Sir Francis Knollys, a shrewd man, and with more than a courtier's heart, tried to console her by informing her that by the queen's express desire everything should be done that might lead to her comfort. To talk of mere bodily comfort to Mary Stuart was not touching the right string; however, she soon calmed down outwardly, her mind engaged in brooding over new schemes. Quick in forming resolutions, and as quick in giving them up, it had become clear to her at the instant when perusing the queen's letter, that her flight into England had been a gross blunder, to retrieve which all her efforts ought to be directed. To recross the Border and gain the sea, from whence a vessel might take her to France, was the immediate plan which suggested itself; but it was more difficult than Mary imagined. Equal to her in shrewdness, Elizabeth had sent together with her letter a company of soldiers, under Lord Scrope, one of the wardens of the Cumberland border district, with strict orders to guard her royal sister, and to prevent her escape by force if necessary. For subjects to imprison their queen was horrible to Elizabeth's feelings, and she felt ready to rush into war to prevent it; but for one queen to imprison another was clearly a different thing, sanctioned by history and good policy. Thus Lord Scrope and Sir Francis Knollys were carefully instructed to watch the beautiful animal that had got into a trap.

The discovery that she was once more a prisoner was not long in coming to Mary Stuart; however, she had wisdom enough to pretend for a time ignorance of the fact. Instead of making any complaints to Elizabeth, she answered the letter brought by Knollys by another, in which she quietly asked, as the most simple matter in the world, to be allowed to pass through London, on her way to France to seek aid for recovering her kingdom. At the same time she expressed a wish that, when in London, she might have the gratification "to be admitted, with all diligence and without ceremony, to an interview with her majesty, that she might make known her wrongs, and vindicate herself from the false aspersions which had been cast upon her by her ungrateful subjects." Lord Herries, who had followed her into England, chiefly for the purpose of advancing the Arbroath marriage, the great aim of the Hamiltons, was instructed by Mary to carry this note to the queen; and he executed his commission with great zeal, but with a result which plainly showed the fate in store for his mistress. In an interview he had with Elizabeth, she expressed herself with unusual frankness. "As for the passage of my good sister into France," the queen exclaimed, warnly, "I will not prove myself so imprudent as to permit it, and be thus held in low esteem among other princes. When she was there before, the king her husband assumed for her the title and arms belonging to my crown, the which I should not like to have again." Then, twisting very cleverly Mary's offer to "vindicate herself from the false aspersions cast upon her by her ungrateful subjects" into a demand for an open trial, the queen told Herries that it was her intention to offer herself as a mediator between his mistress and her enemies, inquiring, in the first instance, of them "what cause they have to speak ill of her, and by what right they have seized her person, her crown, her fortresses, and all her property." Herries stood aghast. "But, madam," he cried, "if it should appear to be, which God forbid,"—and he suddenly stopped. "Then," Elizabeth remarked, very coolly, not concealing her perfect comprehension of the unfinished sentence which had broken unawares from the lips of the ambassador; "then I will not fail to arrange with her subjects in the best and most careful manner possible, so as to secure her honour and provide for their safety." Again, Lord Herries felt startled. He commenced seeing, in one long unbroken vista, the fate of Queen Mary and the policy of Queen Elizabeth.

Elizabeth lost no time in carrying out in her own way the scheme of mediatorship announced to Herries, and which was so happily adapted both to raise her influence in Scotland and to crush the fallen queen. It was in vain Mary Stuart protested against the construction put upon her letter, repeating to her royal sister that the vindication she was seeking was not a public trial, but a private explanation. The words were thrown away, and the louder her protestations, the more Elizabeth insisted on her own view of the matter, enforcing it with hypocritical assurances of friendship. "Oh, madam," she wrote to her prisoner, "there is not a creature living who more longs to hear your justification than myself, and not one who would lend more willing ear to any answer which will clear your honour." A few days after penning this letter, the queen gave orders to lead the sister she so much loved to a somewhat securer place than Carlisle. Sir Francis Knollys reported to Cecil that once or twice, on short excursions, Mary Stuart had "galloped so fast" that her escort, passing for a guard of honour, had almost lost sight of her, and the Border being dangerously near, he had become so afraid of "accidents," that when she wanted to go for another ride, he had been obliged to tell her "that she must hold him excused." To end this unsatisfactory state of things, there came instructions to take the exiled queen to Bolton Castle, in Yorkshire, represented as a much healthier residence than Carlisle. It was useless now for Mary to pretend any further ignorance of her captivity, and in a high state of excitement she told Knollys that she would not quit her residence unless carried away by force. To this she added a very imprudent and a very useless threat. "She had made great wars in Scotland," she told her custodian, "and she prayed God to keep her from making troubles in other realms." Sir Francis faithfully reported the words to his royal mistress, informing her at the same time that, under date of the 13th of July, he had had the honour of taking the ex-queen of Scots to Bolton Castle, notwithstanding "stout threatenings" and other "tragical demonstrations."

Had Mary Stuart stood firm in her resolution not to submit to a trial in England, it would have been difficult, if not impossible, for Elizabeth to enforce it, since there was clearly not the shadow of a right of jurisdiction that she or her government could claim. But the exiled queen, now as always impulsive yet wavering, wildly passionate, but incapable of sustained energy, was but a poor match for her great antagonist.

and before three months were gone she had lost the first move in the great game of intrigue that had been going on since her arrival in England. Won over by the fair promises of Elizabeth, and trusting the advice of Lord Herries, a mere infant in diplomacy, she consented to the holding of a congress, at which the dispute between her and her subjects should be submitted to the decision of commissioners appointed by the English government. One of the reasons by which Mary Stuart was induced to give her adhesion to this so-called conference, but which on the face of it was strictly a tribunal, was the private assurance of Elizabeth that whatever might be the decision of the commissioners sitting as judges, she should be reinstated in power, and that, besides, the presidency of the commission, or post of chief justice should be intrusted to a man altogether devoted to her interests. The queen kept her word as far as the latter part of the promise was concerned, by nominating the duke of Norfolk for chief commissioner, an appointment involving a deep undercurrent of intrigue. Thomas Howard, fourth duke of Norfolk, and earl marshal of England, was the son of that Norfolk who had narrowly escaped the axe of the executioner by the death of Henry VIII., and afterwards played such an important part in the reign of Mary. He had been educated in the Protestant faith, but was supposed to have more than a bias for Roman Catholicism, which, together with his high rank at the head of the English peerage, rendered his position one of considerable importance. His abilities were very slight, but his vanity and ambition very great, which made him conceive the singular project of marrying the exiled queen of Scots, so as to acquire with her hand a claim to two thrones. The two facts of Mary Stuart possessing already a husband, and of enjoying a very bad reputation as murderess of a former consort, appeared but as slight obstacles to Thomas Howard, he hoping to overcome the former difficulty by a divorce which all Scotland desired, and the second by his own good luck. Though not quite thirty-two years of age, he was already for the third time a widower, so that the chances of survivorship against the lady of three husbands whose hand he sought seemed fairly equal. In Norfolk's opinion, all that was wanted was to gain the secret consent of Mary Stuart to the proposed union, and he was overjoyed in learning that there was no impediment in this direction. Lady Scrope, the appointed companion of Mary, on bringing the aspiration of the noble head of the house of Howard under her notice, met with extreme eagerness on her part to encourage the suit, the queen professing to look upon it as a very great honour. At the same time she warmly encouraged another offer of marriage brought forward under the auspices of her chief custodian, Sir Francis Knollys. The vice-chamberlain, anxious to do a little private business while serving a great public interest, had conceived the scheme of lifting a nephew, second son of Lord Hunsdon, known as "young Mr. Carey," to one or two thrones; and, on his proposal to the effect, was told by Mary that she would be delighted to give her hand to such an amiable youth as described. Thus there were three ardent suitors, Lord Arbroath, the duke of Norfolk, and young Mr. Carey; for the hand of a lady preparing to be tried for the murder of her husband.

Ostensibly the conference agreed to by Mary, and which Elizabeth, on her expressed wish, had ordered to be held at York, among surroundings mainly Roman Catholic, was not considered a trial; but it was evident to all except the chief person concerned that it would shape itself such in the natural course of things. In her letter of invitation to the regent of Scotland to attend the York conference—a paper very differently worded from the communications by which Mary Stuart had been enticed—Elizabeth expressed her own intentions with remarkable clearness. "Whereas we hear say," she wrote to Murray, on the 20th September, 1568, "that certain reports are made in sundry parts of Scotland, that whatsoever should fall out upon the hearing of the queen of Scots' cause, in any proof to convince or acquit the said queen concerning the horrible murder of her late husband, our cousin, we have determined to restore her to her kingdom and government, we do so much dislike hereof as we cannot endure the same to receive any credit; and therefore we have thought good to assure you that the same is untruly devised by the authors, to our dishonour. For as we have been always certified from our said sister, both by her letters and messages, that she is by no means guilty or participant of that murder, which we should wish to be true, so surely if she should be found justly to be guilty thereof, as hath been reported of her, then, indeed, it should behove us to consider otherwise of her cause than to satisfy her desire in restitution of her to the government of that kingdom. And so we would have you and all others think that should be disposed to conceive honourably of us and our actions." Previous to this letter, the regent had expressed his willingness to attend the conference, which, as it seemed to him, would contribute to the pacification of his country by finally disposing of the claims of the exiled queen. To Elizabeth's ulterior object of gaining paramount influence in the affairs of Scotland, Murray attached but slight importance, being firmly persuaded, in conjunction with Cecil and all statesmen worthy the name, that the political union of the two kingdoms would have to take place before the end of another generation. The great work in hand was to make both kingdoms firmly Protestant, and to accomplish it, the regent, noblest and wisest of rulers born to Scotland for a long time, did not shrink even from such a task, repugnant to all his feelings, as the trial of his own sister.

The conference of York opened formally on Monday the 4th of October. There were present, on the part of Mary Stuart, Lords Herries, Boyd, and Livingston, Sir John Gordon of Lochinvair, and Sir James Cockburn of Stirling, and, above them all, as chief representative of the exiled queen, John Leslie, bishop of Ross, one of her warmest partizans, and the same who had come to her as envoy of the Roman Catholic party previous to her departure from France to occupy the throne of her ancestors. Opposed to him and his colleagues, and representing the government and people of Scotland, were the regent, with the earl of Morton, Lord Lindsay, Lethington, secretary of state, and several representatives of the kirk, including Dr.

George Buchanan, poet and historian. Queen Elizabeth had appointed for commissioners and judges, besides the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Sussex, military commander of the northern districts, and Sir Ralph Sadler, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster and privy councillor since the time of Henry VIII. The proceedings began with a speech of the duke of Norfolk, which, in conformity with special instructions of the queen, asserted that England had always exercised feudal superiority over Scotland, and was now exercising it once more. Murray bit his lips in angry silence, deeming the refutation of such obsolete claims a mere waste of words; but Lethington thought otherwise, and sprang to his feet. "It would be time," he cried, "to talk of homage when the Scottish monarchs had restored to them the territory they had formerly possessed in England. In the meanwhile, Scotland was entirely independent within its own limits, and had been always so, even in religious matters, having never condescended to pay, like England, the tribute of Peter's pence." Thereupon arose a long discussion, which the duke of Norfolk took great pains to spread out so as to prevent deliberation on other subjects. In this he succeeded, and his object was made clear a few hours after to the regent of Scotland.

In the night following the first meeting of the conference, a long interview took place between Murray and the duke of Norfolk. The latter, constantly keeping in view his own private object, proposed to the regent to come to an arrangement with Mary Stuart, without fighting the battle of her merely personal enemies by exposing her crimes. He told him, and the words seemed to make a great impression upon Murray, that the true interest of Scotland as well as of England required that Mary should be not more coerced than was necessary to break her connection with Bothwell, and that her honour and reputation ought to be saved under all circumstances. "How could we find it in our hearts," Norfolk exclaimed, "to dishonour the mother of our future king, or how could we answer afterwards for what we had done, seeing that by bringing his mother's honesty in question, we jeopardize his right to the crown of England." Murray's own feelings so much corresponded with this view as to make him readily agree to the proposition of the duke of Norfolk to send a secret envoy to Bolton Castle with an offer to Mary that the exposure of her misdeeds, necessary otherwise on political grounds, should be dropped if she would ratify her abdication, and consent to reside in England, under the protection of the queen, and with an allowance from the Scottish government suitable to her royal dignity. Before despatching his messenger, Murray informed the bishop of Ross of the proposal to be made, and he, shrewdest of all the advisers of the deposed queen, at once declared that he would use his whole influence to make her accept the proffered terms. John Leslie was aware that the regent had brought with him the fatal silver casket containing Mary Stuart's letters to Bothwell, and he was too true a friend of her to disguise the fact that the fatal box once opened to the public gaze she would be lost beyond redemption. Full of this conviction, the bishop pledged himself that if Murray would show forbearance for a few days, he would bring about an arrangement.

The meetings of the conference, interrupted by consent of all parties, were resumed on the 8th of October. On this day Leslie and his colleagues pleaded the case of their mistress, giving an account of the rebellion of the lords, and protesting against the imprisonment and forced abdication of Mary Stuart. To the astonishment of all not initiated in the secret, Murray, instead of accusing Mary, assumed a merely defensive attitude in his reply to the bishop of Ross, inveighing chiefly against Bothwell, and declaring that the danger to which the prince-royal, and with him the succession to the crown, had been exposed by the marriage of an unscrupulous adventurer with the queen, had compelled the lords to employ force against her, and to establish a provisional government during the king's minority. The plea was feeble, inasmuch as the simple answer to it would have been that Bothwell had left the realm, and that a practical separation of the marriage complained of had taken place, so as to make all further restraint of the queen unnecessary, and therefore criminal. This was the view taken by both the earl of Sussex and Sir Ralph Sadler, who, having no private interests to serve, like their chief, the duke of Norfolk, hesitated not to express their opinion to the regent. Seeing that he was drifting into a completely false position, and getting, besides, no reply to the secret proposal made to his sister, Murray now had recourse to an extreme step. To prove to the commissioners of Elizabeth that his case was unanswerable, and that it depended but upon him to strike the blow which would annihilate at once and for ever all pretensions of Mary Stuart to come forward as an accusing party against the people and government of Scotland, the regent instructed Lethington and Dr. Buchanan to exhibit the documents of the silver casket privately, and under strict assurance of secrecy, to the duke of Norfolk and his two colleagues. It was done on the 10th of October, and the effect was even greater than expected. Their promise of secrecy not binding them against their sovereign, the three commissioners, unanimously and without further hesitation, expressed in a private report the necessity of condemning Mary Stuart. "The Scotch," they informed the queen, "showed unto us horrible and long letters of her own hand as they say, containing foul matter and abominable to be either thought of or written by a prince, with divers fond ballads of her own hand. The said letters and ballads do discover such inordinate and filthy love betwixt her and Bothwell, her loathsomeness and abhorring of her husband that was murdered, and the conspiracy of his death in such a sort as every good and godly man cannot but detest and abhor." This letter, written on the 11th of October, and signed by Norfolk, Sussex, and Sadler, was addressed to Elizabeth; but Norfolk added a private note to Cecil, in which he expressed himself still more strongly about the guilt of Mary, and, adding extracts from the papers of the silver casket, stated that no doubt could be entertained about their authenticity. "As it is hard," the duke wrote, "to counterfeit so many and so long letters, so it seemeth from the matter of them and the manner in which they were discovered, that God, in whose sight murder and bloodshed are abominable, will not permit the same to be concealed."

Norfolk's honest indignation, which made him give these opinions in the first excitement of the great revelation laid before his eyes, cooled down somewhat in the course of the next few hours, when he had a visit from the bishop of Ross. John Leslie, with his eyes everywhere and his spies everywhere, was fully informed of what had taken place between Murray and the royal commissioners, and being likewise well acquainted with the great private scheme of the duke, he came to work upon his imagination. The task was not very difficult, for Norfolk was as much as ever dazzled with the glittering project of his marriage with a queen, and felt less abhorrence for her crimes than fear that they might be made known to the world at large. "If they were once published," the duke told Leslie, "her majesty the queen of England would be advised by those who love not your mistress to send ambassadors to all Christian princes, to make the same known to them, that they might make no further suit for her deliverance, and perhaps her person would be subjected to severe treatment." To prevent these consequences, Norfolk, who, his first excitement over, showed himself as anxious as before to shield Mary Stuart, advised the bishop to go direct, and without losing a moment's time, to Bolton Castle, and induce or even compel her to subscribe to the terms previously offered. There was little necessity for urging Leslie to take this step, which offered clearly the only escape of his mistress from ruin and infamy, and he therefore rode off at once to see her. At first Mary stubbornly refused to sign once more her abdication; and it was only after her episcopal adviser had given her the plain hint that her new signature would bind her no more than the old one, and that, once at liberty, she might revoke everything she had done, that she consented to accept the proposal of the regent in full. The pact was sealed and subscribed the same day, and the bishop hurried back to York.

So far the combined efforts of Norfolk and Leslie had been successful, and everything seemed in a fair way of settlement, when the great player in the game, whose existence all seemed to have forgotten for the moment, suddenly appeared on the scene. Elizabeth was kept as well informed of everything, public or private, that was passing at York as the clever bishop of Ross himself; and she had no sooner heard of the successful negotiations with Mary Stuart when she determined to upset the account. An instant order was sent to Norfolk to adjourn the York conference, with a view to its being reopened in London; and a private note, despatched at the same time, told the noble duke that he would have to justify himself from the accusation of aspiring to the hand of the queen of Scots, with the view of fomenting troubles in the realm. Another note, addressed to Murray, informed the latter that his secret negotiations showed great disloyalty towards a sovereign who had hitherto taken his part, and that unless he was prepared to make good to the full extent the accusations against Mary Stuart, the government of England would be compelled to give judgment in her favour, and to carry it out by re-installment in power. The regent, feeling that the part he had played in the transactions with Norfolk and Leslie, although carried out with the best intentions, was not altogether above suspicion, consented at once to have the conference removed to London, and to undertake no further negotiations except with the open consent of all parties concerned in them. Acting less wisely, Mary Stuart on her part bluntly refused to attend any further meetings that might take place, or to answer any accusations brought against her. Conscious, through a sort of feminine instinct, that Elizabeth would never rest till having accomplished her ruin, as indeed she herself would have acted had the places been reversed, Mary was fast getting desperate, unwilling to waste words in talk, and ready to embark in any furious act promising the faintest chance of relief. As a commencement of this new revulsion of feeling, she informed Murray, through Leslie, that, the York conference having come to an end, she considered all her former engagements null and void, and while refusing to listen to any further proposals, open or secret, dared him to do his worst. Once more Mary Stuart was all her own again, without mask and veil, every inch the royal tigress.

The adjourned conference was opened at Westminster, on Thursday the 25th of November. Norfolk, having defended himself before the queen by the most astounding lies, denying "with great oaths" that he had ever dreamt of seeking the hand of Mary Stuart, whom he freely designated as a "notorious adulteress and murderess," while delicately informing his maiden sovereign that he liked "to sleep upon a safe pillow," was allowed, in consideration of so much mendacity, to remain on the commission, but not as president, and with five new members adjoined. These were Lord Chancellor Bacon, appointed to fill Norfolk's place, Cecil, Lord Admiral Clinton, and the earls of Arundel and Leicester. The representatives of the Scottish government were the same as before, Murray again appearing in person; but Mary Stuart had despatched only John Leslie and Lord Herries, with strict injunctions to do nothing but protest against all the actions and decisions of the conference. That her apprehensions were not without cause was shown at the first meeting. After quietly listening to the protest read by the bishop of Ross, from a paper drawn up by his mistress, the lord chancellor, without further preliminary, invited Murray to change his previous mode of action, and instead of making himself defendant to come forward as accuser. "Her majesty," Bacon informed the regent, very pointedly, "principally wisheth that upon the hearing of this great cause the honour and estate of the queen of Scots may be preserved, and found sincerely sound, whole, and firm. But if she shall be justly proved and found guilty of the murder of her husband, which were much to be lamented, she shall either be delivered into your hands upon good and sufficient sureties and assurances for the safety of her life, or else she shall continue to be kept in England, in such sort as neither the prince her son, nor you the earl of Murray shall be in any danger by her liberty. And for the time to come her majesty will maintain the authority of the said prince to be king, and the government of the realm by you the earl of Murray, according to the laws of Scotland." The declaration, given in the queen's name, was so decisive as greatly to surprise the regent, accustomed to the constant vacillations of Elizabeth. To recover himself, he asked the court to postpone its sittings for another day, which demand was at once assented to by the lord chancellor, who fully appreciated the importance of every word which was henceforth to be uttered. It was more than the fate of an exiled queen that was now hanging in the balance. Murray knew it, and Cecil, and Bacon, and all the thinking men of England and Scotland, that the great question to be decided was whether sovereigns should be allowed any longer to claim irresponsibility for their deeds, or whether they should be compelled to conform, like their subjects, to the moral and civil laws of mankind—reflex of the eternal laws of God.

Calm and serene was the look of the regent of Scotland when he appeared before the commissioners of Elizabeth, sitting in the Painted Chamber of Westminster, on the morning of Friday, the 26th of November, 1568. Not a soul, even among his most intimate friends, knew what he was going to say; many feared that he would not speak more freely than before, but all wondered he should be so placid in countenance, with a hundred secret daggers lifted against his breast. It was known that London was swarming with crowds of enraged and fanatic papists, who were dogging every step of the regent, determined to kill the defamer of a Roman Catholic queen, patroness of the ancient faith, even at the risk of their own lives. Murray was perfectly aware of the host of his enemies, yet hesitated not for a moment to do his duty. When Lord Chancellor Bacon, slowly and solemnly, had invited him to speak, the regent stepped forward into the midst of the court, and, amidst silence so deep that every breath was heard, accused Mary Stuart of the murder of her husband. Scotland, he said, had cast off its queen because the queen had committed a foul crime, detestable in the eyes of heaven and of earth; as men and as Christians, the nation of Scotland abhorred the thought of having a vile malefactor for their supreme ruler. It was the first-fruit of the glorious reformation, and the awakening of the people to the truth of Christ's Gospel. His own weak mind, Murray continued, had long been unwilling to speak all that was to be spoken, and to proclaim to the whole world the infamy of a crowned sovereign and of a woman. He had hesitated long, and would hesitate even now if the public weal permitted, but found it was impossible, seeing the person who claimed to be still ruler of the realm of Scotland had shown her determination to combine with all the enemies of justice, of peace, and of true religion. He had small satisfaction, Murray concluded, to see his former sovereign dishonoured—his former sovereign and his sister still; but the enemies of Scotland, professing to be her friends, had left him no choice but to produce the proofs which he possessed that she had murdered her husband. With these words, the regent laid on the table the letters and papers found in Bothwell's silver casket.

Upon the verification of these letters now hung Mary Stuart's fate. There was a mass of other evidence against her, implicating her in the murder of Darnley, such as the depositions of a number of Bothwell's servants and other accomplices in the crime, who had been seized and brought to trial; but this testimony, more or less corrupt from its source, was necessarily far behind that furnished by her own hand, in fatal self-condemnation. To establish the genuineness or forgery of the documents presented by Murray beyond all doubt, Elizabeth, on the demand of several Roman Catholic peers, among them the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, appointed a special committee for examination, including these two nobles and three other declared adherents of the queen of Scots, besides the commissioners of the conference. The committee met at Hampton Court, where the queen was staying, who had ordered that all letters which Mary Stuart had written to her should be given up to the members for the purpose of examination, so as to allow them to compare, in the most careful manner, the minutest details of style and handwriting in the documents undeniably her own and those handed in by Murray, which her friends declared to be forgeries. Piece by piece, and line by line, the letters, sonnets, and other papers addressed to Bothwell were examined by the members of the committee, each taking his part individually and independent of the rest; and the result was a unanimous verdict of guilty against Mary Stuart. The first perusal of the documents had the same effect upon many of the lords, particularly those friendly to the cause of the queen of Scots, as upon the duke of Norfolk when reading them at York, and they did not hesitate more than he to characterize the contents as "matter foul and abominable." When the excitement had passed, the lord chancellor asked every one of the lords present whether they could see any difference between the various letters and papers submitted to them, and they, as with one voice, replied No. Then he drew up the report.—"There were produced sundry letters written in French, said to be written by the queen of Scots' own hand to the Earl Bothwell, and these being read were duly conferred and compared for the manner of writing and fashion of orthography with sundry other letters heretofore written and sent by the said queen of Scots to the queen's majesty, in collation whereof no difference was found." It was the moral death-sentence of Queen Mary Stuart.

The sittings of the conference were resumed after the conclusion of the Hampton Court inquiry, but in merely nominal form. Neither Elizabeth nor Cecil could think of any expedient to bring the great inquiry to a satisfactory end, and it was therefore resolved to adjourn the discussion indefinitely, which was done on the 10th of January, 1569. It being the object of the queen now rather to calm the prevailing excitement than increase it, she prevailed upon the earl of Lennox, who had come to London to accuse Mary in person of the murder of his son, and to adduce fresh proofs of it, to abandon his suit temporarily, that she might in the meanwhile communicate with the accused. This was done by Elizabeth informing the bishop of Ross that the queen of Scots would be left the choice of three ways in clearing herself from the grave accusations brought against her, either by defending herself in writing before the conference, or by sending duly-instructed plenipotentiaries to do the same or, finally, submitting to the examination of a commission of inquiry to be sent to Bolton Castle. In conclusion, Elizabeth ordered the bishop to inform his mistress that "those who advised her to abstain from answering the charges made against her, however they should seem good servants, did rather betray her to procure her condemnation." The reply of Mary Stuart to this communication was haughty in the extreme. She declared that no arguments were needed to defend herself against any accusations brought forward by her enemies, and that her own princely word and denial was more than sufficient for the purpose. There was no longer discussion possible on arguments like these, and Cecil deemed it best, therefore, to break up the conference, without pronouncing judgment, or coming to any formal decision. The latter was unnecessary, in so far as, except with a few who wished to be wilfully blind for political or other purposes, there remained no longer a doubt in men's minds that Mary Stuart was guilty of the murder of her husband, and as such unfit to be the ruler of a nation. In order that sentence not being pronounced, the English government might publicly express the conviction arrived at, the removal of Mary Stuart to a new place of confinement, severer than the former, was ordered immediately after the dissolution of the conference. On the 26th of January, 1569, the deposed queen was led under military escort from Bolton to Tutbury Castle, a gloomy old mansion, on the River Dove, in Staffordshire.

While the trial of Mary Stuart had absorbed the chief attention of Englishmen, mighty events were taking place abroad, scarcely less important in their influence upon the future of the kingdom than the political and religious struggle expressed in and centering around the life of the queen of Scots. These events were the continued battling of the Huguenots of France against overwhelming odds, and the simultaneous effort of the Protestant people of the Netherlands to throw off the dark power of Spain and of Rome. Having captured Havre with the aid of the Huguenots, Catherine de Medici lost no time in turning round upon them, recommencing the old persecution; and only when it was too late Condé perceived the fatal blunder he had made in spurning the aid of his English allies. Beaten in almost every encounter, and crushed by the number of their enemies, the Calvinists of France saw themselves gradually driven westward into the sea, occupying at last little more than the town and fortress of La Rochelle, to which they clung with the grasp of despair, like lions mortally wounded gathering strength in the agony of death. It was the ruin of the Protestant cause in France that its leaders had paid no regard to the great truth so often preached of the binding interest of religious faith among nations, and had forgotten seemingly that the millions of Germany, of England, of Scotland, and of the Netherlands, who were battling to emancipate themselves from ancient superstition, and struggling to emerge from darkness into light, were of the same brotherhood with them, and that united battling only and united struggling could lead to victory. They forgot it, and they and all France paid dearly, for ages to come, for the forgetfulness. While the soldiers of freedom were fighting disunited, a group here and a group there, the enemy came up in close phalanx, strong in concord, and overpowering in numbers. The Holy League for the extirpation of heresy concluded between the pope and the rulers of Spain and France, and to which Mary Stuart had given her adherence, bore its effect almost immediately after its establishment. King Philip and the pontiff aided the queen-mother of France both with men and money to crush the Huguenots, and when they had been driven to their last refuge on the Atlantic coast, Catherine in her turn assisted her allies to break the neck of heresy in the Netherlands. The latter was a movement which, more than all preceding religious struggles on the continent of Europe, engaged the highest interests of England—an England which had come to see, gradually and slowly, that there are spiritual ties between nations as important as those of language and race.

The people of the Netherlands, at the time they commenced their great battle against the despotism of Rome, were among the most industrious as well as most prosperous nations of the world. Their political institutions bore sign of their prosperity, for though nominally under the sceptre of the great German-Spanish family, who by inheritance and matrimonial alliances had acquired half-a-dozen crowns, and whose power culminated in Kaiser Charles V., their dependence went no further than a certain liability to taxation, in return for which they might claim protection against foreign enemies. In the reign of Charles V., himself a native of the Netherlands, the country was divided into seventeen provinces, each having its own stadholder, or president, and institutions based on the principle of self-government. The reformation found its way very early among these well-educated, thoughtful, and industrious masses, and the tenets of Luther and Calvin had spread far and wide before being arrested by the great antagonistic power. Here, as elsewhere, Rome showed its determination to hold its own with the grip of the murderer and the hangman; but it was not till the commencement of the reign of Philip that the persecution of the Protestants began in earnest, and not till the advent of the Holy League that all preparations were made complete for the final war of extermination. One of the first doings of Philip was to introduce the Spanish inquisition, and, in its trail, the society of the Jesuits; and the combined working of these two elements having stirred the people into rebellion, the time was thought fit for extirpating heresy, root and branch. As a fit instrument for this duty, Philip selected Ferdinand Alvarez de Toledo, duke of Alba, or Alba, greatest captain, greatest fanatic, and greatest bloodhound in the service of Spain. A soldier from the age of sixteen, Alba had devoted his life to fight against, to persecute, and to kill heretics, not sparing sex or age, and when not able to reach the living, venting his fury against the dead by burning their bones and scattering the ashes to the winds. It was his boast to have slaughtered more than a hundred thousand heretics, when Philip ordered him to take the chief command in the Netherlands, there to add to his laurels. The duke hastened to obey the command, and gathering an army of twelve thousand men, highly organized and equipped, even to the possession of two thousand frail nymphs, he started from Italy in the summer of 1567, accompanied by the blessing of the Holy Father.

Catherine de Medici allowed Alva's army to pass through Franco, to the horror of her Protestant subjects, who, impotent to help themselves, had nothing but prayers and tears left for their brethren in the Netherlands. Descending from Mont Cenis, and crossing Savoy, Burgundy, and Lorraine, the papal troops tramped northward in slow stages, and at the commencement of September made their entry into Brussels. Treating the statutes, charters, and privileges connecting the seventeen provinces under the sceptre of Spain, with internal self-government established for ages, as mere waste paper, Alva commenced his work by summarily suspending all local magistrates and closing all courts of justice, erecting in their stead a central tribunal, presided over by himself, and soon known as the Council of Blood. The task of murder now was ready to begin. With his twelve thousand Spanish and Italian brigands, let loose all over the country as hangmen and assassins, guided by priests and incited by plunder, Alva succeeded in laying hold of all the leading men among the Protestants and establishing a reign of terror. Unprepared for resistance, and far less warlike from their industrial occupations and training than the Huguenots of France, the people of the Netherlands allowed themselves to be butchered like lambs; and it was only when murder had reached its furthest limits, when the streets were running with blood, and gallows were standing at every door, that they rose at last with one wild shriek of despair. The shriek found its echo in Protestant England, just at the moment that Elizabeth's commissioners were sitting in trial upon Mary Stuart.

Elizabeth's position in regard to the people of the Netherlands was one of no slight difficulty. She knew that the great majority of her subjects deeply sympathized with them; but she knew also that there was a strong and influential minority, particularly in the north of England, who looked to the king of Spain as to a patron of the old religion, and who would be sure to resent, by insurrection or otherwise, any offensive measures against him. Under these circumstances, the queen felt greatly inclined to leave the Dutch Protestants to themselves, a policy which seemed the wiser as the alliance with the Huguenots had shown that the noblest religious enthusiasm offered no security against gross political ingratitude, and that the reformers on the continent were far as yet from appreciating a brotherhood of faith among nations. With Havre still in her memory, Elizabeth looked coldly upon Bruges and Antwerp crying for help, the more so as her religious sympathies were but shallow, and more than overcome by her dislike of war. Fortunately for the cause of Protestantism in England and all over the world, there was a man at the side of the queen with views and sympathies loftier than hers, disdaining to huckster petty territorial advantages against freedom of conscience, and disdaining to consider his own country isolated from the civilization of Europe because of its being an island in a geographical sense. Cecil clearly comprehended that Protestantism, once suppressed by brute force on the continent, could not flourish in England, young as was its life and numerous as were its enemies; and strong in this conviction, shared by the best and noblest of his countrymen, he determined to do all in his power to uphold the principles of reformation abroad as well as at home. Cecil did not like war, being less inclined to it than even Elizabeth, who was ready enough to stake men's lives for solid advantages; but he held firmly to the belief that war with all its horrors was infinitely preferable to the boundless misery of millions of human beings kneeling for ages under the iron heel of despotism, and millions of god-like minds slumbering under the dark shade of ancient superstition and idolatry. When Alva with his twelve thousand papal assassins marched into the Netherlands, Cecil felt that the time had come for England to make war. Only a small arm of the sea now divided England from the inquisition, from the Jesuits, from the Council of Blood, and from the grim fanatic whose pride was to have murdered a hundred thousand men to please God. And there were crowds of dark benighted souls in England, Cecil knew, ready to welcome the great murderer and his hoide, so he could but cross the small arm of the sea.

War of England against Spain, of the first of the Protestant powers of Europe against the mother of the inquisition, the cradle of Jesuits, had become inevitable from the moment the Holy League was signed; yet Cecil nevertheless had a gigantic task in launching the vessel of state, at the helm of which he was standing, fairly into the ocean to face the enemy. The queen herself was the great obstacle opposing him. Her mental vision being within womanly limits, she was unable to grasp the wide range of European politics; and, holding to the notion of England being strictly and in every sense part of an island, well guarded by soldiers, sailors, and custom-house officers, she could not bring herself to see how the march of twelve thousand papal cut-throats from Rome, over Mont Cenis, through France, to Brussels, Ghent, and Antwerp, could in any way influence either the actual or future state of her own country. Thus she refused to compromise herself in any way by giving aid to the oppressed Protestants in the Netherlands, and Cecil had to seek the attainment of his great end by artifice rather than the power of persuasion. His policy might have met with still greater obstacles but for the involuntary assistance of King Philip. Following strictly the course laid down by the Holy League, Philip refused the queen's envoy at Madrid, Mr. Man, doctor of divinity, to have the service of the church of England read in his own chapel, on the ground that the embassy, like all other dwelling places in Spain, was "subject to the holy house of the inquisition." Elizabeth, to whom Dr. Man referred the matter at once, burst into a rage, and ordered him to inform the Spanish government that as she allowed King Philip's ambassador the free exercise of his own religion, not only for himself but for all his friends and servants, so she expected the same for her own envoy, and was resolved "not to endure inequality." Thereupon Dr. Man renewed his Anglican service, temporarily interrupted, but with the only effect of being carried to prison, without further waste of arguments. The next Elizabeth heard of her envoy was that, after an enforced residence in a gaol six miles from Madrid, he was examined before a board of priests, and not being found good enough to be hung or burnt, was ordered to be summarily kicked out of the happy territory reposing under the shield of the holy house of the inquisition. It was an insult justifying war, according to international law. Elizabeth was furious, while Cecil rejoiced, though with a modicum of pity for poor Mr. Man, doctor of divinity.

The affront, great as it was, however proved yet insufficient to drive the queen into an absolute breach with King Philip; and she was still considering what sort of satisfaction, short of war, she would have to require from the Spanish government, when an event occurred which did away with all further hesitation. Deeply imbued with the spirit of money-making, Elizabeth had been engaged for some years past in trading enterprises, among others in the most profitable, though most iniquitous of all trades, that in slaves. The traffic, always highly remunerative, was becoming so more and more through the severe penalties enacted by the Spaniards against all foreigners carrying on intercourse with their own great colonies in the west; and the danger stimulating enterprise as well as raising profits, a number of bold English sea-rovers engaged in the detestable work of capturing black-skinned human beings on the African coast, and carrying them across the Atlantic, for sale in the West Indies and the Spanish main. There were many who boasted of having made great fortunes in this nefarious traffic; but the boldest and most successful of all the slave-traders, by universal consent, was John Hawkins, a native of Plymouth. Having amassed large treasure in several voyages, he resolved, in 1567, to embark in an enterprise greater than any yet attempted, by taking a fleet of six ships to Africa, and from thence to the Spanish West Indies. The trip promised to be unusually profitable, and Elizabeth eagerly accepted a partnership of one-third in it, agreeing to furnish and equip two vessels out of the six. The bargain was duly made, and after receiving, on the request of the Spanish ambassador, a formal warning from the queen's privy council not to break on any account the laws excluding unlicensed traders from the Spanish colonies, John Hawkins sailed from Plymouth in October, 1567, with a chosen crew of daring seamen, among them a young relative, Francis Drake by name. The voyage was successful beyond all expectation. After sacking a densely-peopled town in the Sierra Leone, and stowing away as many black human cattle on board the six ships as they could possibly carry, John Hawkins steered westward, sold his slaves at enormous prices, the tariff having risen in consequence of a fearful pestilence; and having ballasted his fleet with gold and silver bars worth nearly a million pounds sterling, prepared to sail home to England. But he had not gone far on his route, when he was caught by a storm, and compelled to seek a refuge in the harbour of St. Jean de Luz, in the Gulf of Mexico. While refitting here and taking in provisions, the Spanish admiral came creeping in with a dozen men-of-war, and quietly anchored alongside the English ships. After an interchange of courtesies and compliments lasting for nearly a week, during which the Spaniards planted masked batteries around the whole of the harbour, the admiral thought that his time had come for action. Even with his twelve big ships he had been afraid to attack the daring English sea-captain, whose very name was a terror to Spanish ears, and he resolved, therefore, to conquer by perfidy. In the dead of night, when all were asleep on board the English vessels, the Spanish batteries opened fire upon them, without the least hint or notice of warning being given. John Hawkins and his men, utterly unprepared as they were, fought desperately for their lives, and in the teeth of the cannon thundering from the shore and the Spanish war-vessels, and surrounded by fire-ships let loose at the mouth of the harbour, they succeeded in cutting their way out in small boats, leaving the enemy to scramble for their immense treasure. Arrived in the open sea, their situation was nearly as desperate as before, being short of food and water, so that after sailing northward for a day they were compelled to seek the shore again. A landing was effected, and a few provisions gathered, but before the greater number of the men were able to reach the boats, they saw themselves surrounded by soldiers, and, chained hand and foot, were led away as prisoners. John Hawkins, in a small bark with Francis Drake and a few companions, looked on from the sea; and the last of the Englishmen having been dragged off by the Spanish troops, he spread his tattered sail, and went to the helm, steering north-east. Three weeks after, on one of the first days of January, 1569, a little boat, a mere wreck of the ocean, came running into Plymouth Harbour, and half-a-dozen ragged men, hunger in their faces, jumped ashore. After a short rest, the youngest of the crew took to horse, galloping away on the road to London. Arrived in the capital, the youth demanded an audience of the queen, saying his name was Francis Drake, and he was serving under John Hawkins. The same evening Francis Drake stood face to face with Queen Elizabeth. He told her, with trembling lips, that the Spaniards had robbed her of a million, and that English sailors had been beaten on the sea.

Now Elizabeth was ready for war. She sent for Cecil, ordering him to convene the privy council, and to prepare all things for sending help to the oppressed Flemings, whose envoys had been lingering about the court for months. But Cecil looked grave and doubtful. He informed Elizabeth that however much inclined to follow the course proscribed by her, the occasion was not fitting. By the laws of Spain, which he was bound to obey when attempting to trade with Spanish colonies, John Hawkins had become a pirate, and being treated as such, he had no reason to complain, nor the government of which he was a subject. The argument was too strong for Elizabeth to deny it; however she insisted upon retaliation, and Cecil promised to consider the subject. Advice was not wanting, and among others a most excellent scheme was propounded by William Hawkins, brother of John. When the storm-tossed bark of the bold slave-trader returned to Plymouth, there was lying in the harbour a Spanish ship, under a Captain Francesco Diaz, with eight hundred thousand ducats on board, destined for the army of the duke of Alva. The vessel had been chased into Plymouth by French and Flemish cruisers, fitted out by the

PLYMOUTH LIGHTHOUSE.

Huguenots of La Rochelle and the Calvinists of Antwerp; and, to prevent its being fetched away by men-of-war, William Hawkins proposed to her majesty's government to lay hands upon it. All Plymouth, the brave William assured Cecil, was anxious "to stay King Philip's treasure till recompence was made," and "if it did not please her majesty to meddle in the matter, although she herself was the greatest loser therein," yet he hoped "her majesty would give her subjects leave to meddle with it." Elizabeth was delighted with the plan of recouping herself thus easily, and though Cecil did not at all admire it, he had to consult the officer in command at Plymouth, Vice-Admiral Sir Arthur Champernowne, on the feasibility of the undertaking. Sir Arthur, holding with the brothers Hawkins and others that the universe belonged to Englishmen, was enthusiastically in favour of the scheme of robbing King Philip. "I will not only take it in hand to good effect," was his reply to Cecil, "but also receive the blame thereof unto myself, to the end so great a commodity should redound to her grace. For great pity it were that such a booty should escape her grace; and surely I am of that mind that anything taken from that wicked nation is both necessary and profitable to our commonweal."

This was exactly Elizabeth's opinion, and the vice-admiral, having recommended "his boy Henry" as a suitable individual to help carrying the little affair to a successful end, orders were despatched that he and the "boy" and the Hawkinses, with other patriots willing to assist, should set to work at once. Sir Arthur and his Plymouth friends were beside themselves for joy at receipt of the gracious royal command, and without losing a minute swooped down like hawks, not only upon the treasure-ship of Francesco Diaz, but upon every Spanish vessel at anchor from Mount's Bay to Spithead.

The seizure was effected in the most extraordinary manner, as described by Captain Francesco Diaz, in a letter sent post haste to the Spanish ambassador in London, Don Gerald de Espes, successor of de Silva, recalled a month before. "The vice admiral of these ports," Diaz wrote to Don Gerald, "sent for us, and insisted that as long as we had treasure on board, he could not be answerable for its safety, and that for our own sakes, as well as for our master's, it must be unloaded at the ports. We declined to consent, whereupon he left us under guard at his own house, went to our ships with his people, and took from our ships sixty-four chests of treasure, which he deposited in the town-hall. Then he searched in like manner all the Spanish and Flemish ships in the harbour, broke up the cargoes, and took out whatever he pleased, small and great. He ill-used our sailors, beating some, and throwing others into the sea, then distributed us all in different prisons, saying that we should be held to exchange for the Englishmen who had been taken by the Spaniards. I asked him why he used such cruelty with his majesty's subjects, when Spain and England were at peace. He told me I ought to thank him for being more merciful than the duke of Alva, who had cut off the heads of divers Englishmen in Flanders. Then I heard that many more were cast into prison at other ports, while heretics were sent to preach the heathen Gospel to them." The rage of the Spanish ambassador at the receipt of this report was boundless. The loss of the treasure-chests was serious enough, but the preaching of the "heathen Gospel" to good Catholics infinitely aggravated the outrage, and it seemed to him that not a moment should be lost to take revenge. Drawing up a short statement of the insult committed against the majesty of Spain, he forthwith despatched a messenger in a swift boat across the Channel to the duke of Alva, desiring him to take immediate reprisals. The duke, who anxiously expected the money on the way from Spain, required little stimulation, and instantly laid hold of every English vessel within his reach, and cast every English subject he could seize into the dungeons of the inquisition. Mounted couriers then sped across France to Spain, urging King Philip to declare war against England.

The storm burst so suddenly as utterly to bewilder Elizabeth. When ordering or permitting the seizure of Spanish cash, in deep despair at the loss of her own, she had been far from contemplating all the consequences of the step, and the proceedings of Alva therefore came to throw her into the utmost perplexity. Sending for Don Gerald de Espes, she feebly attempted to make excuses, disavowing to some extent the act of confiscation at Plymouth and the other south-western ports, and declaring her readiness to consider the treasure taken from the Spanish vessels and delivered into her hands as a loan. But Philip's envoy, with all the pride and insolence of his nation, would hear of no apologies, and became rude and offensive to a degree that the queen fairly lost her temper. Turning her back upon him, she went to address Cecil and the lords of the privy council, commanding them to order the instant seizure of every Spaniard and every bale of Spanish goods within the city of London, in retaliation of the course taken by the duke of Alva in the Netherlands. The order, given late in the afternoon, was executed with marvellous speed, showing its extreme popularity. At eleven o'clock in a stormy January night, the lord mayor and aldermen of London went the round of the city, and knocking at the door of every merchant or trader subject of King Philip, sealed up the goods, and carried the unfortunate owners, mostly Jews, from their warm beds into the cold Fleet Prison. It was a sorry mode of warfare, yet not at all unsatisfactory to Queen Elizabeth. Casting up her accounts, she found that she had very much the advantage over King Philip, her Jews being worth a great deal more than the merchants kidnapped by the duke of Alva. The ladies at court were very merry on the subject, which was indeed extremely comical to all parties—except the Jews.

Alva's invitation to Philip to declare war was not responded to as expected. Extremely cautious in all his movements, the king considered that, before commencing hostilities against England, it would be well to settle matters in the Netherlands, and the state of affairs here not being very promising, a postponement of warlike proceedings seemed the safest course. In the meantime, and while continuing with energy the work of murder against the Protestant Flemings, who, recovered from their first stupor, had begun to rally around the prince of Orange, one of their stadholders, Philip made use of the influence he possessed among the Roman Catholics to stir up sedition, so as to prepare the ground for the ultimate attack. The time was favourable in many respects, the trial of Mary Stuart having furnished a rallying-point to the papal party, and King Philip thought it still more propitious than it was in reality from the reports of his ambassador, who informed him that there was only one great enemy to conquer. "It is Cecil," Don Gerald wrote to his master, after the seizure of Spanish goods, "who rules all now, and prompts the villain tricks which trouble us. No words can tell the depth of Cecil's heresy, and as he sees the Protestant cause going to the ground in Flanders and France, he grows furious, as if possessed by ten thousand fiends." Then, giving a full-length portrait of the chief of the heretics, the ambassador went on.—"This Cecil is a man of low extraction, cunning, false, malicious, full of deceit, and so true an Englishman that he thinks all the sovereigns of Christendom cannot conquer this island. He it is who governs all. He is diligent and acute, but never keeps faith or word, thinking we are none of us a match for him." To get rid of this terrific antagonist, the envoy proposed to raise an insurrection among the Catholics in the northern counties of England, which, if completely attaining its end, would instal Mary Stuart on the throne, but even if only partially successful might lead to the fall of the "true Englishman." The counsel of Don Gerald quite agreed with the views of Philip, and a convoy of priests and Jesuit agents, well supplied with money and proclamations, was forthwith despatched from the head-quarters of Alva to the north of England.

The king of Spain was quick, yet not quick enough for his English antagonist. Before Alva's emissaries had effected a landing in Yorkshire, Cecil laid hold of Don Gerald, centre of all intrigues, and busy weaver of the great spider's net which was to swallow up heresy and heretics together. The correspondence found in the house of Philip's ambassador fully revealed the machinations that had been going on for some time to create an opposition against the government, particularly in the ranks of the nobility and among men supposed to be possessed of any influence. But it was some satisfaction to Cecil to discover from the documents that the conspirators already gained over were split into two parties, the one, more especially patronized by King Philip, aiming at a slowly-prepared general rising, to pave the way for a Spanish invasion and a persecution of Protestants, like that in the Netherlands, and the other desirous, in the first instance, of his own overthrow. To defeat the latter faction, vanguard, in many respects, of the former, became the more immediate task of Cecil. His chief enemies were the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, and Westmoreland, who had gained over the duke of Norfolk with the bait of securing his marriage with Mary Stuart if they succeeded, and the earl of Leicester by the hope that Elizabeth might give him her hand, once the chief enemy of the alliance was thrust aside. Composed of such incongruous elements, with private objects predominating over general interests, Cecil had no great difficulty in overcoming his opponents one by one. Norfolk, weak-minded, vain, and greedy, was separated at once from his associates by the promised grant of some estates in Norfolk, and Northumberland and Westmoreland were kept at bay by being closely watched, with the threat of impeachment hanging over them in case they should give the slightest sign of rebellion. Leicester alone, secure in the favour of Elizabeth, seemed fairly determined to accomplish the overthrow of Cecil by the bold step of arresting him in the midst of the privy council, on the charge of being a traitor to his country by dragging England, against the wish of the queen and the nation, into a war with Spain. This extraordinary scheme grew out of the ever vacillating mood of Elizabeth, who, after the first bold steps against King Philip, had fallen into prolonged fits of despondency. To new envoys sent by the Huguenots of France, imploring her aid, she kept crying, excitedly, "Je ne veux point la guerre! Je ne veux point la guerre!"—"I will have no war—while the members of the privy council had to hear, in her own energetic language, that "she cursed those who had tempted her to take the Spanish treasure: she wished the devil had flown away with them." However, Leicester, who based upon all this the plan of violently overthrowing Cecil, proved but that he knew very little of the real character of the royal lady, so much attached to him. There were two natures in Elizabeth—the woman and the queen, the first bending towards the handsome courtier, and the second towards the wise statesman. Often enough the former predominated; but it was the lasting glory of Elizabeth's reign that in any great emergency the woman was sacrificed to the queen.

The preparations for the arrest of Cecil were all complete by the end of April. As a preliminary movement, Leicester obtained the release from custody of the Spanish ambassador, allowing him to set afresh to the weaving of his big spider-net. Don Gerald went to work with a hearty good-will, and succeeded in bringing up the lost or strayed friends, Norfolk, Westmoreland, and Northumberland. Norfolk was greatly in want of money, and Leicester hinting at the desirability of cash, Don Gerald procured six thousand pounds in good golden ducats from Spain, and, dividing it between them, told them to be quick about their business. The arrangement was that Norfolk, as premier peer of England, should raise his voice in the privy council, in the queen's presence, and charge Cecil with treason, whereupon, on a given signal, other lords were to come forward to arrest him and give him over to the guards to be carried to the Tower. But Norfolk, bold as a lion in talking of his forthcoming deeds, got timid as a hare when the hour arrived for execution. Three times the conspirators went to the council intending not to leave till they had sent Cecil to the Tower, and three times they came away without having done the least thing towards effecting their object. Cecil sat there so calm and grand, so seemingly secure in the fulness of his power, that not only Norfolk's faint heart but the courage of the other plotters broke down under the trial of standing up as accusers, with the imminent peril of becoming, instead of making, prisoners. At last, the earl of Leicester, who kept watching his mistress in all her movements, and upon whom the conviction began to dawn that even his handsome person might suffer the grip of the Tower guards if seriously attempting the overthrow of Cecil, informed his friends that the time had gone by for action, and that before proceeding further they must procure further help from abroad. This meant more supplies from the Spanish ambassador; but the latter was furious at the utter failure of a scheme so well paid for beforehand, and swore they should not have another ducat till fairly earning it. "These men are cowards," Don Gerald wrote to his master, "and their spirit failed at the very time they wanted it. To me they excused themselves by saying that so many of the council had dipped their hands in Spanish plunder that they could not count upon support, but the truth is they are poor cravens." There was not much for Philip to hope in the invasion of England from such allies.

But the dangers of Cecil were not over with the evaporation of the plot for his arrest. The spirit of insurrection, stirred by foreign emissaries, was rife among the Catholic population in the northern counties, and at the end of the summer of 1569 an outbreak seemed ready at every moment. One of the principal features of the movement, as revealed in intercepted despatches to the Spanish ambassador, was the forcible release of Mary Stuart and her proclamation as sovereign of England. To prevent the success of this part of the scheme, orders were sent for closely guarding and watching the captive queen, so as to prevent her escape. Mary had been allowed, during the summer of 1569, to exchange the close air of Tutbury Castle for a more pleasant residence at Wingfield Manor House, a property of the earl of Shrewsbury; but the sudden departure of the duke of Norfolk from London in the middle of September furnishing strong suspicions, that a rescue was to be attempted, she was taken back to her old quarters in such a hurry that even her train was left behind. The implication of Norfolk in this new intrigue was chiefly the work of the ever active Don Gerald, who, by exciting his imagination with fresh hopes of a crown in store for him so he would but stretch out his hand to take it, made him run down to his estates in the eastern counties, seriously intending to raise his men and join the great revolt of the north. But arriving at his residence of Kenninghall, near Norwich, and finding that the insurrection had not yet commenced, and that moreover his guiding star, the queen of Scots, was again safely locked up in Tutbury Castle, despair once more seized the poor duke, and he sat down to pen a humble letter to Elizabeth, stating that he had fallen very ill, which had been the reason of his sudden departure from court without taking leave of her majesty. For all reply, a royal summons arrived, ordering him to return to London "without manner of excuse." Norfolk obeyed immediately, against all the entreaties of his retainers and servants, who clung to him with the affection due to the scion of an ancient house, kissing his hands when riding away, and crying that they were ready to face death for his sake. The duke did not go absolutely without fear of being punished for his abortive attempt to rescue Mary, but he trusted to his influence in the privy council, and to the secret connection with Leicester, against the punishment coming to more than a sharp reprimand or a fine. However, a few hours sufficed to show Norfolk that he was mistaken. Cecil, thinking that further leniency towards the vain and foolish conspirators who were constantly trying to disturb the peace of the realm would be criminal, had him arrested on his way to town, and in the evening of the day after he had left his own territory the gates of the Tower closed behind the premier peer of England. Arundel and several other lords implicated with him were taken into custody at the same time.

The energetic seizure of the duke of Norfolk did not entirely quench the fire prepared by King Philip's emissaries. Don Gerald, playing higher stakes than any of his English partners, but confident that, whatever might happen, he would save his head, was determined to have his money's worth of revolution. Instead of pitying the poor duke whom he had brought to the Tower, he charged his timidity with being the cause of all previous failures, and incited the other nobles to compensate for it by instant action. The plan of it was sketched in a notable letter of the ambassador to his royal master, dated October 8, 1569. "The earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Derby." Don Gerald informed Philip, "and the whole Catholic body, are furious at the cowardice which the duke of Norfolk has shown. The earl of Northumberland's servant, who was here a while ago about this business, has returned to me, and I have also letters in cipher from the bishop of Ross. The sum of their reports to me is that they will take forcible possession of the queen of Scots. They will then make themselves masters of the northern counties, re-establish the Catholic religion, and restore to your majesty whatever prizes have been taken from your majesty's subjects now in the harbours of these coasts. They hope that, when the queen of Scots is free, they may be supplied with a number of arquebusemen from the Low Countries, which request I have referred to the duke of Alva." The scheme, neat and simple as it was, failed unfortunately at the very outset. To place Mary Stuart at the head of the insurrection was the first part of the programme, for the execution of which a stratagem had been imagined. Tutbury Castle, a strong castellated mansion, guarded by five hundred troops, and in a Protestant county, could not be approached easily; and the countess of Northumberland, a zealous Catholic, had hit upon the plan of making her way into the castle in the disguise of a nurse, intending to change her attire with the captive queen, and thus allow her to escape. The countess got safely in, but did not get out again, nor Mary in her place. So far from assisting the Catholic rebels, the scheme did great harm to them, the countess, under the influence of fear, betraying many of their movements, particularly the intentions of her husband. In order to prevent any further attempt at rescue, forcible or otherwise, Mary Stuart was taken a few days after, in the midst of soldiers, and led to Coventry. It was the fourth English prison of the queen of Scotland.

As far as things had gone now, and in view of all the preparations of the government, it seemed almost madness on the part of the Roman Catholics to attempt a rising, and the chief leaders of the plot made men to abandon it. However, the foreign element which had begun the movement was more active than ever, and determined for any desperate venture. The influence of the priests sent by Alva had been greatly strengthened by the arrival of a delegate direct from the pope, Dr. Nicholas Morton, bearing the title of Apostolical Penitentiary, and his decision that an insurrection should take place was regarded as final. Accordingly, the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, who had taken flight from London before the arrest of Norfolk, were made to draw the sword in what they considered the holy cause. Northumberland, a very amiable, but exceedingly weak man, would gladly have stood aloof, and felt half-inclined to refuse obedience to the dictates of the church, but was drawn into the turmoil of war by an almost ludicrous accident. Resting at his princely mansion at Topcliff, in Yorkshire, he was startled in the dead of night by the clang of swords and the clatter of horsehoofs on the road approaching his residence, and in the belief that the royal troops were approaching to take him prisoner, he jumped out of the window, and went off at full speed on a ready-saddled horse to Brancepath Castle, the dwelling of the earl of Westmoreland. The latter, ready to take the field, expressed great delight to behold his noble friend, not deeming otherwise but that he had come with warlike intentions, there being no enemy within twenty miles. Thus entrapped, Northumberland, for his own reputation, was compelled to assume warrior airs, and consented in silent despair that his own retainers should unite at once with those of Westmoreland and the other Catholic nobles of the northern counties, including the heads of the ancient families of Dacre, Norton, Markenfield, and Tempest. On the 16th of November the two earls and their friends left Brancepath Castle, at the head of five hundred horsemen and as many foot soldiers, to raise the flame of another civil war in England.

The first steps of the insurgents were crowned with success. All along the road from Brancepath to Durham, a distance of four miles, the population flocked in crowds around the standard of Westmoreland, and the cathedral city itself, chiefly inhabited by Roman Catholics, opened its gates the same day. The Apostolical Penitentiary, too, was waiting at Durham, and under his guidance the cathedral was taken possession of, the Bible and Prayer-book solemnly burnt, the communion-table broken to pieces, and priests, crucifixes, and images of saints restored to their old places. After staying several days in the city, during which reinforcements kept pouring in from all directions, Westmoreland marched his troops, now more than six thousand strong, with about one thousand horse, southwards towards Richmond, in Yorkshire, which was occupied without resistance, as well as Allerton and Ripon. The only opposition met with on the road from Durham to Richmond and Ripon, was at Barnard Castle, garrisoned by a few hundred men under Sir Richard Bowes, who refused to surrender, but, being short of provisions, had to capitulate at the end of a fortnight. So far the march of Westmoreland's army had been completely victorious, owing chiefly to the sympathies of the population with the rebel cause, represented by a banner showing Jesus Christ on the cross, with his five bleeding wounds. The attraction of this banner, however, and of the Apostolical Penitentiary marching in the shade of it, came to an end at Borough-bridge, a few miles south of Ripon. Westmoreland, arrived here, heard that about five thousand royal troops, under the earl of Warwick, were coming up in forced marches from Nottingham and Sheffield, and he thereupon beat a hasty retreat northward, attempting to gain the mouth of the Tees, where a body of Spanish soldiers, despatched by Alva, were expected to land. The Tees was reached, and Hartlepool taken, but the Spaniards came not, their trip being checked by half a-dozen men-of-war leisurely cruising between the Scheldt and the Thames. Seeing no hope of foreign assistance, and mistrusting his own forces, who commenced disbanding faster than they had assembled as soon as the rumour of a possible encounter with the royal troops had spread, Westmoreland marched back to Durham, to hear one more mass at the cathedral. On the 16th of December, exactly a month after the commencement of the insurrection, the rebel crowd still in arms was called together by sound of bugle, and each man told to get home and hide himself as best he might. Westmoreland, Northumberland, the Penitentiary, and the other leaders, sacred and profane, set the example of self-preservation by turning their faces at once towards the Border, which they were lucky enough to reach. Westmoreland, arrived in Scotland, found an asylum in one of the strongholds of Lord Hume; but Northumberland, less fortunate, was kidnapped a little north of the Cheviot Hills by a brave freebooter, known as Hecky Armstrong, who shut him up in an old tower to see what money could be made out of a fast-riding English earl. He had already sent a messenger south to ask how much Queen Elizabeth would give for him, when the regent interfered, and by threats and bribes induced Hecky to deliver Northumberland to him, on which the prisoner was installed in the vacant apartments of Lochleven Castle. Thus all the chiefs of the rebellion escaped, leaving the poor dupes whom they had seduced behind for punishment. It proved a lesson not soon forgotten in the northern counties.

Mary Stuart's position, after the defeat of the insurrection, became very critical. There was no want of proofs showing that she had been actively engaged in stirring up the revolt, and that without her for a centre, on which hung the hopes of all popish fanatics in the realm, it could never have taken place. But the perplexity of Cecil what to do with this passionate woman, unscrupulous like a hardened criminal and revengeful like a fiend, was greater than ever. To put her upon trial for participation in the rebellion seemed impolitic, and to pass sentence upon her for the murder of her husband was not possible, the crime having been committed beyond the queen's jurisdiction. On the other hand, to keep her in perpetual imprisonment—the decision silently arrived at—was becoming more and more perilous, no walls appearing strong enough to prevent her intrigues from penetrating, as long as there remained hundreds of thousands of bigoted enthusiasts in England looking upon her as a religious martyr, and ready to make her name the standard of revolt whenever it might suit the objects of French priests, Spanish Jesuits, or apostolical penitentiaries. There seemed only one convenient way of disposing of the august culprit, dangerous when at liberty and almost equally dangerous when caged, and that was to send her back to Scotland, to be tried for murder and to be punished like any ordinary criminal. The dictates of justice alike and of good policy prescribed this step being taken, and Cecil would have carried it out but for the strong opposition of the queen. Although she herself had no scruples to judge her royal sister and to keep her in gaol, her notions of the divine right of princes were too strong to allow her to consent that Mary should be tried by her own subjects, with the high probability of being condemned to death. However, Elizabeth felt not altogether disinclined to deliver her prisoner up to the regent, on his promise that she should not be tried but kept in safe custody for the term of her life. Negotiations to the effect were commenced, immediately after the subjugation of the northern rebellion, between Cecil and Murray, and promised to come to a successful end, when a frightful event put a sudden stop to them. The event, in some respects, was a consequence of the negotiations. To Mary Stuart no fate appeared more dreadful than that of becoming once more the prisoner of her subjects; her fear and her pride alike opposed it, and she resolved to strain all her energies to prevent the surrender from taking place. Two ways offered themselves to the widow of Darnley, as simplest after her own mode of action, to attain the end—to get rid of Cecil, or else to get rid of Murray. The latter appeared somewhat easier than the former, as well as a little more advantageous, and therefore gained the royal approbation. It was resolved to murder the regent of Scotland.

The assassination once settled, no difficulty was met with in selecting the assassin. Among her former subjects, Mary knew from experience, were men enough willing to commit murder for decent pay; but the individual who most prominently offered himself for the particular object in hand was one James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh. A villain of the deepest dye, notorious for his crimes, he had the additional advantage of being nephew to the archbishop of St. Andrew's, the intimate friend of Bothwell, which relationship, together with that to the chiefs of the Hamilton clan, offered immense facilities in the choice of assistants. The renown of James Hamilton had reached even King Philip, who, at the very moment when he was chosen to kill Murray, had his eyes upon him for assassinating the prince of Orange, greatest enemy of the holy apostolical church in the Netherlands. Without refusing the latter work, Hamilton decided on serving his own friends first, the more so as he had deep reason to be grateful to Murray, and heretofore hated him with all his heart. He had been taken a prisoner at Langside, and been pardoned by the regent, against the counsel of Morton, Glencairn, and others, who, fully acquainted with the character of the man, advised to have him shot at once for the benefit of the country. To wipe out this obligation, Hamilton entered with great eagerness upon the scheme of killing Murray, and the pecuniary matters connected with the work having been arranged to his satisfaction, he set out upon its execution in the middle of January. To help him to get at the regent in an easy way, the Hamiltons enticed the latter to Dumbarton, on the pretence that the castle, perched like an eagle's nest on the top of a rock, and which, held by Lord Fleming, had never yet opened its gates to him, should be formally delivered over to the government. Murray went into the snare, yet with no advantage to the assassin lying in wait for him. It was the prime object of Hamilton to save his own skin while killing the regent; and not meeting with a good opportunity of accomplishing both ends at the same time, he kept sneaking in the rear of his victim without daring to approach too near. Murray having gone on the road to Dumbarton as far as Glasgow, and discovering here that he had been deceived by Lord Fleming and the other Hamiltons, retraced his steps to the capital, travelling by way of Stirling, to see the young king. This done, in the afternoon of the 22nd of January he quitted Stirling, and the same night slept at Linlithgow. The assassin was following close in his track.

Linlithgow, the birthplace of Mary Stuart, was chosen by Hamilton as the fittest spot where to kill her brother and supposed greatest enemy. In the year 1570, much as for centuries after, Linlithgow consisted of one long narrow street, extending along the road from Stirling to Edinburgh, lined by ancient houses with overhanging gables. In one of these dwellings the regent took up his residence in the night from the 22nd to the 23rd of January, while four doors off to the east James Hamilton hid himself in a dwelling belonging to his uncle the archbishop of St. Andrew's. It was a house proper as if made for the dark deed to be accomplished within. Railed in front, with a long wooden balcony running along the first floor on a level with the window, and doors below heavy like those of a fortress, it was completely barricaded off towards the street, while a staircase behind led directly into the garden, at the end of which was a little-frequented lane, turning through the fields into the high road. No better place could possibly be found than this for murdering a man and running away; and Hamilton, having ascertained that the regent would have to pass within three or four yards from the wooden balcony, on account of the narrowness of the street, saw at a glance that here, if anywhere, he might kill with certainty and escape with certainty. His friends were ready to assist him by all possible means, and while Lord Arbroath, aspirant to the hand of Mary Stuart, lent him his best gun, the fleetest horse from the stables of Hamilton Castle was ordered to be stationed in the lane at the end of the garden to carry him away after the gun had done its work. Thus all was ready for the work of murder on the morning of the 23rd of January, when an incident threatened its interruption. Murray had just risen to depart when one of his servants came into his room, imploring him not to pass the house of the archbishop of St. Andrew's in leaving the town, as murderers were lying in wait there. The man had overheard the night before some retainers of the Hamiltons talking about the intended deed, and he trembled lest it should be accomplished. However,

Murray treated the matter lightly, as a mere rumour. He had been warned so often against assassins as to get careless about his secret as well as his open enemies; nor had he any fear, conscious of having always done his duty, and trusting his life into the hands of God. Therefore, with a smile on his lips, he stepped down into the street to get on horseback and ride off towards the fatal house, on the balcony of which, hidden behind a screen, the murderer was cowering already, gun in hand. Once more the faithful servant implored him not to expose his life, and to order at least the suspected dwelling to be searched. The regent again smiled, yet, to oblige his trusty adherent, promised him to quit the town at the other gate, so as not to pass the house indicated. He proceeded to do so, but before having advanced many yards he found the street impassable, stopped by his own guards; and, half-ashamed of his exhibition of timidity, he turned his horse towards the abode of the archbishop of St. Andrew's. Murray intended to ride past at a gallop, but seeing children playing in the street he reined in, afraid to hurt them. At the same moment there was a rustle on the balcony of the archbishop's house, a flash of fire, and the whistling of a bullet, and the regent of Scotland was seen to fall from his horse.

Lifted up by his friends, Murray was carried back to the dwelling which he had left but a few minutes before. His physician having examined the wound and found that the bullet had passed near the heart, injuring vital parts, told him that he must expect death in three or four hours. He received the statement with the greatest calmness. While the regent was lying outstretched in his agony, the people and guards broke into the house in the shelter of which the murder had been committed, but before effecting an entrance, the assassin was far away on his swift steed. However, all knew that Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh had committed the deed; and the friends standing around Murray's bed in their boundless grief could not help lamenting that he should have ever been pardoned. Great on the brink of death as all through life, the regent bid them to still their sorrow and lamentation, declaring that, whatever had happened, "he could never repent of his clemency." Then he spoke on, his breath getting feebler and feebler, exhorting all to be true to God and true to their country, till his words sank into a whisper, and his eyes began to close. When the sun was sinking, "without speaking a reproachful word of any man," Murray's eyes had closed for ever, and Scotland had lost the greatest of its rulers.

The assassin escaped to Hamilton Castle, servants with horses being stationed all along the road, and was received in triumph like a hero by the assembled heads of the house, including the archbishop of St. Andrew's. Mary Stuart, to whom the great news was carried at once, was beside herself for joy, and, returning her fervent thanks to the murderer of her brother, ordered that a pension out of her French dowry should be settled upon him. Her exultation was shared by the whole clan of the Hamiltons, who marched at once upon Edinburgh with all the forces at their disposal, confident that the death of the regent would leave the field free for their ambition. In this expectation they were partly justified, there being for the moment not a person in Scotland sufficiently strong to seize the reins of government dropped from the hands of the murdered man. The foul deed of Linlithgow, and the uncertainty of the future resulting from it, caused a panic everywhere, in the confusion of which the capital was seized by Mary Stuart's adherents, and the earls of Morton, Mar, Glencairn, and others, who attempted to uphold order, driven to the north. To fortify their position, the Hamiltons, directly they had secured Edinburgh, hit upon the bold plan of launching a force across the Border, fully aware that unless they succeeded to establish a connection with Mary's friends in England, there was no chance for them of keeping in power, or of re-establishing Roman Catholicism. The Border raid was undertaken by the lairds of Buccleugh and Fernyhirst, chieftains of the Scots and Kers, who were joined by the fugitive earl of Westmoreland, labouring under the idea that the northern counties would once more rise at his call. However, the only ally he could find after crossing the frontier was Leonard Dacres, a landowner of great influence, but defective both in wisdom and personal courage. Dacres, joining with the borderers, had the momentary triumph of assembling around his person a force of nearly five thousand men, who took up a strong position around his seat, Naworth Castle, eleven miles north-east of Carlisle. The nearest royal force was at Berwick, garrisoned by about one thousand arquebusemen, under Lord Hunsdon, cousin of Elizabeth. As soon as the report of the new revolt had reached him, he started with his handful of men, and after a rapid march arrived early in the morning of the third day in sight of Naworth. Attack was very difficult, a deep ravine cutting off the castle from the road by which the royal forces were approaching; but, disregarding the obstacle, Hunsdon pushed on boldly, determined to dislodge the insurgents at any cost. He had reached a narrow pass between the hills when suddenly the borderers fell upon him in overwhelming force. For a moment destruction seemed all but certain. The royal troops, having marched all the night through, felt scarcely able to drag their weary limbs along, while the enemy, fresh and strong from the castle, had all the advantage of numbers, confidence, and position. There was a slight wavering perceptible for a minute or two, but it lasted no longer, and on the word of command being given, the arquebusemen of Berwick ranged in line of battle. "Fire!" cried Hunsdon; and down went a broad strip of the advancing rebel army, and the fierce shouts of the borderers gave way to sudden silence. "Fire!" the commander cried once more, and a second line of stalwart bodies dropped to the ground, while the rest turned on their heels, seeking safety in flight. Leonard Dacres himself had not ventured forward with his men, preferring to watch their doings from the tower of his castle; yet he no sooner saw them fly when he set the example of running. As described by an eyewitness: "he fled like a tall gentleman, and never looked behind him till he was in Liddesdale." He did not run a bit too fast, the "tall gentleman," for on the very Border he was caught hold of by one of Hunsdon's suite, and narrowly rescued by a few good-natured Scots, who, at the risk of their own heads, snatched him from the Englishman and the gallows. Lord Hunsdon would have gladly hung Dacres and some few other chiefs; but they having escaped he showed himself merciful to the rest, and on his suggestion the queen soon after proclaimed a general pardon. It had more effect than a thousand executions would have had in weaning the people of Cumberland from rebellion.

The assassination of Murray did not in any way realize the sanguine expectations founded upon it by Mary Stuart. It gave rise to great expressions of joy at Madrid and at Rome, and the pontiff, to follow up the crusade against eminent heretics, fulminated a bull of excommunication against Elizabeth, cursing her in the usual holy apostolical fashion; but the whole turned out mere empty sound and fury. The thunders of the Vatican had long become harmless, and their only effect this time was that of producing the death of a poor Roman Catholic fanatic aiming at the distinction of becoming a martyr. John Felton, a man possessed of some property in Southwark, thought it his duty to affix the papal bull to the gates of the bishop of London's palace, and being found out, was hung at St. Paul's churchyard, after undergoing horrible tortures. There was no excuse for this cruelty but that its first origin was in the same source which fulminated bulls of excommunication, hired assassins to commit murder, punished independent thought as the greatest of crimes, and lighted stakes and erected scaffolds from one end of Europe to the other. The fierce spirit of persecution into which Roman Catholicism had been launched by its chiefs was gradually bearing its fruit in all directions, engendering the same tendency among opponents, and throwing whole nations back into the night of barbarism. It was a spirit altogether alien to the races inhabiting the greater part of Britain, yet even they, lashed into fury by the report of the terrible butcheries of Protestants committed by such demons as Alva in the Netherlands, and by the wholesale murders of Huguenots in France, now felt the tiger element rising within them. The actions of Elizabeth were among the best expressions of this dreadful temper. No ruler of the period was less inclined by nature than Elizabeth to religious persecution; she had too much suffered herself from it in youth not to see its horrors; besides which her mind was plastic, almost Greek, in viewing men and things, as far as they did not touch her personal interests as a woman and a queen. Yet the fierce breath of the infernal flame lighted at Rome had seized even her by this time. The repeated insurrections planned by priests and Jesuits in the northern counties, the murder of the regent of Scotland, and the endless plots against her own life, gradually begat in her a fierce spirit of intolerance, of which the cruel execution of the poor Southwark fanatic was one of the first signs. It was followed soon by others. A month after John Felton had hung up, and been hung for, the papal bull of excommunication, three persons in Norfolk of the rank of country squires, all Roman Catholics, were discovered as engaged in a conspiracy for overturning the queen's government. Being arrested, and convicted after a summary trial, they were put to a cruel death, amidst the applause of the people. A great upheaving of the Protestant masses, a cry for vengeance, loud and distinct, was heard everywhere. Already there were voices demanding the immediate execution of all popish conspirators, chief among them of Mary Stuart.

Elizabeth was far from being prepared to go to this length; however, the general excitement served to infuse in her an extraordinary amount of energy. The Border revolt having been subdued, but the Hamiltons continuing to hold possession of Edinburgh, she determined to reinstall a Protestant government in Scotland by force of arms. Lord Hunsdon was ordered to enter Scotland on the west, and the earl of Sussex, chief commander of the marches, on the east, from Berwick, the former to relieve Glasgow, besieged by Mary Stuart's party, and the latter to proceed direct to the capital and assist the friends of Murray, acting in the name of the young king. The expedition was quite successful, but marked by a fearful amount of cruelty, burning, and devastation. Here again the newly-risen temper of persecution showed itself in its entire hideousness. All property belonging to Roman Catholics, particularly to men of note, was wantonly destroyed by the troops of Elizabeth; houses, barns, woods, and corn-fields set on fire, and entire districts, fertile and flourishing before, changed into deserts. The end gained was that the Hamiltons were once more driven back to their fastnesses in the western Highlands; while, in want of a better man, the earl of Lennox, father of the murdered Darnley, was installed chief governor, under the title of lieutenant. His nomination took place in March, 1570, two months after the assassination of Murray, but before he had been many weeks in power, new dissensions broke out at Edinburgh, and on the 26th of April Hunsdon and Sussex, who had returned to England, were ordered to cross the Border a second time with all the forces at their disposition. They numbered about eight thousand, and were followed on the 11th of May by nearly two thousand more, under Sir William Drury. The army of invasion was now sufficiently strong to overrun the whole of Scotland, which took place accordingly, in company with the troops under the command of Lennox. They penetrated into Argyll, committing terrible devastations, burning villages and castles, and destroying every dwelling belonging to the hated Hamiltons. Towards the end of June the leaders returned to Edinburgh, and on the 12th of July the earl of Lennox was solemnly proclaimed regent of Scotland. The bulk of the English troops recrossed the Border soon after, yet not without leaving the consciousness in all men's minds that the ancient kingdom of Scotland had virtually become a dependency of England.

Scotland was subdued; but Mary Stuart was not. Taken from one prison to another, surrounded by guards, and watched by spies, she kept on conspiring and plotting, untaught by failure and untouched by remorse, but getting ever more reckless, passionate, and revengeful. Now she had little more to hope in Scotland, and therefore turned her looks once again into England. Her best friends had fallen or run away; yet there were some left still, and among them the noblest by birth among the lords. Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk seemed such an admirable fool, and promised to be such a splendid toy in the hands of a clever woman, that Mary could not keep her eyes off him, and though despising the man with all her heart, resolved to make use of him once more. She sent him affectionate letters while in the Tower, and he responded in gushing declarations of love, the more fervent because imaginary, he having never seen the angel he professed to adore, and of whose virtues the casket papers had given him such a wonderful picture. The correspondence, cleverly managed by priestly agency, had the one effect upon Norfolk of making him more deceitful. While promising Mary Stuart to risk life and blood for her, he at the same moment implored the pardon of Elizabeth, representing himself as a poor miserable wretch, bitterly repenting the past, but resolved to devote his whole future to his sovereign. Loyalty in the Tower was too common a thing to have much effect upon either the queen or Cecil; however, both agreed in the opinion that the premier peer of England was but a man of small wit, not likely to do much harm, and his prayers for release becoming more and more piteous, the order was given to open his prison gates, and allow him to live at Howard House, his own residence, under nominal supervision. But before leaving the Tower, Norfolk had to sign a document promising never to carry on any correspondence or intercourse with Mary Stuart or her friends, engaging his word of honour to the effect, and declaring himself a traitor if breaking the promise. On these conditions the duke was released in the month of August, 1570, and the first thing he did was to enter into secret communication with the bishop of Ross, Mary Stuart's representative. The bishop was specially commissioned by his mistress to invite Norfolk to take part in a great conspiracy, the last production of her fertile brain. It aimed at nothing less than the murder of Elizabeth, the invasion of England by Alva, and the overthrow of the Protestant religion.

The scheme communicated to Norfolk was not at all wild or visionary, but very carefully elaborated, even to its minutest details. Its broad features were the assassination of Elizabeth, Cecil, Leicester, Bacon, and two or three other members of the privy council, at a banquet, by hired bravos supplied by Alva, the proclamation of Mary Stuart as queen of England, and the simultaneous landing of a Spanish army, to take possession of the capital. The part destined to the duke of Norfolk in this undertaking was rather important. Fully conscious that King Philip, whatever else might be his opinions of her, could scarcely consider her a successful plotter, Mary Stuart had hit upon the idea of putting Norfolk forward as prime mover of the great scheme, which was to be represented as emanating, in the first instance, from the English nobility, utterly dissatisfied with the English government. Blindly, almost like an idiot, the duke consented to take the part assigned to him, the great reward held out being the hand of her whom he was to lift to a throne. Having obtained the concurrence of the most important personage in the great enterprise, the bishop of Ross, after conferring with his mistress, went a step further by appointing the chief agent. Among the friends of Mary Stuart in London was a rich Italian banker, a relative of the illustrious Medici family, Robert Ridolfi, who had acted several times as the secret agent of the captive queen, and aspired to the honour of serving her in some more important capacity. To him Leslie applied, and finding him willing to risk not only his whole fortune but his head in the new undertaking, a pact to the effect was concluded and settled at the Spanish embassy, King Philip's envoy taking, as always so now, a deep interest in every movement directed against the government at which he was accredited. Ridolfi left London for Antwerp towards the end of March, 1571, carrying with him a minute scheme of the conspiracy, drawn up in the name of the duke of Norfolk, and signified as approved of by Mary Stuart, the bishop of Ross, and Don Gerald. This plan was to be laid before the pope and King Philip. In company with Ridolfi, and as a spy over him, travelled John Hamilton, brother of James, the assassin of Murray, whom Mary Stuart had nominated her private secretary. He was intrusted with a private letter of his mistress to the duke of Alva, in which the latter was addressed as "the defender and refuge of the Catholic church." Mary implored him to give his assistance to the plans prepared by her friends, conceived, she said, "for the cause of God," and which, if duly executed, would lay "all this island," or two kingdoms, "at the feet of the king of Spain."

Ridolfi had an interview with Alva at Brussels on the last day of March. After laying before him the outline of the conspiracy, he produced a roll of the English nobility, professing to emanate from the duke of Norfolk, premier peer of the realm, showing the political and religious tendencies of every member. According to this list, two-thirds of the nobles were hostile to Elizabeth, one-sixth neutral as between her and Mary Stuart, and only one-sixth friendly to the existing government. The statistics were made to impress Alva, and they did so to some extent; but he nevertheless looked with some suspicion upon his visitor. Trusting none but soldiers, he thought, not unjustly, that an enterprise such as the invasion and conquest of two kingdoms ought not to be planned and managed by such a miserable creature as a banker. Besides, Ridolfi talked a little too much, and the president of the Council of Blood liked men of few words. He therefore dismissed Mary Stuart's agent by telling him he had better go direct to King Philip, if he, his master, ordered him to invade England the thing would be done, otherwise there was nothing more to be said. In parting, Alva gave his visitor the broad hint to utter no more words than strictly necessary in the course of his travels through France, Italy, and Spain; but he promised at the same time to communicate his plan to the king, and to give his opinion upon it. Thus Alva did immediately in a despatch to Philip. After expressing his dissatisfaction that the friends of Mary Stuart should have deputed such a "parlanchin," or chatterbox, as the Italian banker on a most important business, he expressed his general approval of it in moderate terms. "Considering," Alva wrote, "the pity and interest with which the unworthy treatment of the queen of Scotland and her adherents cannot fail to inspire your majesty; considering the obligation under which you are placed by God to obtain, by all means in your power, the triumphant restoration of Catholicism in these islands; considering, moreover, the injuries which the queen of England has done to your majesty and your subjects, without any hopes of bringing about a better state as long as she reigns: it appears to me that the plan of the queen of Scotland and the duke of Norfolk, if properly carried out, would be the best method of remedying the evil." Coming from a man like Alva, these were remarkable expressions, showing that the hopes of Mary Stuart's friends were based on something more than idle dreams. As long as the greatest general of the mightiest king of Europe held that there was an obligation to God to restore Roman Catholicism in England "by all means," English Protestants had to keep their hand to the sword.

From Brussels Ridolfi bent his steps to Rome. The holy father, Pius V., received him with open arms, rejoicing at the good news from England. To bring the island kingdom back to true religion was the great dream of his life; and it was no small grief to him that all his efforts hitherto had been so ineffectual, even the greatest of Rome's war-engines, the bull of excommunication, which ought to have hurled Elizabeth from the throne at once, and extinguished heresy for ever, having had no other effect than that of leading one poor orthodox gentleman to the gallows. Anything more hopeful than the message of Ridolfi had not come to the Vatican for a long time, and Pius V. on the instant summoned a conclave to deliberate upon it. Nearly all voices were in favour of the proposal of killing the heretic queen and re-establishing the true faith under Alva's assistance, a few, nevertheless, among the more cautious of the cardinals ventured a feeble opposition, arguing that, if unsuccessful, a Spanish invasion of the island realm would not only strengthen the cause of heresy there, but in France, Germany, and the Netherlands. But doubts such as these were annihilated at once by the exclamation of the pontiff that "God would manage it," which allowed no further discussion without doubts being thrown on the infallibility of Christ's vicar. It was resolved unanimously to recommend the execution of Ridolfi's plan to the king of Spain as an affair of religion allowing no postponement. To this recommendation Pius V. added a letter under his hand. "Our dear son Robert Ridolfi," the pontiff wrote, "by the help of God will lay before your majesty certain things which interest not a little the honour of Almighty God and the advantage of the Christian commonwealth. We require and beseech your majesty to grant him on this account and without hesitation your most entire confidence; and we conjure you especially, by your fervent piety towards God, to take to heart the matters on which he will treat with your majesty, and to furnish him with all the means most suitable for the execution of his plans. Meanwhile, beseeching your majesty to do this, we pay our Redeemer, from the bottom of our heart, to grant success to that which is projected for his honour and glory." With this letter, and the blessing of the holy father, Ridolfi departed from Rome at the commencement of June, 1571, and after a prosperous voyage landed on the shore of Spain. On the 4th of July Mary Stuart's agent was presented to King Philip II. at the palace of the Escorial.

Philip was fully prepared by the letters of his ambassador in England and of the duke of Alva for the scheme transmitted by Ridolfi. He did not approve it entirely, his natural irresolution standing out against an undertaking so hazardous in all respects; however, the weighty reasons in its favour, and the pressure exercised by his priestly advisers, whose instructions had come from Rome, allowed no hesitation. The council of state, therefore, was summoned immediately, and met on the 7th of July. The deliberations lasted for more than ten hours, and were faithfully committed to paper, and deposited in the royal archives—for the edification of posterity. All the councillors of state agreed in the opinion, already expressed by the duke of Alva, that the king was bound by his duty to God and the Holy Catholic church to restore the true religion in the British islands, from which it had been driven by damnable heresy, and the only question for discussion was regarding the best means for accomplishing the great object. The duke of Feria, first speaker, declared himself in favour of despatching Alva at once, timing it so as to fall in with the projected assassination of Elizabeth. "The queen of Scotland," the duke exclaimed, "is the true heir—la verdadera sucesora—to the realm of England, and if we allow her to be crushed, we entail destruction on all good Catholics. The proximity of the duke of Alva to the English shore settles all difficulties, and not an instant must be lost in preparing the invasion." Ruy Gomez de Silva, prince of Eboli, agreed with Feria as to the necessity of an immediate invasion; but Hernando de Toledo, grand prior of Castile, who spoke next, counselled that before embarking Alva's troops the "true succession" should be settled, that is, the heretic queen be put out of the way. The prior argued, with great shrewdness, that the success of the whole undertaking hinged upon this one point. As long as Elizabeth was alive, he said, the invasion would fail; but this arch-heretic destroyed, with no other successor in the field but the faithful daughter of the church, Mary of Scotland, Alva's conquest would be assured. The arguments of the grand prior made a deep impression upon Philip and all the members of the council, which was increased when the inquisitor general, cardinal archbishop of Seville, gave his full assent to them. Gradually all came round to the same view, that the murder of the queen must precede the invasion, and it only remained to discuss the mode of accomplishing the deed. The grand prior, taking again the lead, proposed to intrust the work to Captain Chapino Vitelli, an officer in Alva's army, already acquainted with England, having been there as an agent from the Netherlands. To this proposal the inquisitor-general warmly assented, and while declaring his personal knowledge of Chapino, added that he had offered to start with a dozen resolute men, to seize the heretic queen in one of her country houses, and to murder her on the spot. The duke of Feria alone expressed a doubt of the feasibility of this plan, arguing that from his acquaintance with English life—being married to a former maid of honour of Queen Mary, one Jane Dormer—it would be all but impossible for a dozen foreigners, unacquainted with Elizabeth's court, to carry out the murder, and he thought it safer to leave it to the arrangements of Norfolk and the bishop of Ross. But this suggestion met with no adherents. On the proposition of the inquisitor-general, Captain Vitelli, who had come all the way from the Netherlands to offer the light of his experience regarding the practicability of assassination, was called before the council to speak for himself. He repeated the words of the cardinal archbishop that he felt certain of being able to kill Elizabeth, with the help of assistants chosen by himself, all determined to accomplish the deed for the eternal glory of God. Vitelli's speech decided the matter, and the council resolved upon recommending to the king the immediate murder of Queen Elizabeth and the invasion of her realm.

While these weighty matters, affecting the happiness and welfare of millions, were being discussed at Madrid, a vague feeling of alarm had spread all over England. Rumours of plots, conspiracies, and revolt were flying about wildly, none being able to tell whence they came and by whom they were propagated. Parliament, after an interval of five years, had met again for the discussion of public affairs, and to vote subsidies to the queen; but although sitting for nearly two months, from the 2nd of April to the 29th of May, the speeches as well as the resolutions bore all the signs of haste, the state of unquiet pervading the nation visibly affecting the members. A strong desire to subdue and repress, even by persecution, all adherents of the old religion represented the chief action of the new parliament, which thus far faithfully expressed the current of popular feeling. Statutes were passed forbidding, under pain of imprisonment, the importation and sale of rosaries, crosses, beads, or pictures "blessed by the bishop of Rome or others acknowledging his authority;" parents were prohibited to send their children to be educated in Roman Catholic schools on the Continent; and the penalty of treason was put upon any attempt to convert Protestants to Roman Catholicism, and upon the publication or distribution of any bulls, orders, or rescripts emanating from the heads of the Catholic church. Another act of the same tendency plainly marked the revulsion of feeling in the public mind relative to the succession of Mary Stuart. While in the preceding parliament her right to the throne had been distinctly admitted, the horror of her doings during the five years, and of the position she had assumed in her prison as chief agent of the pope, of King Philip, and the bloodhounds in the Netherlands, went so far that the members agreed not even to mention her name in the debates, but simply to pass a bill annihilating with a single stroke all her pretensions to the crown. It was declared high treason to affirm by words spoken or written the right of any person to the succession of the crown of England except the "natural issue" of the queen; it was also made high treason to affirm "that the queen was not queen, or that any other person ought to be queen, or that the queen was a heretic, schismatic, tyrant, infidel, or usurper of the crown." Important as was this statute, as well as several of the other acts inaugurating, more or less, a persecution of Roman Catholics, the members of both houses of parliament discussed them in a hurried and inattentive manner; and even Cecil, most hard-working of all the advisers of the crown, paid but slight attention to them. His whole mind for the moment was absorbed by other thoughts. The whisper of another great conspiracy directed against the queen had come to him from the Continent, and he was straining every nerve to obtain a glimpse into the dark mysteries of Ridolfi's journey. As yet Cecil knew not, but he divined, with the intuitive perception of a statesman and of a diplomatist growing grey in intrigue, that the movements of the Italian banker were better worth watching for the time than all bills, motions, and decrees of lords and of commons. The banker, Alva's "parlanchin," had opened his lips sufficient to let Cecil know that he was digging a mine which might hurl into atoms throne and parliament, laws and statutes, and under its ruins bury a nation.

While Cecil was watching Ridolfi's plot, inattentive of parliamentary duties, an unexpected discovery added to his anxiety, failing only by a hair's breadth to uncover the great conspiracy. Towards the end of April, a Scotchman, named Charles Bailly, was arrested at Dover on landing from the Continent, suspected of being implicated in a murder. A parcel of papers and letters written in characters which to the searchers seemed Hebrew, addressed to the bishop of Ross, was found upon the prisoner; and on his giving a very unsatisfactory explanation both of his papers and of himself, he was sent off under guard to the warden of the cinque ports, Lord Cobham, temporarily residing in London to attend in the Upper House. The latter, a friend of the bishop of Ross, showed him the packet under his address, and offered to leave it with him for a night "for examination." Leslie was horror-struck on finding that the letters, written in cipher, but with the key attached, contained a full plan of the conspiracy, in a detail of the conversation of Ridolfi with the duke of Alva, which the imprudent banker had transmitted to Norfolk and Mary Stuart by the messenger arrested at Dover. To secure these important documents and to put others of a harmless nature in their stead was the work of a few hours, after which Lord Cobham had the parcel restored to him, and carried it to the privy council, innocently asserting that the contents might possibly be dangerous. Cecil, after examining the papers, at once had his suspicions of a fraud having been committed, which grew to a certainty after an examination of Bailly, and the discovery of his attempting to correspond with the bishop of Ross. The rack being applied to extort his secrets, Bailly confessed all he knew of the conspiracy, which was not much, but went to show that Ridolfi was commissioned by Mary Stuart, the duke of Norfolk, and the bishop of Ross, and was treating with Alva, the pope, and King Philip. To cut at least one link in the chain, Cecil gave orders for the arrest of the bishop and the search of his papers; but he being far too wily to keep dangerous documents in his possession, there was no lawful ground for retaining him, and he was left under watch at his own residence. It now became Cecil's great object to find more threads of the plot spinning between Brussels, Rome, and Madrid; and, not knowing where else to go, he made an audacious attempt to turn King Philip himself into an informer.

The manner in which he accomplished his object was altogether singular and extraordinary. For some time past John Hawkins, the bold but unfortunate sea-rover whose last voyage to America had ended so fatally, had been importuning the privy council with petitions to save his companions who had been taken prisoners in Mexico from the dungeon and the gallows, but as yet had met with little attention. Cecil now sent for the old sailor, and the two had a long private interview. At the end of it, John Hawkins marched off to the Spanish embassy, applying for a secret audience with Don Gerald. Being admitted, the envoy heard, somewhat to his surprise, that Hawkins was one of the numerous persons in the realm deeply disaffected to the government, seeing that his services had met with no reward, that he had lost all his fortune in trying to make money for Queen Elizabeth, and that he was now on the brink of destitution. Don Gerald listened and believed. He looked so honest, the fine old sea-captain, and his speech was so simple and so firm, and the smell of salt water clung to him so strongly, excluding all ideas of diplomacy and cheating, that his heart warmed at once towards him. Nor did Don Gerald forget that what his country wanted above all things was flesh and blood such as that of the man before him. Spain had soldiers enough to fight her battles on land, but was miserably deficient in sailors, and while whole continents bent under the sceptre of King Philip, the coasts of not one of his realms was safe from the attack of sea-robbers, nor a ship of his treasure-fleets from the toss of pirate vessels. Don Gerald knew all this, and when John Hawkins promised not only his own service but that of fifteen hundred brave sailors willing to serve under him, on the sole condition of being liberally paid, his eyes glistened with delight. That a pirate and a slave-dealer should forsake his country to make money, appeared so natural to Philip's ambassador that for a moment he forgot his usual prudence, and, accepting the proffered service, told his visitor to put himself at once in direct communication with the Spanish government, for which purpose he gave him warm letters of recommendation to the king and several of the ministers. John Hawkins expressed his thanks in brief speech, and withdrew—to have another interview with Cecil.

The day after this interview, George Fitzwilliams, intimate friend of Hawkins, and one of his old lieutenants, set out for Madrid. It was not fear, even of the dungeons of the inquisition, that retained the captain from going in person, but the knowledge that master George could manage the little affair with King Philip better than himself. This proved correct. Philip showed himself far more suspicious than his ambassador, and refused to see master Fitzwilliams; and it was not before the latter had wormed himself into the good graces of the duke of Feria, and, above all, the duchess his countrywoman, that the lieutenant obtained an audience. But even now the king showed reluctance of coming to an agreement, and Fitzwilliams was advised by the duchess of Feria to make a rapid trip to England, and bring back letters of introduction from Mary Stuart, which, she asserted, would overcome all obstacles. Following the advice, carrying messages from the Spanish court to the imprisoned queen, now guarded within the walls of Sheffield Castle, and bringing back ciphered notes—carefully inspected on the way by Cecil—Fitzwilliams reached Madrid once more at the end of July, just after the settlement of Ridolfi's business. As predicted by the duchess of Feria, the king dropped all reserve on the receipt of Mary Stuart's letters, and at once entered into negotiations with the representative of John Hawkins. He freely told the lieutenant of the forthcoming invasion of England, specifying details, and requesting to know the amount of assistance which he could furnish. Fitzwilliams boldly replied that his captain could command the service of sixteen hundred men and four hundred guns, in sixteen vessels, provided the Spanish government would advance to him fifty thousand pounds, sufficient for two months' wages. This the king agreed to do at once, whereupon, seeing his majesty in a liberal mood, master George pluckily asked a few minor favours. The liberation of the crews imprisoned in Mexico had been previously assented to as a matter of course, they being destined to be incorporated with the sixteen hundred men of the new fleet; but, as a complement to this agreement, the lieutenant meekly requested that he himself should have a patent of nobility granted, and that his honoured captain should be made a grandee of Spain of the first class. To this, too, Philip cheerfully assented, rather pleased to find the bold sea rovers so ambitious of his honours. Everything having been satisfactorily arranged, George Fitzwilliams made his bow to King Philip, and, intrusted with letters and messages for Mary Stuart and despatches for the Spanish ambassador, and his pockets full of patents of nobility, of general pardons, and of drafts to the amount of fifty thousand pounds, set sail once more for England. The vessel in which the lieutenant shipped belonged to an old friend, whom he told in confidence that the cruise to Madrid, into King Philip's palace, had been the best trip he ever made in his life.

The day after the landing of the brave lieutenant on native soil, September the 4th, 1571, Captain John Hawkins sat down at his house in Plymouth to pen the following letter to Cecil.—“My very good lord. It may please your honour to be advertised that Fitzwilliams is returned from the coast of Spain, where his message was acceptably received by the king himself, the duke of Feria, and others of the privy council. His despatch and answer was with great expedition, and great countenance and favour of the king. The articles are sent to the ambassador, with orders also for the money to be paid to me by him, for the enterprise to proceed with all diligence. Their project is that my ships should join with the duke of Alva's fleet which he doth secretly provide in Flanders, as well as with the ships which cometh with the duke of Medina out of Spain, and so altogether invade this realm and set up the queen of Scots. They have practised with us for the burning of her majesty's ships; therefore there must be some good care had of them, though not as it may appear that anything is discovered, which your lordship's consideration can well provide. The king hath also sent a ruby of good price to the queen of Scots, with letters which in my judgment were good to be delivered. The letters be of no great importance, but his message by word is to comfort her, and say that the king hath now no other care but to place her in her own. It were good also that the ambassador have granted a request unto your lordship that Fitzwilliams may have access to the queen of Scots, to render thanks for her assistance in the delivery of the prisoners which are now quite at liberty. It will be a very good colour for your lordship to confer with him more largely. I furthermore send your lordship the copy of my pardon from the king of Spain, in the very order and manner I have it. The duke of Medina and the duke of Alva hath each of them one of the same pardons more amplified to present unto me, though this be large enough, together with all my great titles and honours from the king, from which God deliver me. I send your lordship also the copy of my letter from the duke of Feria, in the very manner as it was written, with his wife's and son's hand in the end. Their practices be very mischievous, and they be never idle; but God, I hope, will confound them, and turn their devices upon their own necks. Now I will put my business into some order, and give my attendance upon her majesty to do her that service which by your lordship shall be thought most convenient. I write no more to your lordship because Fitzwilliams cometh himself, and I will not be long after him. And thus I remain your lordship's most faithfully to my power—John Hawkins.” St. Jean de Luz was revenged.

Cecil now breathed freely. He dreaded no longer the underground operations of King Philip and his allies, knowing in which direction the mine was to be sprung; and while Alva was busy gathering a fleet in the Netherlands to invade England, Cecil prepared to give the Spaniards such a thrashing on the road as would spoil their taste for invasion for evermore. However, Cecil was rather too confident for the moment, deeming he had all the threads of the vast conspiracy in his hand, when one very important part was still wanting. King Philip, though gossiping freely with honest George Fitzwilliams, had not dropped a word about the existence of such a man as Captain Ciprino Vitelli, and of his intended trip to England in company with fifteen friends; nor had he uttered even a hint to compromise any other persons dwelling within the dominions of Elizabeth but his own ambassador and Mary Stuart. The duke of Norfolk, nominally the chief figure in the plot, was still residing peaceably at Howard House, and so little suspected by the government that it was contemplated to withdraw the custodians, which, in the guise of attendants, had been placed at his side after his release from the Tower, to ensure the fulfilment of the pact he had entered into not to have any communication with the queen of Scots. This agreement Cecil believed had been fully kept, and it was the merest accident which revealed to him the participation of Norfolk in the plot, together with the entire depth of the mine that had been preparing under his feet. But a few days after Cecil had received John Hawkins's letter, and had seen both the captain and his lieutenant, with great satisfaction on either part, a man called at his house announcing himself as a merchant of Shrewsbury, and desiring an interview. It being granted, the merchant produced a large bag of gold and some papers, which he said he had received from master Higford, secretary to the duke of Norfolk, with instructions to deliver it to the duke's agent in Shropshire, a man named Bannister. Higford, in giving him the bag, had stated its contents to be only fifty pounds' worth of silver; and believing this to be true he had carried it nearly to its destination, when there occurred a breakage, and the bearer, to his surprise as well as consternation, beheld that he had gold instead of silver, and, moreover, a number of letters in cipher. These letters were the most alarming things, and, fearing to be drawn into a dangerous game which might end at the gallows, the merchant hurried back to London and submitted his discovery to Cecil. The latter, not very suspicious at first, thought the matter might be worth inquiring into, and sent for Higford to decipher the letters he had given to the Shrewsbury trader. Norfolk's secretary, a very helpless sort of conspirator, stuttered and stammered, beginning with the assertion that he had lost the key of the cipher, and ending with the statement that it was hidden under the mat at the door of his master's bedroom. Thither Cecil despatched at once some of his expert agents, who brought back not only the missing cipher-key but various notes exchanged between Ridolfi and the duke. This was enough to raise the deepest suspicions; further searches were made, and finally, discovery following discovery, the whole of the letters sent by the queen of Scots to Norfolk, and which she had constantly entreated him to burn, were found in the chinks of an old cupboard at Howard House. Mary Stuart was decidedly unfortunate in corresponding with her lovers, one hiding tremendous secrets in a basket, and the other in a cupboard.

On the first detection of his intercourse with Ridolfi, Norfolk was arrested and carried back to his old quarters in the Tower. Interrogated by several members of the privy council about his share in the conspiracy, he attempted a flat denial; but hearing that the proofs of his guilt were abundant, and that all his servants, Higford, Bannister, and another agent named Barker, had made full confessions on the rack, he fell on his knees, and in abject despondency admitted his guilt and implored the queen's pardon. All time for hesitation having gone by now, Cecil laid his hand upon another important actor in the great plot, the bishop of Ross. Thrown into prison, John Leslie commenced by assuming a high tone, declaring himself privileged as ambassador of the queen of Scots, and responsible for his actions to no one but his mistress. However, his tone changed after the visit of two little gentlemen calling themselves crown-lawyers, who explained to him, in a very mild manner, that representatives of deposed sovereigns had no privileges at all; and that, moreover, ambassadors guilty of fomenting rebellion in the country of their residence, forfeited all protection by the very act, and might be proceeded against like private persons. Such ambassadors, the gentlemen demonstrated, quoting instances, might even be put on the rack without the law being hurt. John Leslie was not a coward, but the word rack made him shudder, and he consented to tell all. Not aware of the extent of the discoveries already made, he disclosed much more than was yet known—disclosed the decision arrived at by the privy council of Philip, the movements of Captain Ciapino Vitelli, the intended landing of a Spanish force at Harwich, among the tenants of the duke of Norfolk, and the preparations made in various parts of England for assisting invasion by revolt. Now, for the first time, Cecil was able to measure the gulf on the bunk of which he had been standing. Rapid action was indispensable for safety, and a number of arrests were decreed immediately, including those of Lord Lumley, friend of Norfolk, Lord Cobham, warden of the cinque ports, the earl of Southampton, Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir Henry Percy, and some fifty other persons more or less implicated in the conspiracy. Cecil meant to seize likewise the Spanish ambassador, but here the queen stopped his hand. Don Gerald in prison was a declaration of war against Spain, for which Elizabeth was not yet prepared. Nor was she ready to bring Mary Stuart to justice, as desired by Cecil, preferring to let the halo of divine right shelter a criminal for whom, if there was guilt at all in organizing civil war, treason, and assassination, there was scarce a gibbet high enough in England.

The effect of Cecil's discoveries on his enemies abroad manifested itself with singular and almost startling quickness. There was little in the arrest of the duke of Norfolk and a number of other English nobles, and the seizure of their correspondence, to frighten either King Philip or Alva; for as long as they had soldiers, ships, priests, and Jesuits at their disposal, they remained as dangerous opponents as ever of Queen Elizabeth and her realm, and could afford to laugh at the unvoiling of their schemes. Even the discovery of the attempt of assassination was nothing of which the king, his ministers, and generals needed to be ashamed, according to their own code of morals and views of right and wrong. The murder of the queen of England, lying under the ban of excommunication, was a deed distinctly sanctioned by the infallible head of the church, and regarded on all hands as a far more meritorious work than even the killing of the regent of Scotland, in praise of which the bells had rung and the priests had sung at Rome. Nevertheless, and in spite of the many reasons for continuing the warlike preparations already made, and the incessant pressure exercised by the pope to the same effect, Philip had no sooner learnt the premature bursting of his mine when he determined on a precipitate retreat. The resolve was due chiefly to the advice of Alva, who had conceived an intense dislike to the crowd of English refugees swarming in the Netherlands, who kept exhorting him unceasingly to restore religion in their own country. A man of courage, not less than a fanatic soldier, Alva felt disgusted at the craven and selfish spirit of these Catholic emigrants, who expected everything from him without risking their own heads, and were rejoicing at the prospect of deluging the land of their fathers in blood, while they were living upon pensions from a foreign king. The pontiff himself threw his eloquence away in trying to persuade Alva that not all the friends of Mary Stuart were cowards. "The affair is upset," the duke replied, "and for the present nothing can be done. For my own part, I looked for nothing better with such light people to deal with. Had the lord of Norfolk been equal to the work, he might now be in the place of those who have thrown him into the Tower, and who will certainly cut off his head." Alva's views were as correct as his prediction.

Great as was Elizabeth's repugnance to punish exalted criminals, it was impossible for her to prevent the trial of Norfolk. His offences were so heinous, and his breach of faith in the agreement entered into with the government so shameless, that his punishment was felt to be an absolute necessity. But before placing the duke before his judges, Cecil put some other conspirators out of the way. The Spanish ambassador received notice to quit the country within four days, under pain of imprisonment. Don Gerald growled, but obeyed, well knowing that if due justice were done to him his head would be forfeited. To repay the leniency, he made an attempt, a day or two before leaving, to hire assassins for killing Cecil. He found two men ready for the work; however, not being able to guarantee their safety, the courage of the wretches broke down at the last moment, and, betraying each other, they fell into the pit they were digging. King Philip's envoy had taken himself off by this time, but a greater conspirator than he remained behind, whom it was indispensable to make harmless, in order to prevent a longer run of assassins. Orders were given to confine Mary Stuart to two rooms in Sheffield Castle, to allow her neither to read nor to receive letters without the previous inspection of her guardians, and to prevent her entering into oral communication with any strangers except those authorized by special orders of the privy council. As usual, Mary assumed a dramatic attitude, crying a few tears, and talking largely about her innocence and the cruel persecution of her enemies. The confessions of the bishop of Ross, of the duke of Norfolk, and others who had given evidence of her participation in the Ridolfi plot she treated as base calumnies; while as to the letters under her hand found in the duke's house, she still more boldly asserted they were forged, offering as proof thereof, and as evidence absolutely sufficient, her own princely word. Cecil justly thought it waste of time to reason with the august lady; so he contented himself with guarding her from further mischief, and in the meanwhile, as a tardy act of justice, placed the world in possession of some of the facts of her previous career. Hitherto, the contents of the casket letters, though known to the lords of the privy council, the commissioners at the conferences of York and of Westminster, and many other persons both in England and Scotland, had not been given to the public in general, so that there were necessarily many persons who still held the queen of Scots innocent of the charges brought against her, and in consequence looked upon her as a political martyr. To make an end of this state of things, eminently pernicious to Elizabeth's government, but for which she alone was responsible by forbidding the reproduction in print of the casket letters, Cecil now insisted upon the publication taking place. Accordingly, a clear and impartial narrative of the events which had led to the deposition of Mary Stuart and her imprisonment at Lochleven Castle was drawn up by George Buchanan, greatest historical writer of the age, and, being printed together with the evidence, was circulated throughout England and Scotland. "The detection of the doings of Mary queen of Scots, touching the murder of her husband, and her conspiracy, adultery, and pretended marriage with the Earl Bothwell," was the title of the work.

Its effect was very great, and there remained few thinking men in the two kingdoms who did not admit the guilt of the fallen queen—the sweetly absurd story of her innocence being left to the romancers of future generations.

The trial of the duke of Norfolk took place on the 16th of January, 1572, at Westminster Hall, before a jury of twenty-seven peers, presided over by the earl of Shrewsbury, as lord high steward. To the indictment of having plotted, "in conjunction with Mary late queen of Scots," to stir up revolt and induce foreigners to invade the realm, Norfolk pleaded Not Guilty, broadly denying all charges against him, disclaiming the evidence of his servants as unworthy of trust, and declaring the deposition of the bishop of Ross, minute in its description of the development of the conspiracy, to be the mere invention of "a false Scot." Such ground was clearly untenable; a frank confession, and the statement already freely and generously made by the bishop of Ross that he had been enticed into the plot, might have awakened the sympathy of his judges as well as of Elizabeth, but too willing to save the first peer of the realm from the scaffold. But as it was, in the face of overwhelming evidence, which made doubt in Norfolk's participation in the plot an absolute impossibility, there remained nothing for the twenty-seven lords but to give in their verdict of guilty. The short wintry day was gone, and pine-torches flickering in the wind were dimly lighting-up the vast hall, before the deliberations came to an end. Slowly, one by one, the peers declared the prisoner at the bar guilty of high treason, after which the earl of Shrewsbury passed sentence, condemning him to be hanged, drawn, and quartered: "and may God have mercy upon your soul." Norfolk wildly beat his breast, shrieking that he was innocent. "This is the judgment of a traitor," he cried, addressing the lord high steward, "but I am no traitor, and shall die as true a man as any that liveth." For a moment there was deep silence; then the president of the tribunal broke his rod, and amidst the loud shout of "God save the queen!" from the crowd in the hall, the guards marched off with Norfolk, the glittering axe of the executioner turned towards his face.

The condemnation of Norfolk gave rise to a short but severe contest of opinion between the queen and her great minister. Cecil—recently elevated to the peerage as Lord Burleigh, an honour but faintly indicating the rise of his influence in the nation—insisted upon the immediate execution of the duke, not from any motive of revenge, but to show the determination of the government to crush all further attempts of rebellion with a high hand. Elizabeth, while agreeing with Burleigh in principle, yet felt a deep reluctance to punish one nearly allied to her in blood, and whose death, moreover, was calling for that of a still greater criminal whom she was determined to shelter. If Norfolk was guilty, Mary Stuart undoubtedly was far more so, and there was really no other reason for hanging the one and pardoning the other than that the seduced victim was but a subject, though the first in the realm, and the seducer was born to a throne. Burleigh felt the injustice as keenly as his mistress, but being stopped from touching the greater criminal, did not deem it prudent, on this account alone, to let the lesser escape, and continued to insist upon the law taking its course. After long hesitation, Elizabeth at last signed the death-warrant on the 9th of February, three weeks after the trial and judgment; and the next morning, Monday the 10th of February, was fixed for the execution. But during the night from Sunday to Monday, while workmen were busy hammering to erect the scaffold at Tower Hill, the queen sent for Burleigh, telling him that the thought of Norfolk's death would not let her sleep, and desiring him to postpone the execution. At the same time, to answer the expectation of her loving subjects, already streaming in crowds to the fatal Green in front of the Tower, she ordered the beheading of a couple of minor criminals, with no ducal nor even noble blood in their veins. But the people were ill satisfied with the change, and the cries of injustice getting louder from day to day, Burleigh was obliged to insist upon Norfolk's execution as the one thing to restore peace, and to disprove the public rumour that the government did not dare to punish the duke for fear of the pope and the king of Spain. Thus pressed, Elizabeth once more signed the death-warrant on the evening of the 9th of April, but only to revoke it at four o'clock the next morning, while the scaffold was being got ready and the hangman was whetting his axe. Burleigh now saw that this play of indecision could not be allowed to go on any longer. "Sometimes," he wrote to a friend, "when her majesty speaketh of her danger, she concludeth that justice should be done; yet at other times, when she speaketh of his nearness of blood and superiority in honour, she stayeth." To end this wavering mood, fatal alike to the dignity of government and the requirements of calm justice, Burleigh saw but one means before him, that of the convocation of parliament. If he had no power to compel the queen to do her duty, the nation had, and its representatives were summoned accordingly to meet on the 8th of May.

The parliament which opened on this day was the most remarkable seen in England since the days of Edward VI. The mighty upheaving of the nation, the determined resolve of all men to uphold the Protestant faith and resist foreign aggression, was unmistakably shown by the vast majority of the representatives at the very first meeting. Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper, having delivered an oration declaring the country to be in danger, but without special mention of persons or things, the members of the Lower House rose in a body, demanding a bill of attainder against Mary Stuart and the punishment of all her accomplices. Even the Lords, formerly the fervent advocates of Mary's succession, and whose conservatism had never yet been free from sympathy with the ancient religion, joined in the cry of the Commons; and on their demand a committee of the two houses was appointed to meet in the Star Chamber, to devise means "how to proceed with the Scotch queen." On the report being made, the Commons resolved immediately to attain Mary Stuart, and so "touch her in life as well in title." The vote passed on the 19th of May, but before there was time to draw up the bill of attainder, the house of convocation, which had met at the same time as parliament, exhibited still more eagerness to express the voice of the nation. On the 20th of May, the archbishops and bishops waited in a body upon the queen at St. James's Palace, to tell her that it was her bounden duty as head of the state and of religion to bring Mary Stuart to justice. "Magistrates," the remonstrance ran, "were instituted by God for the suppression of wickedness, and the late queen of Scots being most wicked, her majesty would offend in conscience if she did not punish her." Then, after reminding the queen that God had forbidden "respect of persons," the prelates adduced instances from Scripture sounding like faint threats. "Saul spared Agag because Agag was a king, and for that fault God took the kingdom from Saul; Ahab pardoned Benhadad, and Ahab's life was forfeited." "The queen of Scots," the bishops continued, "had sought to seduce God's people in England: she was the only hope of God's adversaries in Europe, and the instrument by which they trusted to overthrow the Gospel. She had heaped together all the sins of the wicked sons of David, adulteries, murders, conspiracies, treasons, and blasphemies, and if she was allowed to escape God's wrath would surely light on the prince who spared her. The safety of England required the death of the devilish woman who had sought to bring the realm to confusion, and both conscience and duty pointed to the same end." This was strong language, and not at all to Elizabeth's taste. She answered, sharply, that the "devilish woman" was her cousin, not yet convicted of any crime, and still in law a reigning sovereign. Always sturried by opposition, she said far more than she really meant; so much, indeed, as to create a strong feeling against herself, which caused such grief to Burleigh that he fell seriously ill, and had to be carried in a litter into parliament. He alone was able to measure the depth of the popular agitation—strong enough at any moment to shake the throne itself.

All the skill of Burleigh was required to calm down the agitation of the Commons, who insisted on voting a bill of attainder against Mary Stuart, but were told, in a special message from the queen, that "she could not put to death the bird which, to escape the pursuit of the hawk, had flown to her feet for protection." The rhetoric was little admired by the stern reformers of the Lower House, and they were contemplating extreme measures, when Burleigh induced them to come to an understanding with the queen at a personal interview. Though now sitting among the Lords, his influence in the Commons was paramount, and they consented to send a deputation to Elizabeth. Accordingly, on the 28th of May, at the early hour of eight in the morning, a number of delegates of both houses of parliament presented themselves at the royal palace, to reason with her majesty about the treatment to be awarded to Mary Stuart. They told her, frankly and energetically, that her throne would never be secure as long as "the queen of late times" was left alive to employ all her wit and cunning in fresh conspiracies: plotters to assist her would never be wanting, and "many would venture deep to win a kingdom." Well schooled by Burleigh, Elizabeth made a much wiser answer to the parliamentary deputation than she had given to the bishops of the house of convocation. Thanking the members for their care for her safety, she admitted that her great unwisdomness to punish

Mary Stuart was owing to her being a blood relation, on which account she begged they would "defer their proceedings for a time." Meanwhile she promised to stay no longer the course of justice regarding the duke of Norfolk. There was no retreat possible from this formal engagement, and with a heavy heart Elizabeth signed Norfolk's death-warrant for the third time on the 31st of May, three days after the interview with the parliamentary deputation. Early on the morning of the 2nd of June the duke was led from his narrow cell in the Tower to the block which had been waiting nearly five months for his blood. He made a short speech to the crowd at the foot of the scaffold, warning all "not to brieve God's doings," then threw off his cloak, refused to have his eyes bandaged, and, giving the executioner a purse of gold, told him to be quick. A stroke of the glittering axe, a faint shriek, and a heavy thump on a blood-stained floor, and the premier peer of England had paid for his errors and his crimes to mortal judges.

Norfolk's execution did not go far to stay the intense excitement of the nation, and both houses of parliament were deliberating upon new measures of severity against Mary Stuart and her adherents, when Elizabeth succeeded in diverting their attention from the subject by a clever stroke of foreign policy. The queen for some time past had been engaged in the old amusement of negotiating for a husband with the royal family of France, promising to marry either the heir to the crown, the duke of Anjou or his younger brother, the duke of Alençon, the first a youth of eighteen, and the second a boy of sixteen, strongly marked by the small-pox. There was not the slightest intention on her part to take either of these lads as a partner, and her chief object in the negotiation, besides the gratification of personal vanity, was to keep on good terms with France, so as to possess at least one ally in the event of Spanish aggression. It was a kind of diplomacy not likely to be of long duration; yet it answered its immediate purpose, and, while parliament continued to be agitated by debates on the safety of the realm, Elizabeth had the satisfaction of announcing that she had concluded a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with the king of France. The treaty, signed at Blois by Sir Francis Walsingham, friend of Burleigh, and Sir Thomas Smith, as representatives of Elizabeth, and the duke of Montmorency, son of the great constable who had been killed in battle the year before, and the bishop of Limoges, as deputies of Charles IX., was received both in and out of parliament with the greatest joy, not so much on account of any hoped-for assistance against Alva and King Philip, but because of the high satisfaction it afforded to the Huguenots of France. Charles IX., as well as his mother, actual ruler of the kingdom, openly declared that henceforth there should be no distinction between Protestants and Catholics, that all religious dissensions should come to an end, and that perfect toleration should heal the wounds of the frightful wars which had torn the nation to pieces. Desirous to show by personal example the commencement of the new era of peace, the king invited the chief of the Huguenot leaders to court, overwhelmed them with demonstrations of affection, and appointed many to places of honour and distinction near his own person. To crown all, Charles offered the hand of his eldest sister, Margaret, to the young Prince Henry of Navarre, acknowledged head of the Protestants after the death of Condé, who had been foully murdered by order of the queen-mother.

There were not a few among the Huguenots mistrusting the genuineness of all these offers of friendship, and who, knowing the boundless and unscrupulous deceit of Catherine de Medici, firmly believed that some great treachery was at the bottom of all. But Admiral Coligny, venerated chieftain of the reformers, and justly considered by all as by far the noblest, greatest, and wisest of their leaders, was not of their opinion. Usually the most keen-sighted of statesmen and of warriors, Coligny for the moment was under the influence of two great currents of romance, which seemed to have changed his whole nature. The first was personal, and curious as exhibiting the exaltation of the period. A young lady of Savoy, of great wealth and extraordinary beauty, had written to the admiral, whom she had never seen, offering her hand and heart, and he, though fast advancing towards the grey shade of sixty, had accepted the offer, content to drown for awhile all other aspirations in the delights of love. While still under the influence of this feeling there came the invitation from the king to visit the court, added to which was a hint that the most cherished of his projects was about to be realized. This project was nothing less than the conquest of the Netherlands by France, the expulsion of the duke of Alva, and the proclamation of entire freedom of religion. Coligny knew that envoys of the revolted Flemings and of the duke of Orange, engaged in constant battling with the Spaniards, had come to make serious proposals to this effect to the king and queen-mother, and not doubting that even the perfidious character of the latter and her hatred of Protestants had given way before the temptations of a great and flourishing realm being added to the dominions of her family, he set out for Blois, the residence of the court, without further mistrust. His reception by the young king was so affectionate as to draw tears from the eyes of the mailed Huguenot knights who had followed their chieftain. On Coligny preparing to bend his knee, Charles caught him in his arms, crying, "You are my friend, my father!" Then kissing the hand of the champion of Protestantism in an ecstasy of fondness, the king exclaimed, "We have got you now, and you shall escape no more."—nous vous tenons maintenant, et vous ne nous échapperez plus. In France now, as in England, there were few who doubted that the great cause of religious reform had conquered another throne, and that another mighty foe had come to beard Rome. Burleigh himself appeared for a moment to entertain the fond belief, and while opposing all further movements for the punishment of Mary Stuart, advised Elizabeth to marry one of the brothers of the king of France, thus offering to Protestantism the noblest sacrifice it was in her power to give. But the queen was as unwilling as ever, and the nation seemed unwilling, too, for the marriage. With that dumb instinct running through masses, the reformers of England, while deeply sympathizing with their brothren abroad, looked with suspicion upon the old enemies and new patrons of the persecuted Flemings and Huguenots. The holy league of Bayonne, apparently forgotten by the Huguenots themselves, had not yet escaped the memory of the people of England, sharpened by constant rebellion, by threats of invasion, and by the living presence of the arch-conspirator who had signed, together with Philip and Catherine de Medici, the hellish pact for the extermination of Protestants and of Protestantism.

A month was sufficient to show that these dark fears were but too well-founded, and that the serpents of the holy league were not slumbering, but only hiding their fangs. But the concealment was clever to perfection. The whole of the Huguenots of France, with Coligny in front, were crowding around the king and Catherine de Medici, making preparations for chasing the Spaniards from the Netherlands, for establishing an intimate alliance with the Protestants of every country in Europe, and for sending missionaries all over the world to preach the Gospel of Christ. The great event destined to form the first permanent connection of the royal family of France with the Huguenot cause, and the basis of the spread of religious reform throughout the kingdom, came off at Paris on Sunday the 18th of August. On this day Henry of Navarre was married at the cathedral of Notre Dame to Princess Margaret, in the presence of both the Huguenot leaders and all the members of the royal family, the king himself giving his sister away, and the cardinal de Bourbon, highest dignitary of the Catholic church in France, officiating at the ceremony. The relationship of bride and bridegroom being within the forbidden degrees, the usual dispensation from Rome had been applied for, but the pope refusing to give it on the ground of Henry of Navarre remaining an unconverted heretic, the king had said, laughing, "Never mind the holy father; we can do without him." This in itself seemed to augur little less than a secession from Rome, which was confirmed by the nuptial ceremony—half Protestant in character, the mass being partly dispensed with, and a sermon taking its place. The nuptials completed, King Charles threw himself once more at the neck of Coligny, calling him in the tenderest accents his father, and begging him to give himself up for the rest of the week to joy and merriment, he being resolved to celebrate an event which had brought to his side the dearest and best of his subjects by a course of festivities such as had never before been witnessed in the capital of France. Coligny gladly consented, his heart swelling with pride at the glorious prospects of the church of God after so many years of frightful sufferings. Once more king and admiral embraced each other, after which the former returned to his palace, to transact affairs of state. He held a hurried conversation with his mother, and then sat down to write the following letter to the governor of Lyons, "Monsieur de Mandolot,—I make known to you by this order, which you will receive by a special messenger, that within the next six days, counting from the date of this note, no courier must be allowed to pass through my town of Lyons, except by permit given under my own hand. And I request you on your allegiance to keep it absolutely secret that the order now given has come from me.—Charles." The sixth day from the date of this note was the 24th of August, a saint's day, dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

The marriage festivities were as brilliant as the king had informed Coligny they would be, but were nevertheless not at all to the taste of the Huguenots. Jousts and masquerades held the chief place, together with theatrical entertainments of a very strange kind. One of these represented hell and heaven, guarded by good and fallen angels, the king and his two brothers representing the chief of the celestial beings, and the parts on the other side being assigned to Protestant nobles. The latter, as in duty bound, had to allow themselves to be repulsed, whereupon there arose a frenetic cry among the spectators that "the king had driven the Huguenots into hell." Coligny paid little attention to these and many other expressions of animosity on the part of the populace, fully aware of the influence of the priests over the mob in all the larger towns; he, however, regretted the time lost in idle play while the highest interests were at stake in the Netherlands, and kept urging the king to set out for the campaign in the north. Charles, laughing, and jesting, begged his father not to be impatient, promising, "on the faith of king,"—foi de roi—that he should have enough to do, he and all his friends, before the week was over. To show his earnestness to commence war against the Spaniards, the king ordered the first regiment of his life-guards to Paris, and on Wednesday the 20th of August, three days after the marriage, twelve hundred arquebusmen, long distinguished as grim enemies of the heretics, entered the city. On the same day large sums of money were distributed among the captains commanding the train-bands of the sixteen districts of Paris, all being ordered to hold their men in readiness to suppress, on the first sign, a conspiracy for overturning the government. For the moment there were no appearances of it, for both the Wednesday and Thursday were spent in jousts and carousals by the king and his courtiers, and the festivities were interrupted only by an "accident" on Friday the 22nd of August. It was an accident high upsetting all the arrangements which Catherine de Medici had made to celebrate the day of St. Bartholomew.

Coligny, besides his public, had many private enemies, the greatest of them being the duke de Guise, son of the general assassinated before Orleans, and consequently first cousin of Mary Stuart. Not being let into the secret of all the fêtes prepared by the king and queen-mother in celebration of the nuptials of the head of the Huguenots, Guise thought the opportunity favorable for executing his own revenge, and determined to slay Coligny. Having hired an assassin, a wretch called Maurevert, famed for many murders, he installed him in a house close to the Louvre, where the admiral was passing frequently on visits to the king. Maurevert saw him go by, as usual, on foot, on the morning of Friday the 22nd of August, and, awaiting his return from the royal palace, he stationed an old woman in front of the door to hand a paper to Coligny, while he himself took his post, gun in hand, behind the curtain of the window. Before long the admiral approached, and on seeing the poor petitioner he, with great kindness, ap-preached her and commenced reading her paper. At this moment a shot fell, and the sound of a bullet was heard whistling through the air. The bullet had carried off the forefinger of Coligny's right hand and lodged in the upper part of his left arm, and when his servants came running up he lifted his mutilated hand against the window from which the shot had come, bidding them to search for the assassin. The house was broken into, and the arquebuse was found; but the arquebuseman was gone. A swift horse of the duke de Guise had carried Manrevert away, and while he was galloping towards the Porte St. Antoine, his victim, faint from loss of blood, had to be led to his residence, not far off, in the Rue de Béthisi. The report of their great leader having been shot by an assassin at once spread among the Huguenots at Paris, and caused general consternation. They hurried up in crowds to his dwelling, but were greatly reassured on learning that his wound was not dangerous, and that the deed was owing, not to religious hatred but to private revenge. While yet the friends of Coligny were lingering round his house, the king, his brothers, the queen-mother, and chief dignitaries of the court came hurrying up to pay the admiral a visit, and express their deep sorrow for what had happened. At the first report of the event, Catherine de Medici had trembled at the consequences of an act likely to put a stop to the great undertaking on which she had been labouring for months past; neither the king's life-guards nor the train-bands of the city, she knew, could protect her against the rage of the terrible Huguenot knights, once her scheme should become known. Thus she hurried with the crown-bearing lad and her other sons to the admiral's bedside, to stifle possible suspicions, and was delighted to see that the compliments to "my father," the kisses and carresses, were as effectual as ever. All the Huguenots had been greatly alarmed by the attack upon their leader, fearing a general outbreak of the priest-ridden mob, but they allowed themselves to be reassured by Coligny. A few days more, he told them, and they would march forth to a great enterprise, bent to free Protestant brethren from the grip of the bloodhounds of Rome, and to establish the church of God. The Huguenots sat listening round his couch while their great captain poured forth his enthusiasm, his eyes full of the fire of youth. The whole day long and far into the night they sat talking and reading to him, after which they went home, each to his humble dwelling, dreaming of the kingdom of God upon earth. And the king of France with his mother were dreaming of the night of St. Bartholomew.

The night came at last—the night from Saturday the 23rd to Sunday the 24th of August. Late in the evening of Saturday a meeting of nobles and members of the royal family, presided over by Catherine de Medici, was held at the Louvre, and all were informed that the time for annihilating the enemies of the true faith had come. The parts were then distributed. The duke de Guise was told that to him was left the commencement of the "enterprise" by killing his enemy, Admiral Coligny; and that he might not fail in the task of slaying the old man, already wounded, the duke of Angoulême, bastard of Catherine's husband, was placed at his side. A little after midnight the regiment of life-guards was called together in deep silence, and the twelve hundred arquebusemen were posted along the bank of the river and around the quarter in which Coligny and nearly all the Huguenots were residing. At the same time the king summoned the chief commander of the city train-bands, Jean le Charron, and told him, in the presence of his mother and his two brothers, that the time had come for guarding the crown of France against the attack of its enemies. He was informed, the king said, that "those of the new religion" had formed a conspiracy for murdering him and his whole family, and that the only means to prevent the catastrophe would be to kill all Huguenots the same night, the signal to commence to be given by the tolling of the great bell at the palace of justice. A list was then given to him stating the name and dwelling-place of every Huguenot within the city, and, "to prevent errors," he was ordered to tie a white ribbon or handkerchief around the left arm of every one of his men, and to recommend all good citizens, faithful sons of the church, to do the same. Jean le Charron bowed and retired, promising faithfully to execute his orders, after which the two captains of the regiment of life-guards, Cosseins and Gons, entered the chamber of the king. To them Charles repeated the commands already given, and handing a copy of the list of names, enjoined strict silence till the tolling of the bell, and prompt action afterwards. It was now two o'clock in the morning—morning of the Lord's day. The "enterprise" had been fixed for three o'clock; but the king seemed restless, and Catherine was more restless still, impatient at the slow creeping of the minute-hand over the gilded dial on the wall. She beckoned a page to her side. "Tell the duke de Guise to commence." A few minutes more, and a shot was heard breaking the deep stillness of the Sabbath morning.

Coligny was lying in bed, feverish from the burning of his wounds, with a minister, Merlin, at the foot, reading the Psalms, when a knocking was heard at the gate. The admiral paid little attention. "Read another prayer," he whispered softly to Merlin, who had been startled at the interruption. But the knocking grew louder, and suddenly a crash was heard at the gate, and the admiral's valet rushed into the bedroom. "Monseigneur," he cried, in wild terror, "the assassins have come; we are lost." "I am prepared for death," quietly rejoined Coligny; "but you and my other servants save yourselves with all speed." In another minute, and the room was full of grim figures, armed with daggers, swords, and muskets. "Art thou the admiral?" cried one of them, a servant of Guise, named Besme. "I am," replied Coligny, raising himself in bed, and looking calmly around; "you are engaged in work hideous in the sight of heaven; but I have no fear, for my death, as my life, is in the hands of God." The words had scarcely flown from his lips when the servant of Guise sprang upon him with tiger fury, plunging a dagger into his breast, and then, drawing his sword, dealing frenzied strokes at face and neck. A thick crowd pushed on from behind, following the example, till the body of Coligny was hacked to pieces and swimming in blood. A loud voice was now heard crying from below—that of Guise, waiting with the bastard of Angoulême in the courtyard. "Have you done, Besme?" cried the voice. "Yes," replied the assassin; "it is finished." "Then throw him out of the window," ordered Guise, "for we must look with our own eyes." Besme and a soldier seized the horribly mutilated body and cast it into the yard. The royal bastard approached, wiped the blood-covered face, and crying, "It is all right," kicked the body into the gutter. "Now away," shouted Guise, addressing his followers; "we have commenced well and shall end well. Long life to the king!" With this the crowd started, amidst howling and clashing of daggers, the body of the admiral, tied to a rope, being dragged along with them through the mud. When the troop of assassins issued into the street, the tolling of a bell was heard from the palace of justice.

At the sound of the bell the train-bands rushed onward, followed by an immense rabble, scenting plunder and thirsting for blood. Armed with rusty swords, hand guns, daggers, butchers' knives, sledge-hammers, pickaxes, bars of iron, and other instruments of murder ready to hand, the shrieking, blaspheming, hell-haunted mob sallied out into the darkness of the night to begin its carnage. Never since Christ brought into God's fair world his Gospel of peace and love did men called Christians go forth to murder so fierce and foul. The carnage commenced in the Louvre itself, under the eyes of the king and his mother, who had invited a number of the most distinguished Huguenot gentlemen to take up their residence in the royal palace. One by one, they were dragged half-naked from their beds, pushed into the courtyard, and hacked to pieces by the mob. For more than an hour the butchery in the Louvre continued, till all were wading in gore, and the frenzy of murder had seized every head. "Kill! kill!" the king screamed, his features distorted with rage; and "Kill! kill!" shouted the furious crowd issuing from the palace. Yells and groans, shrieks and laments, curses and prayers, firing of guns and tolling of bells, sounds indescribable and horrors unimaginable now began to fill the whole vast city. To despatch the handful of Huguenot knights ordered in the lists was mere trifling; the infuriated mob, soon in search of other victims. Whosoever had an enemy could kill him with impunity; whosoever knew a rich man could lay hold with the greatest ease of his treasures, together with his life. The opportunity was not lost by the robbers, thieves, and assassins of the capital of France. Children were strangled in sight of their parents to force them to reveal their possessions; old men had their eyes torn out; pregnant women were ripped up by monsters, and girls violated over corpses. The king himself set the example of plunder as of murder. He had purchased, but not paid for, a large quantity of diamonds and other precious stones from lapidaries reputed to be heretics, and to pay the bills sent out his guards to murder all, not leaving alive the children in their cradles. The example was largely followed by the subjects of Charles IX. A debt was easily paid with a stab of the dagger, and a lawsuit decided by the pull of a trigger. The carnage lasted all the night long, and all the day, the Sunday, and all the next night. How many were murdered none knew; some counted five and some ten thousand within the city walls. The Seine alone carried nearly two thousand corpses to the sea, netted along its course by fishermen; while the gravediggers of the "Cimetière des Innocents" got paid for putting eleven hundred mutilated bodies under ground. But before the bodies of the chief of the Huguenots were given up to the gravediggers or cast into the river, the queen-mother, great author of the massacre, enjoyed a private view of the same. By her orders the corpses, as far as they could be found, were set, entirely naked, against the wall in the inner courtyard of the Louvre, and Catherine de Medici, accompanied by her ladies of honour, passed them in review, indulging in the most obscene remarks. This queen-mother and these "ladies of honour" were the early companions of Mary Stuart.

The massacres at Paris finished only to begin afresh in the provinces. Two days before the St. Bartholomew, messengers were despatched by the king to the governors and mayors of all the towns and villages in which Huguenots were known to live, ordering them to seize and kill as many as could be caught, with special injunction not to spare the leaders. The command was deemed so frightful by many of the officials that there was hesitation to execute it; but the news from the capital put an end to all wavering, and wherever the authorities were not quick enough to lay hold of the heretics, the lowest rabble, goaded on by priests, took the task in hand. At Lyons, Toulon, Bordeaux, Orleans, Rouen, and numerous other cities, the horrors of Paris were repeated on a more or less extended scale, according to the number of Protestants within the grip of priests and mob. The carnage, resulting in the death of about a hundred thousand persons all over France, was fiercest at Lyons, the huge piles of corpses carried down the Rhone forming such hideous sight as to frighten even the Jesuits of Avignon. Here, as in all the large cities, the rabble reigned supreme; the soldiers in garrison at the citadel of Lyons refused their assistance, saying their trade was that of killing armed opponents in the open air, and it was no part of their duty to murder men, women, and children while asleep. But in other towns, the halibudiers and archbushers were less scrupulous. At Bordeaux the governor, Count Montferriand, put himself at the head of the mob, slaying with his own hand a councillor of state, his personal enemy, and ordering his guards to instruct the crowd of assassins, who were wearing red bonnets and called themselves the "band of cardinals," in the art of murdering heretics under the greatest amount of tortures. Here, as elsewhere, cruelty, greed, and lust went hand in hand; infants were dashed against walls in sport; houses burnt down by sets of thieves, and women ravished by crews of yelling demons. While these scenes were repeated all over France, the king, on the 26th of August, went in state to the cathedral of Notre Dame, returning thanks to God for having delivered the realm from schism and heresy, and protected the holy Catholic faith. At the suggestion of the archbishop of Orleans, Cardinal Morvilliers, whether it would not be well "to institute some kind of proceedings against the dead"—de faire aux morts quelque sorte de procès—

Charles, the same day, assembled his parliamentary council, and requested the judges to draw up an act of accusation against the chief of the Huguenots, whose murder, the king admitted, had taken place by his order. Only one member of the council, the advocate-general, Pibrac, had the courage to inquire, in guarded phraseology, whether his majesty intended to issue his commands for stopping further bloodshed, the reply to which was that "proper instructions" had been given already. The streets of Paris having been somewhat cleared from gore, the king walked through them in procession on the 28th of August, surrounded by his guards, and returning to the Louvre, ordered that two medals should be struck in honour of the great event that had taken place on the previous Sunday. In conformity with the command, the director of the mint, Favier, laid the medals before his majesty five days after. The first represented Charles IX. sitting on his throne, a sceptre in the left, and sword and palm branch in the right hand, with his feet on a heap of corpses; at the back were the arms of France, with "Virtus in rebelles" underneath. The second medal contained the effigy of the king, with the legend around, in French, "(Charles IX. conqueror of rebels: 24th August, 1572.)" and at the back Hercules destroying the hydra. Copies of both medals were sent to all the Catholic princes of Europe, as everlasting memorials of what can be accomplished by kings acting in concert with priests.

The report of the great deeds achieved by Charles IX., or rather his mother, was received differently at the various courts of Europe. King Philip laughed aloud at the news that a hundred thousand heretics had been killed in France—it was said to be the first and only time he ever laughed in his life. What seemed so funny to his majesty was that a woman should have managed to suck so much blood in so short a time without any perceptible effort; he had held Catherine de Medici in high respect before, and now felt that his Alva and other generals, his grand inquisitors, archbishops, and presidents of blood tribunals were but miserable blunderers by her side, achieving very little at a very great expense. Diplomatic relations between the courts of France and Spain had been interrupted for some time, owing to the short-sightedness of Philip, who fancied the queen-mother in earnest in toying with her Huguenots; but, recognizing his want of judgment, he now was the first to reopen intercourse in an autograph letter to Catherine, expressing both his high admiration of her policy and his intense gratification at the results obtained. The joy of King Philip, however, was pale and insignificant to that felt and expressed by the vicar of Christ. The news of the massacre had no sooner reached Rome when the holy father ordered the canon to be fired from the castle of St. Angelo, and bonfires to be lighted in all the principal streets and public places. On the following day he walked in procession through the city, followed by all the cardinals, the ambassadors of the Catholic powers, and an immense train of priests, carrying crosses, banners, and images of saints. After kneeling and praying at the high altar of St. Peter's, the pontiff went to perform mass at the churches of the Dominicans and the Jesuits, giving thanks to heaven for the destruction of the enemies of the true religion. Following the example of the ruler of France, the pope also commanded a medal to be struck, showing his own effigy in front, and, on the reverse, that of the king of the infernal regions crushing heretics under feet, with the legend "Hugonotorum strages." A counterfeit of the medal was put forward soon after at Geneva, exhibiting the two images on the same side, with the pontifex in the grip of the enemy of mankind.

In England the massacre of the Huguenots produced an indignation passing all bounds. Foreseeing it to some extent, and most desirous to keep on good terms with Elizabeth, Catherine de Medici instructed her ambassador at the English court, La Mothe-Fénélon, to represent the frightful scheme of murder which she had originated as partly an act of justice to subdue rebellion, and partly the result of a great feud between the rival houses of Coligny and the Guises. Though bearing the stamp of absurdity on its face, the explanation was not altogether refused by Elizabeth, who could not help feeling that her own conduct in the long-continued marriage negotiations with the French princes, leading to the belief of a firm political alliance between the governments of the two countries, had tended not a little to lure the chiefs of the Huguenots to destruction. A cry of horror and rage arose from one end of England to the other as soon as the news of the massacre became known, and the people demanded as with one voice that the treaty with France should be torn to pieces, the ambassador be expelled from the country, and war be declared against the nation of assassins. The queen felt but little sympathy with this healthy rage, her deep dislike of Calvinism inclining her to listen patiently to the tale of rebellion invented by Catherine de Medici, with whom she had been in correspondence, discussing the great matrimonial farce, till the very moment that the echo of the bell which stirred up the fanatics of Paris had flown across the Channel. Great as were the horrors perpetrated under the instigation of the queen-mother, Elizabeth felt yet unwilling to give notice to quit to her ambassador, a most accomplished gentleman and courtier, although Burleigh insisted on the necessity of this act, and that of recalling the English envoy at Paris. As a compromise, and to offer some gratification to public feeling, a sort of masquerade was finally hit upon by Elizabeth, and carried out with great effect. Towards the middle of September, while the court was at Woodstock, on its way from Warwick to Windsor, an intimation was sent to the French ambassador that an audience, which he had demanded some time before, would be granted to him by the queen. At the appointed morning, Monsieur la Mothe-Fénélon presented himself before her majesty, whom he found dressed in deep mourning, with the ladies of the court standing around in a vast circle, in like sable garments. The Frenchman was too perfect a courtier to be at all abashed by this little scene, and taking the hint as to the expression of his face from the queen, approached her with a grave air, as being included among the mutes of the procession. This was more than Elizabeth was prepared for; so she drew La Mothe into a window, inquiring whether the king of France had really given his consent to the massacre. The ambassador, who had learnt his lesson well, repeated the story of the conspiracy, dwelling on the necessity of overcoming a formidable evil by desperate means; and the queen had nothing to give in answer but the same remark that she hoped his master would not desert his foreign allies the same as he had deserted his Protestant subjects in their hour of need. Thereupon she swept out of the room, and stripping off her black dress, fancied she had revenged the murder of a hundred thousand Huguenots.

The Woodstock masquerade did not contribute in any way, as Elizabeth had hoped, to allay the intense excitement of the people; and Burleigh began to fear that war with France, though not desirable from a political point of view, would be inevitable. His own feelings were so strong that he told the French ambassador, in presence of the privy council, that the murder of the Huguenots was the most horrible crime committed in the world since the crucifixion of Christ. He could not say, Burleigh added, on whom the chief guilt rested, but had no hesitation in condemning the king, who had sanctioned by his presence and demeanour a deed of unexampled infamy. The words were sharp enough to rouse the spirit of the ambassador, who hinted that such remarks, if repeated, would lead to his departure, and was informed in reply that there was no objection to such a step. The attitude of the English envoy at the French court, Sir Thomas Smith, gave not much hope for the preservation of amicable relations between the two countries. Sir Thomas Smith having been instructed by Burleigh to ask for a full explanation of the causes of the massacre, reported, without reservation, that the basis of the whole was a hideous plot of the queen-mother, and that the tale of the conspiracy was without foundation. "If the admiral and his friends were guilty," he wrote, "why were they not apprehended and tried? So is the traveller slain by the robber, so is the hen by the fox; so the hind by the lion, so Abel by Cain. And grant even that they were guilty, and that they dreamt treason in their sleep: what crime committed the men, women, and children murdered at Lyons, at Bordeaux, at Orleans? What did the infants killed at the breasts of their mothers at Rouen, at Caen, at La Rochelle? God knows the assassins." Burleigh felt as deeply, yet hesitated to embark in war against the murderers of the Huguenots, still holding to his old belief that the great enemy, as of Protestantism so of England, was not France but Spain. Thus the English envoy remained in France, and the French ambassador in England, to the great satisfaction of Elizabeth, who could not bear the idea of losing such a courtly ornament as Monsieur la Mothe-Fénélon. The mourning comedy over, he made himself a greater favourite than ever, to the extent of being able to bring the queen to outrage public opinion by consenting to stand godmother to a newly-born French princess. King Charles, after leading a life of the wildest debauch, had married the year before a German princess, who had brought him a daughter, to whom the maiden queen of England was now invited to be sponsor. The report of the queen having accepted the invitation, and appointed the earl of Worcester to go as special ambassador to the court of France, created a storm of indignation throughout England. It seemed no less than a crime to all good Protestants that the queen should connect herself thus publicly with a monarch whose hands were still reeking with the blood of the best of his subjects, and there came numerous petitions to put a stop to the embassy. But Elizabeth was determined to have her will, and the earl of Worcester had to leave for Paris at the end of October, two months after the massacre. He tried to make his departure as secretly as possible, yet notwithstanding his precautions he was attacked midway between Dover and Calais by a boatful of armed men, who killed four of his suite and wounded seven, but were beaten off at last, after vainly attempting to capture the ambassador. It was the first loud protest of the people against the course of policy taken by Elizabeth.

That the queen could not long continue in this course without raising, in the excited state of the nation, a terrible storm, not easily to be subdued, was clear to Burleigh, and he frankly said so to his mistress. Daily, from all parts of the country, came letters announcing an imminent rising of the Protestants against all suspected of sharing the opinions of the holy father in respect to the French massacre; every Roman Catholic was looked upon as an assassin in disguise, and the more violent of the reformers were crying aloud to give them "Paris justice." Even the bishops addressed a request to the government for immediately putting to death all Catholics retained in prison for refusing the oath of allegiance, which petition was backed by the report that attacks upon the galleys containing recusants had been made in several places. The demand was sternly refused by Elizabeth; but she listened with more approval to a proposition brought forward by Edwin Sandys, bishop of London, speaking not only in the name of his clerical brethren but of the people of the capital, to the effect that "the queen of Scots' head should be struck from her shoulders." There was more than one reason to induce Elizabeth to shield Mary Stuart no longer. The hatred of the Protestants against her had risen, both on account of the revelation of her crimes in Buchanan's work, and her relationship to the French royal family, to such a height that it seemed almost impossible for the queen to continue her protection without seriously endangering her own popularity, besides which the state of parties in Scotland had become such as to make it imperatively necessary either to revive her influence, or to render it harmless forever. A civil war, horrible in all its aspects, had desolated the unhappy country, with but slight intervals of rest, since the assassination of Murray. The earl of Lennox, lifted into the vacant regency by the abuse of Berwick, was known from the commencement to be too feeble a character to maintain himself long in a position requiring the highest physical and mental energy; but he fell even sooner than expected, after little more than a year's nominal tenure of office. On the 4th of September, 1571, while at Stirling to see the young king, he was seized by a detachment of brigands from the Border, led by the lord of Buccleugh and some of the Hamiltons, and shot in the open street. The deed was committed partly for political objects, and partly in private revenge, Lennox having hung, some months before, the archbishop of St. Andrew's whose loss—though he deserved hanging better than any other man in Scotland—was deeply deplored by his clan. But the assassination of Lennox proved no gain to either the Hamiltons or the friends of Mary Stuart. The day after the murder, the nobles assembled at Stirling, last remnant of the band of confederate lords, elected the earl of Mar, governor of the infant king, to the regency, chiefly in the hope that he might succeed in gaining English assistance, and thus end the terrible anarchy under which the country was suffering. Scotland had got so exhausted by this time, that the great political factions had become incapable to decide their struggle for power in the open field. Singly, like famished wolves, the men of each party attacked each other and tore each other to pieces. The foul deed of the assassin of Linlithgow was bearing terrible punishment to a whole nation.

With the accession of the earl of Mar to the regency there came to be three principal factions in Scotland, each of them looking to foreign help to get the upper hand. Mar and his friends, known as the king's party, and representing the overwhelming majority of the nation, but powerless in the general state of anarchy, put their trust in England; while their chief opponents, the Hamiltons, allied with Border lairds such as the Scotts and Kers, calling themselves the queen's party, had opened communications with King Philip, who seemed not unwilling to assist them. Besides these two, a third party had grown up since the murder of Murray known as the "Castilians" for being in possession of the castle of Edinburgh. The leaders of this faction, which looked to France for help, were Kirkaldy of Grange and Lethington, long minister of state, the shrewdest man in all Scotland and the most unprincipled. Lethington had come to quarrel with his former friends the Presbyterians, and succeeded in drawing the staunch old warrior, the laird of Grange, companion of John Knox since the days when Archbishop Beaton met his doom, over to his side, although there was a gulf between them as deep as that between himself and Knox. The reformers held up "the will of God" as their supreme guide; Lethington did not mind telling his friends in confidential hours that God was "ane Bogill of the nursery." Broken down by illness, his body half paralyzed, but his intellect as keen as ever, Lethington was a formidable man to both the king's and the queen's parties; and perched on the battlements of Edinburgh Castle, like in an eagle's nest, he seemed to hold the scales between either of the factions. Having vainly sought to gain him over by promises, the earl of Mar had no choice left in order to establish his government, if only in name, but to lay siege to Edinburgh Castle. He accordingly moved with the handful of men which his friends were enabled to raise from Stirling to the capital, but, before beginning siege operations, implored Elizabeth once more to send him some troops and money, so as not to risk the breaking down of the last remnant of an established government in the destruction of his small force. But while he was writing to the queen of England, Lethington was in active correspondence with the queen-mother of France, and the Hamiltons with King Philip and Alva, and in the race of messengers and messagings fortune appeared to incline more to the party of Mary Stuart and the castilians than to the regent. Elizabeth, irresolute as ever, would promise nothing, while Catherine de Medici assured Lethington that a French fleet would sail for Leith in a few months; and the duke of Alva informed Lord Seton, envoy of the Hamiltons, that the northern coasts of Scotland had been already surveyed, and that a Spanish force would land in Aberdeenshire as soon as his friends had made all preparations for a campaign. This was a spur to the queen's party to set themselves in movement at once. The week after the regent had gone from Stirling to Edinburgh, the Hamiltons with their allies the Border troopers marched into Aberdeenshire, burning and plundering along the road, and killing indiscriminately men, women, and children. The clan of Forbes, old foes of the Hamiltons, were specially marked out for destruction among the rest, and orders were given to slay even the infant at the breast of the mother. Sweeping down the valley of the Don, the horde of murderers were stopped by Towie Castle, in which Lady Forbes, with her children and servants, had shut herself up. Defence there could not be, the country having long been drained of armed men, and when the troopers, headed by Adam Gordon, came under the walls, they made a breach with hammer and pickaxe, and flung in blazing faggots of wood. A loud wailing now rose up to heaven, and through fire and smoke the little children came rushing to save their lives, but they had no sooner got outside when they were caught on pikes, and tossed back into the flames. It was a suitable preparation of the queen's party for the reception of the duke of Alva in Scotland.

The horrors of Towie Castle made but little impression in a country bleeding from all the wounds of protracted civil strife. Finding it impossible to reduce Edinburgh Castle with but a few hundred men under his command, and not even money to pay these, the earl of Mar returned to Stirling, where he died, not without suspicion of poison, on the 28th of October, 1572. Just before his death, the long negotiation for assistance with Elizabeth, which had been the principal occupation of his regency, had entered a somewhat important phase. On Burleigh's advice, who could see no other way of getting rid of the arch-plotter disturbing the peace of the realm, the queen proposed to the earl of Mar to deliver Mary Stuart up to him, on the implied condition that she should receive due punishment as a murderess. It was a proposal evidently advantageous to the Scottish government, inasmuch as after the death of Mary Stuart the Hamiltons could not continue their murders and robberies under the dignified title of the queen's party, and the ground would be taken away for the threatened invasions of both the French and the Spaniards. Nevertheless, the regent hesitated in accepting the offer unconditionally, justly thinking that the execution of the captive queen would be at least as great an advantage to Elizabeth as to his own party, and that the odium of awarding punishment to a royal malefactor, the same as to any other vulgar creature, should not be cast upon him and his friends without some equivalent advantage. He therefore stipulated that Elizabeth, in return for being freed of her dangerous prisoner, should take the young king under her protection, entering upon an agreement that his rights to the throne of England, as well as to that of Scotland, should not be invalidated by any judicial sentence passed upon his mother, and that, moreover, she should assist his adherents to establish a firm rule, beginning with the reduction of the fortress of the capital. These were clearly fair conditions; but the queen felt little inclined to agree to them, the old fear of acknowledging a successor, even in the person of an infant, still haunting her mind. However, Burleigh, anxious to bring the negotiations to a successful end, induced her not to reject the proposals of the regent altogether, and she consented to despatch Sir Henry Killebrew as special envoy to Scotland. Sir Henry, brother-in-law of Burleigh, arrived at Edinburgh in the middle of September, to behold a sight such as he had never witnessed in his life.

The report of the massacre of the Huguenots had just reached Scotland, stirring the great heart of the nation to its deepest depths. To the Protestant churchmen of England the night of St. Bartholomew appeared as a great crime against humanity; to the Presbyterians of Scotland it was like the murder of near and dear relations. John Knox called Calvin his father; and John Knox's pupils looked upon Calvin's disciples as their brethren, closer to their souls than mere brothers connected by the ties of flesh. For a moment, when the news of the hideous murders reached Scotland, there was dumb despair, but followed quickly by a cry for revenge. Knox, lying ill at St. Andrew's, attacked by a stroke of paralysis which left him unable to move, and heart-broken by the misery of his unfortunate country, gathered strength at the wild cry, and moving his frail body by a gigantic effort of the mind, arose and went to Edinburgh. He went into the pulpit and preached as he had never preached before. Words of fire, words of holy rage, words of heavenly exaltation came from his lips. It was the last sermon delivered by John Knox. From the pulpit he was carried back to his bed, seized by another paralytic stroke, which set his mind wandering. He recovered consciousness a few days after, to learn that his hours upon earth were numbered, whereupon he sent for the elders of the kirk, exhorting them to be constant in the faith under whatever trials God might send. From religion the thoughts of John Knox reverted to his country. He resolved, before quitting the world of the living, to make a last attempt to restore peace and harmony among his friends and countrymen, and with this great object in view sent a message to his old disciple and companion, Kirkaldy of Grange. "Go," he said to David Lindsay, minister of Perth, who was watching at his bedside, "go to yon man at the castle: tell him I warn him in the name of God to leave that evil cause. Neither the craggy rock in which he miserably confides, nor the carnal prudence of the man whom he esteems a demigod, shall avail him against being dragged from his nest with shame and hung on the gallows against the sun." Lindsay did as ordered, and being admitted into the castle moved the heart of the old laird till he promised to do as bidden by John Knox. But before opening the castle-gates he led the messenger to Lethington, who, crouching, lame, and broken by disease, was yet keeping the stout commander of the fortress in absolute thralldom. Lethington laughed aloud when hearing of his friend's intention to surrender. "We will not surrender," he cried, with shrill voice, and, addressing Lindsay, "Go and tell Master Knox that he is but a dying prophet." The words were carried to the great reformer. "Well, well," said he; "I have been earnest with my God anent the twa men. For the one, I am sorry that sa should befall him, yet God assures me there is mercy for his soul: for the other I have na warrant that ever he shall be well."

While Knox was lying on his deathbed at Edinburgh, the regent, the earl of Mar, was put into his coffin at Stirling. On the 27th of October, the earl was walking about, steel-capped, the sword at his side, in the fulness of strength, and on the 28th he was lying on the floor, cold, stiff, and stark. That Mary Stuart had ordered him to be poisoned for negotiating her surrender was the general opinion of the people, and seemed probable enough, but it mattered little in the general chaos of things, with every man's life at the mercy of any other man possessed of a firelock or an old piece of iron. Regent of Scotland or beggar at the roadside, it was all the same: no man could hope more, rising in the morning, than to get his six feet of earth before the evening sun had set. The friends of the earl, Morton, Ruthven, Glencairn, and others, had his grave dug and put him low and said a short prayer, then they drew their sharp swords, buckled their armour tighter, jumped on their horses, and rode off to Edinburgh. Who should be regent in Mar's place was the great question to be solved, and there was but one man in all Scotland able to solve it. That man, too, was but a span removed from death, the riders knew it, and pressed the spurs into the sides of their steeds till the blood ran down the quivering flanks. Late at night on the 19th of November, Morton and his companions arrived at Edinburgh, and applied for permission to see John Knox. The earls were admitted, and after a long secret conference with the reformer related to their homes. Five days after, on the 24th of November, 1572, Morton was proclaimed regent of Scotland at the Tolbooth of Edinburgh. The same day, with the sinking sun, the greatest and noblest of Scotsmen—greatest and noblest of the age and of all times—went to his eternal rest. John Knox died as he had lived, with the name of God in his heart and on his lips. His friends read to him the seventeenth chapter of the Gospel of St. John, where, he said, he had first cast anchor, and with the last verse, "And I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it: that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them," his head sank back on the pillow. Then his eyes closed, he prayed, and the shadow of death swept over his face.

The first care of the earl of Morton on assuming the regency was to take up the thread of the negotiations with Elizabeth, dropped by the death of his predecessor. Sir Henry Killebrew, as earnest a Protestant as his brother-in-law Burleigh, had been greatly affected by the scenes he had witnessed at Edinburgh, and promised to do all in his power to gain the much-needed assistance of the English Government. His letters had the effect of inducing Elizabeth to send a supply of money to the regent, which, and the reiterated promise of the queen that under certain conditions she might be induced to adopt the young king as her successor, had an immense influence in strengthening the hands of the government. Far more energetic than his predecessor, and with a vigour amounting at times to ferocity, Morton lost no time in handling his newly-acquired power. Determined to overcome his enemies, either by force or intrigue, he began by summoning the chiefs of the queen's party to surrender, or to prepare themselves for a war of extermination. The Hamiltons well knew his character, and being fully acquainted with the change in the attitude of Elizabeth effected by Killegrew, offered to negotiate with the regent. Aberdeenshire was theirs, but no Spanish fleet had yet set sail for its coast, and Alva's promises to Lord Seton got more and more vague, leaving but the slightest hope of King Philip's banner flying over the head of Border troopers. It was thus they offered to treat, and Morton, to aid their good-will, raised with Elizabeth's money a few troops, and marched upon them, hanging as many peace-disturbers by the way as he could lay hold of. Arrived at Perth, he sent a

the throne of Scotland. In return for these concessions and the acknowledgment of his regency, the earl of Morton consented to grant a complete amnesty for all past offences, and the reinstatement of all the leaders of the rebellion in their former honours and possessions. The important document embodying these stipulations was signed at the lodgings of the English ambassador at Perth, on the 23rd of February, 1573; and with its signature vanished the last shadow of power flickering around the name of Mary Stuart.

All Scotland now acknowledged the government of Morton, except the small piece of rock towering above the capital. The "castilians," fighting for personal rather than general objects, were more than ever in hopes of aid from France, the queen-mother having given positive assurance to Lethington that a French fleet would cast anchor at Leith before the midsummer of 1573, to "restore order" in the name of Charles IX. To this assurance both Lethington and Kirkaldy were the more inclined to trust, as French assistance had already supplied them with provisions enough to last for nearly a year, also with plenty of guns and ammunition, and with everything required to withstand a lengthened siege. The fortress, besides, was held to be impregnable, situated as it was on the extreme end of a steep ridge of rock, falling off vertically on three sides in precipices above two hundred feet deep, and accessible only by a narrow causeway about a mile long leading from the city, which was fortified by immense walls and earthwork, with guns rising tier above tier. Morton himself knew the castle to be impregnable by the forces under his command, and conscious that his rule was but a mockery as long as the capital of the kingdom was under the guns of an antagonistic power, constantly striving to attract a foreign army, he exhausted himself in promises to Lethington and Kirkaldy to surrender a possession which final summons into the camp of the enemy, which brought the leaders to propose a conference. Sir Henry Killegrew, who had accompanied the regent in his march—greatly strengthening by his presence the general belief that an English army was coming to his aid—assented to the conference taking place under his mediation, the result of which was the conclusion of a treaty of peace after but short deliberation. By the terms of this treaty the earl of Huntly and Sir Adam Gordon, in the name of the Hamiltons and Gordons, and the lairds of Buccleugh and Johnston, as chieftains of the borderers, consented to submit to the government, to recognize as illegal everything done in opposition to the king's government since the coronation of James VI. at Stirling, and, finally, to declare null and void all the claims of Mary Stuart to

they were holding only on trust, as supposed friends of the established government. The laird of Grange felt inclined to accept the proposals of the regent, offering to him and his adherents the highest honours in the state, but Lethington again resisted. He hated Morton, and, firmly persuaded that a few thousand French troops would not fail to place the supreme power in his own hands, he had no trouble to bring Kirkaldy to share in his views. The regent now was left to his last resource, that of seeking help from Elizabeth. He implored her, for the sake of his unhappy country, exhausted by internal strife, to lend him soldiers and guns sufficient to reduce the last spot in which rebellion was hiding, and thus to give peace to Scotland. Sir Henry Killegrew warmly seconded the request of Morton. "If the castle be not recovered," he informed the queen, "and that with expedition, there will be the beginning of sorrows, and foreign interference may put in danger the throne of your majesty and the realm of England." Elizabeth was not frightened by mere words, but the report of her envoy was backed by another piece of news which gave it an unexpected importance. Burleigh learnt through his foreign spies that the Lady Mar, widow of the late regent of Scotland, who continued to have the custody of the young king at Stirling Castle, had entered into a secret correspondence with Catherine de Medici for delivering up her precious charge as soon as a French fleet should appear on the coast. Knowing that Lady Mar, a Roman-Catholic, was not at all unlikely to carry out such a bargain if once concluded, Burleigh pressed upon Elizabeth the necessity of sending the aid demanded by Morton. The queen wavered but a moment; Edinburgh Castle was little to her, and for the regent she cared still less, but the person of the boy-king, her own probable successor, was a prize not to be put in jeopardy. Towards the end of March, Sir William Drury, governor of Berwick, received orders to set sail for Leith with five hundred hackbutters, one hundred and forty pikemen, and a train of heavy siege guns, nick-named "her majesty's peace-makers." The command was duly obeyed; and on the 17th of April the little force, insignificant in number, yet carrying in its hands the fate of a kingdom, marched into Edinburgh, welcomed by the enthusiastic cries of the citizens.

The siege of Edinburgh Castle commenced on the 17th of May, it having taken just a month to dig the trenches and put the big guns, the peace-makers, into the right position, facing the fortification on the narrow ridge leading from the city to the top of the rock. Within the castle there were nearly two hundred men, and the attacking party without consisted of about fourteen hundred soldiers, including seven hundred men furnished by the regent; but whatever inequality there was in numbers was fully made up by the advantage of position. The "castilians" seemed so certain of victory that even when the English batteries had been planted, under the cross-fire of the castle guns, they refused all offers of accommodation; and to the last summons of the regent, offering a complete amnesty, Kirkaldy replied that he did not mean to surrender as long as there was one stone upon the other. Further parleying being evidently useless, the big guns on the 17th of May began to spit fire. Their effort was directed mainly against the bastion known as the David's Tower, considered the centre of the fortress, and known to be of great strength. David's Tower was tough indeed, for it took six days, and more than two thousand balls of iron, to shatter it, to pieces and bring down the guns on the walls, together with the gunners, into the dust. On the 23rd the huge bulwark which had stood the storm of centuries fell with a crash heard for miles around, and the red flag on its summit sank amidst clouds of dust. But the besieged yet held out, though Lethington, unable to stand the furious cannonading, which threatened to shake his frail body into atoms, had to be carried down into the vaults below the fortifications. On the 24th another bastion, the Wallace Tower, riddled like a sieve by incessant firing, fell into dust; and the next day the outer defences of the citadel were occupied by the English artillerymen with little resistance. A flag of truce was now stuck out from the battlements, and an officer came down to parley with Sir William Drury. Referred to the regent, he made to him the offer, in the name of the laird of Grange, to surrender the castle on condition of a complete amnesty being granted. But Morton refused, telling the messenger that the time for amnesty had gone by with the death of two hundred brave men, killed during the siege, and that henceforth nothing could be accepted but unconditional surrender. Once more the batteries commenced firing, and once more the English artillerymen advanced, taking possession of the second line of defences. On the morning of the 28th Kirkaldy himself, a white rod in his hand, came upon the ramparts he still called his own, and demanded a free departure with all his men, declaring that if not granted, the ruins of the fortress should bury besiegers and besieged. He was told that his soldiers might pass out free, but that as regarded himself, Lethington, and three others, they must surrender unconditionally. The laird knew what it meant, and returning to his men prepared to die a soldier's death. But now rebellion arose in his own camp. The garrison, having overheard the offer made to their commander, and seeing further resistance utterly hopeless, opened the gate for themselves; and in the evening of the 28th of May the flag of King James waved over the ruins of Edinburgh Castle. For the first time since that other May evening, five years before, when Mary Stuart fled from her prison in Loch Leven, all Scotland obeyed one ruler.

There was not much uncertainty regarding the fate in store for Lethington and the laird of Grange. The former made desperate efforts to save his life by imploring the aid of Elizabeth; but although the queen interceded in his favour with the regent it was of no avail. The rage of the people against Lethington was so great that he had to be protected by a strong guard of soldiers to save him from violence, which hatred, together with the shame of the gallows, had such an effect upon his mind that he committed suicide in his prison, eleven days after the surrender of the castle. "Lethington died at Leith after the old Roman fashion," Sir James Melville noted down in his diary. After the death of the man who had looked upon God as a nursery boggle, there remained only the laird of Grange for punishment. The friends of the latter exerted themselves for him in a manner profoundly touching. Eighty men, some relatives of the laird and others connected with him by ties of friendship of long standing, offered to become perpetual servants to the house of Angus and Morton "in bond of manrent," and to give up all their lands and chattels and whatever else they possessed in exchange for his pardon. But the regent was inexorable; he had the reputation of being grasping, yet the immense bribe offered served but to fortify him in the stern path of duty. "Considering," he wrote to Sir Henry Killebrew, who continued pleading in the name of his mistress for the life of the old soldier, "considering what hath been daily spoken by the preachers that God's plague would not cease till the land was purged of blood, and considering the demands of those who, by the death of their friends, the destruction of their houses, the taking away of their goods, cannot be satisfied by any offer made to me in particular, I have deliberated to let justice proceed." Accordingly, on the 8th of August, Kirkaldy of Grange, whom Lethington had flattered that he would become a second Wallace, was placed in a low cart and drawn from his prison to the gallows erected in the High Street of Edinburgh. The minister who, at his own wish, attended him to whisper in his ear the last comforts of religion was David Lindsay, the same who had carried to him the final message of John Knox. It was four in the afternoon when the mournful procession arrived at the place of execution, all Edinburgh looking on in breathless silence. By order of the regent, the hangman fastened the rope round the neck of the laird so that he might look eastward towards the castle, place of his great crime; but as the cart moved on from under the doomed man, the body swung slowly round, till the evening sun was streaming full upon his face, now livid in the agony of death. Then David Lindsay remembered the words of Knox: "He shall be dragged from his nest with shame, and hung on the gallows against the sun."

Elizabeth's troops had withdrawn from Edinburgh long before the execution of the laird of Grange. Careful not to incur unnecessary expense, Sir William Drury received orders to reshipe his hackbutters, pikemen, and great guns as soon as the castle was taken, with special injunction to gather and bring home as many of the three thousand balls which had been hurled against the old walls and towers as could be picked out of the ruins. Sir Henry Killigrew also went back to England a month after the troops had left, conveying the thanks of Morton to the queen, and the expression of his hope that she would carry out the proposal made to his predecessor of sending the murderers of Kirk o' Field for trial before her judges. Elizabeth accepted the thanks, but professed to be almost angry at the offer. In the first excitement following the massacre of the Huguenots she had been willing to sacrifice Mary Stuart to appease the wild cry for vengeance raised throughout the land; but since that time the waves had subsided, and her grim purpose had subsided with them. Her horror of bloodshed was sincere, and, combined with her high notions of royal privilege, made her utterly unwilling to punish the fallen queen more than absolutely necessary for her own protection. Mary Stuart, too, had given signs of repentance of late which even Burleigh believed sincere. Unable to conspire by reason of her strict confinement, and with no more time to expend upon dictating letters to all the princes of Europe, and inventing and changing ciphers for secret correspondence, she had taken to needlework, millinery, and the rearing of turtle-doves. "My lord of Glasgow," she wrote to her representative at the French court, while Edinburgh Castle was being besieged, "I beg you to obtain for me some turtle-doves and Barbary fowls, that I may bring them up in this country. I should take pleasure in feeding them in their cages, as I do all the little birds I can find: these are the only pastimes of a poor prisoner." The archbishop of Glasgow was too good a diplomatist not to hand the letter to Elizabeth's ambassador, who sent it on to his mistress. The queen appeared touched by the little piece of comedy, and was more touched still when Mary sent her some tablets and other descriptions of fancy work which she had made with her own hand. Monsieur la Mothe-Fénélon had to deliver these presents; and when he informed Mary Stuart that they had been well-received, she broke forth in a lively strain of thankfulness. "I feel the greatest satisfaction," she told the French envoy, "at the good news you give me, that it has pleased the queen to accept my tablets, for I desire nothing so much as to be able always to please her, in the least as well as in the most important affairs. I am desirous to make her a head-dress as soon as I can; but if you think some articles of network would please her better, I will make them." Edinburgh Castle had fallen and the laird of Grange had been hung when this letter was written. For months Mary Stuart was in mortal fear of being delivered up to the regent, her bitterest enemy; and while the fear lasted she remained energetically attached to tablets, needlework, and turtle-doves. It was partly in consequence of this useful occupation that, towards the end of the year, Sir Henry Killigrew informed Morton that her majesty had no intention to deliver into his hands the late queen of Scots.

The re-establishment of peace in the northern kingdom left Burleigh's hands free to act in another direction. The great object of his foreign policy, that of aiding in the establishment of Protestantism on the continent of Europe, had received a terrible check in the French massacre, and to repair the defeat suffered thereby became his most immediate task. But here again he met with resistance on the part of Elizabeth. She professed deep sympathy with the unfortunate Huguenots, yet would not on this account give up her intercourse with the perfidious monsters who had deluged France in blood, and continued persecuting the Protestants in the most horrible manner; and while sending kind letters to many of the followers of Coligny who had escaped from the scene of murder and found a refuge on English soil, she at the same time corresponded in a still more friendly tone with the murderers. All that Burleigh could do under these circumstances was to give his help in a more or less covert manner, meeting the ambassador of Catherine de Medici in the morning in the queen's apartments and the envoys of the Huguenots in the evening in his own house. The cause of the French Protestants after the massacre was desperate, but not altogether hopeless. They had lost the whole of their leaders, and with them all organization as a political body, as substitute for which they had nothing but their indomitable courage and the strength of their religious convictions. That they possessed both to a supreme degree they soon proved. Rallying together in such towns and fortresses where they were forming a majority, and making, as before, the province of Aunis, with La Rochelle for a centre, their head-quarters, they succeeded in the course of a few months in forming themselves once more in a body, asserting their inalienable right to worship God after the dictates of their consciences. However, full confidence as they had in their own good cause and the strength of their arms to defend it until death, the Huguenots were perfectly aware that they would have to succumb to numbers unless receiving foreign assistance, and one of their first objects, therefore, after some kind of reorganization had been effected, was to despatch envoys to the other Protestants of Europe requesting help. But nations as yet had no voice but in their princes, and there were but two powers able to assist the Huguenots—the Protestant princes of Germany, united in confederation, and the queen of England. The former, stirred into unwonted energy by the report of the horrors enacted in France, immediately collected troops and money, placing both at the disposition of the Count Palatine, whose possessions on the left bank of the Rhine afforded the greatest facility for giving the demanded succour. But though welcome as diverting a part of the forces of the enemy in another direction, the German troops could offer no direct assistance to the Huguenots grouped in the west of France, and their chief hopes rested with Queen Elizabeth, whose fleet alone was able to cover La Rochelle, and whose word alone had power to stay the grip of that religious fanaticism which threatened to crush Protestantism for ever. Unfortunately for those hopes, the queen refused even to see the Huguenot envoys, though on Burleigh's intercession she gave them secret aid in money, as well as permission to arm a number of small vessels at Plymouth and Falmouth. The fleet thus equipped, consisting chiefly of fishing-boats, and commanded by count de Montgomery—the same who had accidentally killed at a tournament the husband of Catherine de Medici—left England at the beginning of April, 1573, to relieve La Rochelle, closely invested by the royal troops. On the 19th, Montgomery's vessels appeared in the roadstead of La Rochelle, awaking the enthusiasm of the Huguenots, who, ranged on the walls in battle order, set to singing the sixty-eighth psalm, "Let God arise; let His enemies be scattered." But while they were exulting, the batteries on shore opened their guns upon Montgomery's fleet, which was scattered in all directions, vainly seeking shelter under the protection of ten large men-of-war, which Elizabeth had sent to cruise in the Channel. While secretly aiding Montgomery, the queen had openly informed Monsieur la Mothe-Fénelon that his government would be at liberty to treat the men embarking from her realm in aid of the Huguenots, whether Englishmen or Frenchmen, as pirates.

La Rochelle was saved by the valour of its defenders, notwithstanding the abandonment of Elizabeth. After more than thirty thousand men had perished under its walls, one-half under the swords of the Huguenots, and the other half from pestilence and want, Catherine de Medici withdrew her troops, and entering into a treaty with the hated heretics, promised them once more complete religious liberty. What the promise was worth the Huguenots knew fully; but they signed the treaty laid before them, and then set to perfect their organization and their armaments. Misfortune had taught the Protestants of France its own severe lesson, and they were beginning to see that extermination would be their inevitable fate should they continue to place nationality above religion, and while striving to obtain freedom of conscience at home should forget linking themselves arm in arm with the men of other countries fighting the same battle. Already Germany had sent them assistance which, though unavailable for the moment, was precious; and it now remained to draw closer these bonds, and to form others connecting their interests with the Protestants of England, Scotland, and the Netherlands. The people of the latter country were continuing their protracted struggle against the despotism of Spain and of Rome, with not much immediate advantage before them, but success looming grandly in the future. As to the Huguenots, so to the Flemings, the sea was the great bulwark to fall back upon, the last refuge of liberty; and having more of the vast sea at their back, the Dutch Protestants possessed an immense natural advantage over the French in the battle for freedom. To connect hands across the ocean was evidently a gain to both, and acting upon this plan an intimate union was established before long between the defenders of La Rochelle and the citizens of the maritime towns of Flanders and Holland. A fleet of small vessels, manned by daring seamen, soon covered the Channel from the isle of Ushant to the Texel, and not an enemy's ship was allowed to pass without the protection of men-of-war. The Dutch and French privateers, working hand in hand, mostly carried their prizes into English ports; but this having been interdicted by Elizabeth, through the representations of the Spanish government, they established markets of their own at the coast of Holland, on islands and outlying peninsulas beyond the reach of Alva's soldiers. It was in vain the Spaniards attempted, at immense expenditure of blood and treasure, to drive the heretics from these sea-bound fortresses. Breaking down the dykes and opening the sluices, the fighters for freedom erected walls not to be destroyed by guns; and while annihilating the inheritance of their fathers, painfully gained from the ocean, cut themselves adrift for ever from Rome, the inquisition, and the Council of Blood.

The first aggressive movements of the allied Huguenots and Flemings met with considerable success. After hiding for nearly a year among the Channel islands, supplied with funds by Burleigh, and threatened with imprisonment by Elizabeth, Count Montgomery made a bold attempt of invasion in Normandy. With the help of Dutch sailors he effected a landing at the coast opposite Jersey, and marching straight inland made himself master of Valognes, St. Lô, Carenton, Domfront, and other towns in western Normandy inhabited by Protestants. By a preconcerted plan, the Huguenots of La Rochelle, likewise aided by Flemish auxiliaries, together with a small number of English volunteers, seized Fontenay, Lusignan, Royan, St. Jean d'Angely, Rochefort, and two or three other strong places in the provinces of Poitou and Saintonge, expelling the royal troops with extraordinary facility. The movement was well timed, the wild excitement of the St. Bartholomew murders having been followed by a deep reaction among the more intelligent men of the Catholic middle and upper classes, who, fearing the establishment of a despotism viler than that of the inquisition if Catherine de Medici should be allowed to continue her career much longer, began to range themselves silently at the side of the Huguenots. The party thus formed, known as "the Politicians," or moderate Catholics, numbered some of the most influential men in France, among them the duke of Montmorency, son of the great constable; marshal de Damville, one of the best of the royal generals; and, above all, the duke d'Alençon, youngest brother of the king, and approved suitor of Queen Elizabeth. The latter was brought over to the new party by Henry of Navarre and the young prince de Condé, the hereditary chiefs of the Huguenots, whose life had been spared in the night of St. Bartholomew on condition of their embracing the Roman Catholic faith and attending the mass. They consented to do so, but remained Protestant at heart, awaiting only a fitting opportunity to rejoin their old friends. This opportunity they considered had arrived with the landing of Count Montgomery on the west coast; and the report of it had no sooner arrived at court when Condé and Henry of Navarre resolved to fly into Normandy. It was easy for them to induce Elizabeth's lover, a rather weak-minded youth, to join them in their flight; the scheme being held out before him that he should be proclaimed king of France, Charles, his brother, suffering under incurable illness, having been previously declared unfit for government, as well as the duke of Anjou, heir-apparent, the latter on the ground of holding the crown of Poland, which he had received by the election of the nobles a few months before. The plan was deep-laid, and not without considerable chances of success; but it failed for want of courage of the chief actors. The arrangement, settled in a secret correspondence with Montgomery, was that the three princes should leave Paris early on the morning of the day before Easter, Saturday the 10th of April, 1574, on the pretence of hunting in the forest of St. Germain, where they would be met by a strong force of Huguenot officers clad in the garb of royal soldiers, who were to conduct them by way of Mantes and Evreux to St. Lô, guards, likewise in the king's uniform, being stationed all along the road. Everything seemed drawing to the successful issue of this scheme, when, two days before the appointed excursion to St. Germain, the duke d'Alençon revealed the great secret to one of his mistresses, who, having long acted as a spy, forthwith communicated it to the queen-mother. Catherine de Medici was never wont to hesitate. In less than an hour Alençon, Condé, and Navarre found themselves arrested, while the queen-mother hurried to Charles, inciting him to kill the three princes with his own hand, as they were conspiring against his throne as well as his life. But the king, without giving a reply, turned away his face. He felt that he was dying, and the dark shadow approaching his soul, his hand began to shrink from murder.

The discovery of the great conspiracy created a momentary terror at the court of France. Catherine de Medici loved but one human being—the duke of Anjou, the son most like herself; and he being far away in Poland, her fears were that a sudden revolution, before or after the death of the king, now expected to be sudden, would snatch the crown away from him to be placed on the head of d'Alençon. Shrinkng from nothing, she would gladly have destroyed the latter although her own son, but that her instruments for once refused their service. Real friends she had none, and could not have; and her own power depending in reality but upon the breath of the bearer of the crown, the adherents she possessed looked about with wary eyes not to compromise themselves, rather inclined to turn their daggers against herself than against the possible future king. Catherine had to find, with grief and bitterness, that even the guards which she had placed around the three princes, composed though they were of her own creatures, could not be trusted. Aware that Charles was dying, and doubtful whether d'Anjou would come back from Poland in time to grasp the vacant crown, they bowed in the dust before d'Alençon, offering to let him go where he liked, and even putting their swords at his service. However, the young prince had neither his mother's nor his brother's spirit, and trembling for his life which he knew was in danger, refused all offers of assistance. Henry of Navarre likewise refused to fly, deeming it prudent to remain near a throne between which and him there stood, besides a dying man, but two dissipated youths not likely to revel long in the glare and temptation of supreme power. Condé alone, fearing more and hoping less, accepted the offer of his guards, and determined to seek safety in escape. On Easter morning, three days after having been made a prisoner by Catherine, he made his way out of the Louvre, threw himself on horseback, and with a few friends rode away to the east. Before the week was over, he had succeeded in reaching Strasbourg, free city of the Germanic empire, from which he sent circulars to all the Huguenot towns of France, declaring that he had been forced to become a nominal convert to popish superstition, but that, having recovered his liberty, he intended to devote heart and soul to the great Protestant cause. Once more now the French Calvinists had a leader, an advantage the more important as Condé inaugurated his new career by taking command in the army of the prince of Orange, as if to show his friends that the enemies of the Huguenots had to be fought in the Netherlands as well as in France.

Condé's flight greatly exasperated the queen-mother, and, to vent her rage, she ordered the chief confidants of d'Alençon, a Piedmontese count named Coconas, and another nobleman named La Môle, to be put on the rack in order to extract from them the secrets of the conspiracy entered into with the Huguenots. The revelations they made amounted to little; but in consequence of them the duke de Montmorency, and several other distinguished men among the "Politicians," were sent into the Bastille, and several others ordered for execution. Coconas and La Môle were likewise put to death, after undergoing the most frightful tortures, their limbs being plucked to pieces bit by bit with red-hot pincers. Catherine ordered these atrocities out of personal vengeance, the two victims being known to have scorned her own advances, and become subsequently the highly-favoured lovers of two of the royal princesses, the young duchess de Nevers, and her still younger daughter Margaret, married to Henry of Navarre a few days before the St. Bartholomew massacre. Margaret, who even after her marriage figured openly as the mistress of La Môle, got so enraged at his death that she attempted the life of her mother, but not succeeding in her murderous design, was shut up in her room. Here she was joined by her frail sister, the duchess de Nevers, and the two princesses having procured from the executioners the heads of their lovers, they embalmed them with their own hands. In the meanwhile Catherine kept on killing and torturing the attendants of her son, with the effect of getting at last all the particulars of the plot in which he had been engaged. Making use of the knowledge, she invented a scheme for seizing the leader of the Huguenots in Normandy, Count Montgomery, who continued entertaining hopes that both d'Alençon and Henry of Navarre would free themselves from their confinement and come to join him. The scheme succeeded to perfection. Her spies passed into the fortress of Domfront, where Montgomery was waiting with a handful of men, and opening the gates in the night—night of the 26th May, 1574—let in a strong force under General Matignon, who after desperate resistance carried the whole of the Huguenots away as prisoners. The men were hung on trees along the roadside, but Montgomery was carried in chains before the queen-mother, who received his prayer for pardon with curses and looks of rage. It was he who had killed her husband, and it was he who had attempted to take the crown from her favourite and only worthy son to put it upon the head of another she despised. Catherine resolved to exhaust all the tortures ever invented by hell upon the Huguenot leader.

While these horrors were taking place at the court of France—a mother attempting the life of her son, and the daughters dreaming murder and embalming the skulls of their paramours in the presence of their husbands—the crowned head of the family, chief of the illustrious house of Valois, was breathing heavily in the agony of death. In a narrow room of the royal palace, scene of murder, of debauch, and of crimes unutterable in their hideousness, near a window overlooking the courtyard where he himself had helped assassinating the Huguenots, King Charles IX. was lying on his death-bed, on the 30th of May, attended by a Huguenot nurse who had fondled him when a baby, the only being upon earth that ever loved him. All his courtiers had fled, Catherine having obtained the day previous his signature to a deed nominating her regent of the kingdom; and now even the most devoted of the royal servants had quitted the chamber of death, unable to bear the frightful odour of the room, accompaniment of the dire disease which destroyed a dissolute life at the age of twenty-four. The Huguenot nurse alone remained at the side of the dying king, attempting to allay with kind words the dreadful pain which was racking his body, and trying to lead his maddened soul up to the calm of heaven. But his shrieks drowned her prayers: his agony was too great to be allayed by supplication. At length, the end drawing nigh, his bodily tortures ceased, and the mental anguish commenced. "What blood do I see all around," he cried, "what blood and what murder! Where am I? What will become of me? Merciful God have pity upon me." The nurse, kneeling in prayers at the bedside, again tried to console the dying king. "The blood," she whispered, feebly, "may fall on the head of those whose bad counsel drove you into murder." But his anguish increased; his breath was getting thick and heavy. "Merciful God have pity upon me!" he cried once more; "I am lost! I am lost!" Then his head sank back upon the pillow: King Charles IX. of France was no more. The nurse of the king kept kneeling and praying at the bed; and in the room above the mother of the king was busy examining a locket which she had taken from her bosom. Catherine de Medici had no particular faith in heaven or in hell; yet she put trust in earthly demons, and the talisman which she held in her hand, and which never left her body, enshrouded, she believed, the essence of demoniacal power, together with her own fate. It had been given to her by a great magician and astrologer, passing under the mundane name of Regnier, and was made, as he had told her, of human blood partly, and partly of the blood of a sacred ram, and partly of crystallized gold, the whole melted together under the constellation ruling her nativity. Catherine, her son lying dead beneath her feet, looked fixedly at her talisman, till the future arose from out its magic lustre. Long before she had been told that every one of her sons was destined to wear the royal diadem, and now it was being fulfilled. Already two had worn the crown of France; but to Anjou now, worthiest of her blood, the task was given to perpetuate the ancient lineage of Valois, and to be father to generations of kings. There was no room left in France for d'Alençon, her youngest-born; but his crown, too, the queen-mother saw in her talisman. Fate willed it, and Catherine determined that d'Alençon should have the crown of England, as husband of Queen Elizabeth.

Catherine's taste in aspiring for her son to be Elizabeth's partner was not to be blamed, the throne of England having become, for the time being, the most enviable in Christendom. While all the sovereigns of Europe were engaged, without one exception, in fighting with each other, or with their subjects, the realm of Elizabeth was enjoying profound peace, flourishing beyond precedent, and constantly progressing in the arts of civilization. The oppressed of all nations, after vainly battling in their own country for the privilege of addressing heaven without going to Rome; after seeing their houses burnt down and their friends killed for questioning the right of an old man in Italy to call himself the representative of God upon earth, came flocking in crowds to England to seek an asylum, and to build a new home. To this influx of foreign immigrants—the best, most industrious, and the most intelligent men of France, of Germany, and of the Netherlands—the material prosperity with which Elizabeth's realm was blessed was owing to a great extent, and the queen knew it so well as to neglect no means to develop this source of wealth as of civilization. By her directions, based on the wise counsels of Burleigh, the Calvinists of France, the Lutherans of Germany, and the reformers of the Netherlands, were settled comfortably in the towns and villages of eastern, south-eastern, and southern England, where they established new trades and manufactures, spinning the wool of native growth, formerly exported at low prices, into costly cloth, and forging the crude ore dug from the soil into shining swords and battleaxes, and more glorious spades and ploughshares. It was the essence of Elizabeth's greatness as a ruler that she was ever anxious to encourage the arts of peace, detesting war even for the highest of objects; so that while the rulers on the Continent were busy outdoing the homes of industry, she planted them anew in the realm under her sway. The queen's interest in the well-being of the Protestant settlers was not confined to giving general orders, but descended into the details of their life. She ordered regular reports to be forwarded of the progress of the industrial colonies established by her, and the welfare of every individual inhabitant, and though economical to parsimoniousness in other respects, she never got tired of spending in their behoof, firmly persuaded that the seed thus sown would be repaid a hundredfold. Finally, in the summer of 1574, while Catherine de Medici was planning new murders, and Philip of Spain sending fresh soldiers into Flanders to strengthen the Council of Blood, Elizabeth set out on a journey through the kingdom to inspect with her own eyes the progress of industry. It was the first industrial journey ever undertaken by a sovereign of England.

Elizabeth left her palace at Greenwich, accompanied by Burleigh and a numerous train of courtly gentlemen, on the 14th of July. Travelling by way of Croydon, to visit Archbishop Parker, the royal party entered Sussex at the end of the month, to proceed towards Rye and Winchelsea, seats of various Huguenot colonies. What she saw on the way of the state of the country, could not fail to impress upon her the conviction that there was room for a great many more busy hands, foreign or home-grown. "In these parts of Sussex," Burleigh informed his friend, the earl of Shrewsbury, "there are more dangerous rocks and valleys, and much worse ground than in the Peak." Of roads there was not a trace; pack-horses carried the merchandize, whatever little there was to be carried, and files of armed men had to protect it against the attacks of robbers and footpads. The contrast of entering the foreign settlements from these wilds and deserts, with not a house to be met with for dozens of miles, was great indeed, and such as to impress the queen most forcibly. She tarried at all the towns with evident satisfaction, proceeding through Sussex to Folkestone, from thence to Dover, and further on to Sandwich. Here was the largest of the settlements established by Huguenots; and Elizabeth's delight in seeing its flourishing condition was so great that she threw off all the restraints of etiquette, wandering about like an old friend among the stern Calvinists, whose creed she still held in deep aversion. The foreigners at Sandwich had made great efforts to please the majesty of England. The whole town was neatly gravelled and strewn with rushes and flowers, all the houses newly painted, garlands stretching across the streets, and rich silks and tapestries hung out of the windows. More marvellous still to a royal traveller fresh from the "dangerous rocks" of bucolic Sussex, the Sandwich colonists had their town-poet and town-orator, delivering verses and speeches in classic Greek and Latin—the lyrics so profuse as to be hung up in long strips at every street-corner, and, in terrible magnitude, at the walls of the dwelling prepared for the maiden queen. Elizabeth was charmed with all these attentions, quite after her own heart; and the public orator having presented her with a Greek Testament produced in the town, she gave vent to her delight, exclaiming, "Gaudeo me in hoc natam esse, ut vobis et ecclesia Dei proximis,"—happy I to be born in this age, to be able to aid you and the church of God. Then the queen sat down to a dinner at the school-house, prepared by the mayoress of Sandwich and her sister—good Latin scholars as well as capital cooks—and feasted as she had never feasted before. So great was her joy and her confidence, that she ate the meals set before her "without any assay," a thing at which the courtiers stood aghast as unparalleled in boldness. After remaining three days among her Calvinist subjects, Elizabeth, at her departure, witnessed a sight which pleased her above all others. On a grassy slope, among flowery arches, garlanded with vine branches, some hundred children were sitting in their holiday clothes, spinning baize and other textile fabrics. Elizabeth watched the little weavers till tears came into her eyes, and then gave a glance at Burleigh which he but too well understood. He appreciated not less than the queen the sweets of peace, and hated not less than she the horrors of war; yet his larger brain comprehended better than hers that but for the stout vessels in the Channel and the stout swords opposing the rush of Rome's legions down the Rhine and the Seine, the industrious little heretics could not spin baize at Sandwich.

Returned from her peace progress, Elizabeth had various special embassies waiting for her—from Catherine de Medici, now more than ever ruler of France, from the Huguenots, and from the revolted Flemings. Catherine announced the accession of her son as Henri III., and the advance of d'Alençon to the dukedom of Anjou, the title borne by the heir-apparent to the throne. For the latter she now solicited most earnestly the hand of the queen; offering that if she would but give her permission, he should come to England and prefer his suit in person. The proposal was flattering enough to Elizabeth's vanity, yet she was not at all in the humour to accept it, under the new aspect of things in France. With the accession of Henri, who had quitted his Polish throne—which he had filled only a few months—in the most disgraceful manner, running away like a thief in the night, and, like a veritable thief, carrying off crown jewels to the value of a million of livres, a fresh persecution had set in against the Huguenots. The young king, whose reason was fast giving way under the effect of the most horrible debauches, declared openly to the envoys of his Protestant subjects, who had come to offer their congratulations, that he left them the choice between becoming orthodox Catholics or being exterminated; and the effect of it was that the Huguenots sprang to arms once more, determined to sell their lives and their liberties as dearly as possible. Waiting to be attacked every moment, they made another attempt to gain the assistance of Elizabeth, imploring her in the most pathetic manner not to look on quietly while they were being massacred by their enemies. The queen felt touched, yet refused to swerve from her peace policy. To Catherine's ambassador she spoke somewhat sternly about the new persecutions of his mistress, comprising the murder of Count Montgomery, who, after promise of a safe-conduct, had been put to death under hellish tortures; but afterwards was as friendly as ever to Monsieur la Mothe-Fénélon, whose smiles and bows seemed irresistible. The Flemish envoys were not much more fortunate than those of the Huguenots. Elizabeth told them that she deeply sympathized with their efforts, but that it was out of her power to assist them, King Philip being her old ally, and she having no cause whatever to interfere between him and his subjects. At a private audience following the interview, the queen allowed her sympathy to show itself more tangibly in the promise of a large sum of money to the Flemings. The offer was gratefully accepted, and the supplies forwarded in due course to the prince of Orange, who was generous and far-sighted enough to hand the greater part over to Condé, for distribution among the Huguenots, telling him that joined hands only could fight the battle of freedom.

In the struggle of the Protestant Netherlands, Elizabeth felt more deeply interested than that of Protestant France, for the all-sufficient reason that the former promised success far more than the latter. In France it was the fight of minority against a majority, the latter commanding all the resources of established power; while in the Netherlands it was the rising of a whole population against foreign yoke, which, though possibly protracted, could not but end in victory. The issue foreshadowed itself clearly in the course of a few years. Slowly but irresistibly the insurgents pushed the Spanish armies before them, foot by foot, and almost inch by inch. With the sea at their back, and moving onward with a sort of hydraulic force, the Dutch "beggars," as King Philip called them, and as they were proud of calling themselves, reconquered the land of their fathers, sowing a great crop of liberty with their own blood and that of their enemies. Alva was too good a general not to see, at the lapse of some five years, the ultimate result of the tremendous campaign in which he was engaged; and unwilling to lose at the end of his career the bloodstained laurel crown which he had won in a life of battles, he begged the king to release him from command. Philip could not refuse, and appointed in his place, in 1573, Don Luis de Requesens y Zunega, governor of Milan, a Spanish noble of some fame as general, but with more repute as a statesman. His first efforts were directed to come to a peaceable understanding with the revolted subjects of Philip; but seeing the uselessness of all negotiations with a people claiming nothing less than their liberty, civil as well as religious, he began the war anew, with more ferocity than even Alva. But the result was still the same; foot by foot the heretics advanced, and foot by foot the Spanish troops had to fall back. Most of the veteran soldiers of Philip and his father, seasoned in a hundred battles all over Europe, had already found their graves in the marshes of Holland, and a constant stream of fresh troops was pouring down the Rhine from over the Alps, yet the sea swallowed them all—the sea, and the "beggars" from off the sea, claiming to wear their rags in freedom. For a moment Don Luis de Requesens entertained hopes of victory, in stealing, after the sudden breach of negotiations, upon the city of Leyden, which had conquered its independence, and laying siege to it with an overwhelming force. There were scarce any other defenders but cripples, maimed in battle, within the city, but even these resolved to resist the enemy. After terrible sufferings from famine and pestilence, they succeeded in breaking the dykes which kept off the sea, and the furious waters drowned another Spanish army, while the one-eyed, legless, and armless cripples paddled about in little boats on the stormy waves, a terror to the panic-stricken soldiers, who saved their lives in rapid flight. Much sooner than Alva, Don Luis found that he was opposing a foe that could never be conquered, and grieving overmuch at his ill-success, he died after little more than two years' command. Six months after his death, on the 8th of November, 1576, the representatives of the whole of the revolted provinces, which had hitherto been fighting separately for freedom, signed a treaty of union at the city of Ghent, solemnly declaring the independence of the Netherlands.

The victory of Protestantism was nowhere more welcomed than in England. In the first flush of enthusiasm, even Elizabeth felt inclined to throw off her habitual prudence, and Burleigh obtained permission to place himself in official communication with the new government formed at Ghent. The consequences of this step were somewhat unexpected. At the commencement of 1577, it was announced to the queen that a special embassy had arrived from the Netherlands, headed by the Count St. Aldegonde, friend of the prince of Orange, to offer her the sovereignty of the country, nominally as descendant of the ancient rulers of Flanders, through Philippa of Hainault, wife of Edward III. It was felt by the prince of Orange and the other civil and military leaders who had succeeded thus far in releasing the Netherlands from the Spanish yoke, that the people were too weak as yet to establish a commonwealth of their own, and that the only means of entirely conquering their independence, as well as the still greater task of maintaining it, could be found in attaching themselves to some greater state. England naturally offered itself as both near in geographical position and sympathizing in religion; and St. Aldegonde left Ghent in the firm hope that Elizabeth would not refuse the tempting offer laid before her. But it was too tempting for an over cautious queen. The way in which the new diadem was held before her eyes, as descendant of a long line of kings, was well calculated to arouse both her vanity and her higher ambition as a ruler; but it was not sufficient to make her overlook the fact that the crown of the Netherlands meant war with Spain, and war to the knife. That, some day or other, the great Catholic power would rise against her, do what she might, Burleigh had long told her, yet without enforcing conviction; and she was now less than ever inclined to fear Spanish aggression, seeing how patiently Philip had borne and continued to bear the petty insults directed against him. Open war was the only thing, the queen felt, that could rouse him into action against England, and for this extremity she was not prepared. She therefore informed St. Aldegonde that she must decline, though with deep regret, the brilliant offer made to her by the prince of Orange and the people of the Netherlands, and that she could not offer any other assistance to their cause but diplomatic interference at the court of Spain. The reply was given against the advice of Burleigh, who foresaw that England would be coun-

To succeed Requesens, Philip despatched Don Johan of Austria, his half brother, bastard son of Kaiser Charles V., into the revolted provinces. Don Johan, though not more than thirty years, had the reputation of being both the greatest military and naval commander of the age, and as ambitious as famous, he had lifted his eyes already to a crown. It was at his especial request that his royal brother had sent him into the Netherlands, he having formed in his imagination the great scheme of invading Britain after having conquered the Flemish rebels, and of offering his hand to Mary Stuart, to rule at her side two kingdoms. Wild as seemed the plan, it was less so in Don Johan than it might have been in any other man less favoured by fortune, for his life had been a romance from the beginning, and to himself appeared at times like a dream. The son of a beautiful girl of Ratisbon, Barbara Blomberg, he was early taken away from his unhappy mother, to be educated in the house of a Spanish nobleman as son of the latter; he was then presented, in the midst of a forest high on the Pyrenees, to King Philip, and after that taken to court as a page, and suddenly, without any preparation, at a splendid festival at Valladolid, declared the son of the world-renowned Kaiser Charles. Don Johan was next intrusted with the command of an army against the Moors, whom he defeated in many encounters; then made high admiral of the united fleets of Spain and Venice, which he led against the Turks, with the result of gaining the gigantic naval battle off Lepanto; and finally, left to conquer Tunis and the adjoining Barbary states, seriously bent upon resuscitating the empire of Carthage. There was nothing marvellous in such a man attempting to invade England, which object, indeed, and that of gaining the hand of the royal heroine of Kirk-o'-Field and Loch Leven, seemed puny in comparison with Carthaginian dreams of power. One and the other was a vision; but the battle off Lepanto, on the lips of all Europe as greatest event of the age, was a splendid reality, and Queen Elizabeth herself beheld not without terror the arrival in the Netherlands of the son of Kaiser Charles and Barbara Blomberg.

The first proceedings of Don Johan were eminently skilful. He entered into an arrangement with the provisional government established at Ghent, by the terms of which warlike operations were to cease on both sides for an indefinite period, during which the Italian and Spanish soldiers should be sent out of the country, their outstanding pay, amounting to above 6000 florins, being discharged from the revolutionary exchequer. This agreement was doubly advantageous to Don Johan, by supplying him with money, of which he was greatly in want to stop the clamour of the troops, who, not being paid, had begun to break all discipline, plundering Antwerp and other large towns, and also by allowing him time to negotiate with each of the two great parties before him. Though mainly carried on by the Protestant Flemish population, the insurrection of the Netherlands had gradually come to embrace the Walloon race in the south-eastern parts, Roman Catholic in the main; and to detach the latter element from the former became one of the great objects of the new commander. Deeply impressed with the importance of the maxim "divide et impera," Don Johan carried out the policy based thereon to the full, and in a very short time saw his exertions meet with due reward. By a liberal distribution of gold and of honours, the bastard of Kaiser Charles succeeded in a very few months in splitting the forces of the revolution into three factions, violently opposed to each other. The first, embracing the purely Flemish population of the northern provinces, at once gathered around the prince of Orange, nominating him regent of Holland and Brabant, upon which the Walloons on their part chose the Austrian Archduke Mathias for their ruler. These two elections had scarcely been made when a third group, composed of a mixture of the Flemish and Walloon elements, formed itself in the south-western provinces, Flanders, and Hainault, and invited the duke of Anjou to assume the government. Don Johan, established at Namur with but a handful of German troops, quietly watched the development of the disunion, calculating the time by which the three sections of the insurgents would turn their swords upon each other. In the meanwhile he kept up an active correspondence with the pope, who had been informed of his plan of invading England, and had approved it with passionate energy, offering everything in his power to assist in the great enterprise. The preparations for it soon occupied Don Johan entirely, for to him the Netherlands appeared but a stepping stone to further conquests. Having gained one of the greatest naval battles ever fought, he deemed himself the fit king of the greatest maritime nation upon earth.

Elizabeth was filled with alarm at the sudden change of affairs in the Netherlands. The vast plans of Don Johan were made known to her, as far as they could be discovered by spies at Rome and at Namur, through the prince of Orange, whose agents kept flying to and fro between the Hague and Greenwich, entreating the queen to prevent the invasion of her own country by giving active assistance to her friends abroad. There was sufficient danger to overcome all further timidity on Elizabeth's part, and she accordingly signed, on the 7th of January, 1578, a treaty of alliance with the regent of Holland and Brabant, binding herself to assist him with an army of five thousand foot and one thousand horse, to be maintained at his charge, and to lend him, at the same time, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, on condition that the principal towns of the Netherlands should give security for the repayment of the loan, as well as all other charges in the conduct of the war incurred by the English government. No sooner had Elizabeth concluded this treaty when she became afraid of its consequences, and to soothe King Philip despatched a special envoy, Sir Thomas Wilkes, to represent to his majesty that it was for his own special benefit that he was going to be attacked by a British force, inasmuch as the queen feared that if she did not send an army into the Netherlands, the duke of Anjou would make himself master of the country to annex it to France. Philip did not acquiesce in this innocent view, unable to see that it would do him any good to be beaten by an English army; however, he concealed his deep resentment to Sir Thomas Wilkes, contenting himself with rapidly forwarding troops to Don Johan, ordering him to attack the rebels without a moment's loss of time. The conqueror of Lepanto had already entered the field, and his fortunate star again presiding, he defeated the Flemings, who had brought the whole of their forces together, in a tremendous battle at Gembloux, near Namur. In it perished the flower of the troops of the prince of Orange, bringing the Netherlands at the foot of Don Johan, whose dreams of power kept soaring higher than ever. But all the visions of a wondrous life of romance were now touching the finale, destined to be cut down at a stroke. On the last day of September, 1578, the son of Kaiser Charles, in the fulness of health and strength and glory, passed his army in review, for the great march down to the sea; and on the following morning, the first day of October, he was lying in his coffin. A grain of some mysterious powder had finished in a few seconds the career of a man for whose ambition empires seemed too small.

The grain of powder was believed to have been sent by King Philip. He had long been jealous of the fame of his brother, and it was said that the jealousy had risen into hatred through the discovery of a great plot which Don Johan had formed in concert with the duke of Guise, head of the ultra-papal party in France. The latter faction, getting more powerful with the decay of royal prerogative, the wretched king being despised alike by the Huguenots and their enemies, had been knit together strongly in a Catholic League, presided over by Guise, aiming at the extermination of Protestantism by the means set in operation at the day of St. Bartholomew. Guise was high-soaring in his ambition, almost as much as Don Johan; and after much ciphered correspondence, a far-reaching secret pact was concluded between the two "for the mutual defence of the crowns of France and Spain." Seeing that Henri III. had no children, and was not likely to have any, and that his heir was a weak-minded youth, and the next individual in the line of succession, the king of Navarre, a confirmed heretic, Guise kept his eye fixed upon the throne of France; while Don Johan, remembering that but one man, with two babies in the cradle, stood between him and the grand heritage of his father, aspired to set on his brow one day the diadem of Spain with its vast dependencies, adding it to that of the other kingdoms within the grasp of his ambition. Visionary as were these schemes of world dominion, even in the son of Kaiser Charles, he hesitated not to embody them in ciphers, which, falling into the hands of the Spanish government settled his doom. In Don Johan of Austria, King Philip lost the greatest of his generals, and Queen Elizabeth the greatest of her enemies.

As successor of Don Johan in the Netherlands, Philip appointed Prince Alexander Farnese of Parma, a shrewd man, full of the Italian spirit of intrigue. Following in the steps of his two predecessors, he made it his first object to detach the Catholic Walloon population entirely from the Protestant Flemings, in which he succeeded to the extent that they not only separated entirely from the party of the insurrection, but ranged themselves under his banner. Archduke Mathias, who had hurried up from Austria, against the wish of his illustrious parents, to fill his post as leader, was discharged without ceremony, and Farnese at once prepared to march with his new allies against the enemies of King Philip. These were still divided into two factions, the first comprising the overwhelming majority of the people, the men struggling for religious as well as civil liberty, ranged under the prince of Orange, and the second representing the Catholic inhabitants of the south-western provinces, bent chiefly upon regaining their old political independence, under the duke d'Anjou. To strengthen themselves in the final contest for freedom, the Protestants of the north, soon after the arrival of Alexander Farnese, elected representatives to a great congress, which met at the city of Utrecht, to deliberate on the future of the country. The discussion was short and action immediate, for after a few conferences the deputies representing the provinces of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Guelderland, and Groningen concluded a solemn pact for the establishment of a commonwealth, under the name of "the United Netherlands." The important document, forming the basis of a new state great in the annals of Europe, was signed on the 23rd of January, 1579, and adhered to, shortly after, by three more provinces, Friesland, Drenthe, and Overijssel, thus raising the number of confederate states to eight. William of Orange was elected to be ruler of the united provinces under the title of Stadholder, pending negotiations with Queen Elizabeth, who had been invited by fresh embassies to accept the sovereignty wrested from King Philip. But the queen felt as little inclined as ever to embark in so perilous an undertaking. She sent supplies and a few hundred soldiers, under the command of Sir John Norris, to the prince of Orange, but professed to do so in secret, not interrupting official intercourse with the Spanish government, but attempting, on the contrary, to draw Philip nearer to her by the continued assertion that she had solely his own interest at heart. It was a policy essentially feminine, not made by any means to raise respect for England either in the Netherlands or in Spain, and the only effect of it was that of postponing for a short time a war that had become inevitable, and in the meanwhile giving rise to conspiracies far more ruinous and demoralizing than the clash of armed hosts meeting on the field of battle.

It was not to be expected that Philip should submit tamely to the attacks directed against his power for years, and which were aggravated rather than softened by the smooth speeches of English envoys, whose arguments presupposed him to be a semi-idiot. To humble the queen, whose insults had become unbearable, was the one great object he had most at heart, and he would have declared war at once had not his deep caution constantly overruled his fiercer instincts. After the discovery of the Ridolfi conspiracy an invasion of England was not to be thought of, and discountenanced by even the most warlike of the king's advisers, the unanimous opinion of the Spanish privy council being that the landing of an army in Elizabeth's dominions should be preceded by an insurrection, more or less general, of her subjects. To effect this, crowds of emissaries were constantly despatched into England to preach revolt in the name of religion; but their success was not great, both Burleigh and Elizabeth giving distinct proofs of being determined to oppose persecution to sedition. Burleigh, on whom the cares of government were beginning to tell, his shoulders having borne now for half a lifetime the chief burthen of rule, had strengthened his position, soon after the break up of the Scotch anarchy in the fall of Edinburgh Castle, by admitting two friends into the cabinet, whose assistance proved of the greatest value. These were Sir Francis Walsingham and Dr. Thomas Wilson, both of whom had served as ambassadors in France, who were sworn in as "her majesty's principal secretaries of state" in the last days of 1573, Burleigh advancing to be, as lord high treasurer, the nominal, as he had for years been the real head of the government. Of these two "secretaries," Walsingham was the most important to the queen in the great war which King Philip was waging against her in her own realm. Sir Francis, besides being a staunch Protestant and loyal to the core of his heart, had acquired, in a long sojourn on the Continent, a knowledge of many languages, together with an extraordinary talent for intrigue; and however mole-like the movements of the Jesuits despatched from Rome and Madrid to overthrow heresy and prepare the way for another fête of St. Bartholomew, he almost invariably succeeded in laying hold of them in their haunts before they could do any mischief. According to the testimony of one Lloyd, who stood up as his panegyrist, Walsingham employed not less than seventy spies abroad, and thrice the number at home, to keep himself well informed of the machinations of the enemies of his sovereign and of Protestantism. "He would cherish a plot," master Lloyd proudly remarks, "for some years together, admitting the conspirators to his and to the queen's presence familiarly, but dogging them out watchfully: on some men his spies waited every hour for three years." It was a wretched system of preserving peace and governing a great country, but Burleigh and his friends had not much choice of other means. Open attack might have been met by open resistance; but an army of Jesuits could only be fought by an army of spies.

King Philip's emissaries met with no very great success in England, but they found a better field for their operations in Scotland. Under the energetic rule of the earl of Morton, who kept down revolt with a high hand, ruthlessly punishing all disturbers of the peace, whether rich or poor, noble or villain, the country was fast recovering from the miseries of years of anarchy, when a new source of discord was imported by the ever active agents of Rome. The signal defeat which Mary Stuart's party had suffered on the establishment of Morton as regent had discouraged the leaders for a moment, but not broken their spirit, and they only awaited a favourable opportunity to come forward again. Mary herself quietly watched events from her Sheffield prison, working embroidery for her royal sister of England during the day, and actively corresponding with her friends at Rome, Madrid, and Paris during the night. There was plenty of opportunity to carry on the correspondence, for the rigours of her confinement had been almost done away with in consequence of her industry in manufacturing presents for the maiden majesty of England, the gift of three splendid nightcaps in particular producing the effect of throwing open to her for a while the gates of Sheffield Castle. The captive queen had been allowed to go and drink the waters of Buxton for her health, and had met there, as if by accident, the head of the English government, charming him, like everybody else, by her manners and conversation. Burleigh, having seen Mary Stuart, and admired her skill in working nightcaps and table ornaments, was so much thrown off his guard as to advise the queen to grant her as much liberty as compatible with safety, there being little reason to fear that she would again embark in plots against the peace of the realm. The facility thus acquired to receive old and new friends Mary turned to the best use. She had one great hope left before her, that of seeing her son rise to power above all her enemies, and to this she clung with the tenacity of despair. How to handle the lever of this force was a subject constantly filling her mind, the solution of which finally shaped itself in a correspondence with her cousin, the duke of Guise, who, since he had become chief of the Catholic League, had shown a warmer interest in her fate than even King Philip. Guise proposed to introduce some of the most accomplished of his secret agents, versed in all the arts of flattery and courtly wiles, to the notice of the boy-king of Scotland, and by their means to overthrow the regency of Morton and power of the Protestant party. It was a plan hailed with delight by Mary Stuart, and she not only agreed to use all her influence to bring her son under the domination of Guise's emissaries, with the chief object of making him renounce the faith in which he had been educated, but offered to enforce their action by a document under her own hand. The paper, which received the full approbation of the head of the Catholic League, was in the form of a last will and testament.

"In order," Mary Stuart willed, "not to contravene the glory, honour, and preservation of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman church, in which I wish to live and die, if the prince of Scotland, my son, shall be brought back to its creed in spite of the bad education he has received, to my great regret, in the heresy of Calvin, among my rebellious subjects, I leave him the sole and only heir of my kingdom of Scotland, and of the right which I justly claim to the crown of England and its dependent countries; but if, on the other hand, my said son continues to live in the said heresy, I yield and transfer all my rights in England and elsewhere to the Catholic king, or any of his relations whom he may please, with the advice and consent of his holiness, to appoint. And I do this, not only because I perceive him to be the true supporter of the Catholic religion, but also out of gratitude for the many favours which I, and the friends recommended by me, have received in my greatest necessity; and, furthermore, out of respect for the right which he himself possesses to the said kingdoms and countries. I beseech him, in return, to make alliance with the noble house of Lorraine and of Guise, in memory of the race from which I sprung on my mother's side." The object of this singular document, in which Mary Stuart disposed of kingdoms very much in the same fashion in which she distributed her embroidered nightcaps, was both to gain the favour of Philip for the head of the Catholic league, and of frightening her son into obedience to the behests of Guise's agents. The latter made their appearance in Scotland in the month of September, 1579. The head of the mission, Esuré Stewart, commonly known by his French title of count d'Aubigny, a relative of Mary Stuart, boldly presented himself at court, announcing that he was the bearer of a secret message from the chief of the Catholic League, and would have to confer with the young king in private. It was in vain the earl of Morton opposed the demand, and attempted to chase the popish emissaries. The king, who, by an intrigue of the Hamiltons and other of the old friends of his mother, had been declared of age the year previous, when not quite thirteen, insisted upon seeing d'Aubigny; and the meeting had no sooner taken place when a change, all but marvellous in its rapidity, became visible in him. Young and handsome in person, and hiding under graceful manners all the licentiousness of the most licentious court in Europe, the agent of the duke of Guise in a few weeks gained an ascendancy over Mary Stuart's son which left him deaf to all other influence, and absolutely mutinous to the behests of Morton. The latter felt thoroughly alarmed, and not knowing how to help himself in this unexpected turn of affairs, implored Elizabeth to send somebody to the young king, to counteract the progress of the great papal intrigue that was going on. The queen, advised by Burleigh and Walsingham, appreciated the greatness of the danger; and a diplomatist of experience, Sir Robert Bowes, got orders to proceed to the court of Scotland and to tell James VI. that his succession to the throne of Elizabeth would be in serious danger unless he discarded his new favourites.

Sir Robert Bowes was presented to the youthful majesty of Scotland at Stirling Castle in the spring of 1580, and delivered his message; but had the mortification to see that it had no effect whatever. So far from neglecting his French friend and counsellor, James VI. took a pleasure in showing his regard for him by giving him the appointment of lord chamberlain, at the same time elevating him to the vacant earldom of Lennox, and investing him with the command of Dumbarton Castle. The latter step came to make an end to further indecision on the part of the earl of Morton. Having good grounds for fearing that it was the intention of Mary Stuart to entice the king from Stirling to Dumbarton, where ships were waiting to carry him off to France, he organized measures, in concert with Sir Robert Bowes, for staying the plot by the arrest of the chief conspirators. But this only accelerated the crisis prepared by the emissaries of Guise. Masters in intrigue, d'Aubigny and his allies, chief among them Captain James Stewart of Ochiltree, a continental soldier of fortune, commenced organizing a vast conspiracy against Morton, and, gaining over some of the leading nobles by promises and others by threats, soon found themselves at the head of a band determined to ruin, by any means in their power, the man who had saved the country from anarchy, and healed the wounds inflicted by the fiercest of intestine wars. Blinded both by the confidence of his own power and the trust that his cause was not only that of Scotch but also of English Protestantism, Morton was little on his guard against the conspirators, and ignorant of the mine they were digging under his feet.

It exploded suddenly and with terrific force. On the last day of the year 1580, a meeting of the privy council was held at Stirling Castle, presided over by the young king, whose education in deceit and unscrupulousness had made rapid strides under the instruction of the accomplished teachers from the court of Catherine de Medici. The earl of Morton was sitting quietly at the council-table, discussing affairs of state, when suddenly the captain of Ochiltree strutted into the room, accusing him of complicity in the murder of Lord Darnley. On a sign from the boy-king, who played the part assigned to him to perfection, the guards approached and dragged the earl off to prison on the charge of murder. It was the first public act of the son of Mary Stuart, auguring well for his future career.

When the news of Morton's arrest arrived in England there was a general cry for war. There was no secret as to the origin of the plot which, in carrying the earl to prison, had overturned the Protestant rule in the northern kingdom; and seeing the claim of the boy-king to the English throne, there appeared cause enough to withdraw him by force from the hands of the agents of the Catholic League. Both Burleigh and Walsingham declared themselves strongly in favour of armed interference in Scotland; but Elizabeth was as unwilling as ever to proceed to this extremity. To all her old aversion of war there was added, temporarily, another cause for opposing measures likely to offend the court of France, in the rise of an ardent affection for the duke of Anjou. This hopeful son of Catherine de Medici, who had been dallying for years with the maiden tenderness of Elizabeth, had roused himself at last to a desperate effort in courtship by coming to England in person, to woo for the hand of a queen now verging towards fifty. The effort was due partly to the instigation of Catherine, whose determination to see the English crown on the head of the youngest of her children seemed to grow stronger with the increase of her own difficulties; and partly to the demands of his political friends among the Huguenots, who wished to see him established in the Netherlands. Here the influence of Elizabeth was paramount; and Anjou shrewdly judged that if he could but gain her goodwill, the United Provinces would accept him for a ruler, as well as the districts adjoining France, where he had been already elected, thus enabling him to satisfy his ambition to become the leader of a great nation emerging into freedom. Full of this idea, which had originated, however, not in his own brain but in that of the prince of Condé, who found him a useful though somewhat dangerous tool in the Protestant interest, the son of Catherine de Medici determined to risk the dangers and unpleasantnesses of a trip across the Channel in a visit to Queen Elizabeth. Previous to starting he despatched a "herald of love" to the queen, in the person of one Monsieur Simier, an individual of the most bewitching character. He arrived at Greenwich Palace in the summer of 1579, and proved so irresistible to the maiden queen that she at once admitted him into the circle of her most highly-favoured courtiers, and seemed never happy but when in his company. In return for so much condescension, Monsieur Simier told her majesty an interesting piece of news, which, by reason of his superior attractiveness, he had come to learn from the maids of honour, namely, that the earl of Leicester had been secretly married of late to a young widow, the countess of Essex. *It drove Elizabeth into a towering rage, in which she so far forgot herself as to order the arrest of the handsome earl on whom she had lavished so many tokens of affection. He would have been sent to the Tower but for the intervention of Burleigh, who represented to her the danger of exhibiting her jealousy by such a step, which might serve as a confirmation of all the scandalous rumours that had been spread about her connection with the favourite. The counsel was too wise not to be acted upon, and Leicester was set free again, but banished from the queen's presence. To pay the "herald of love" for his amiable gossip, Leicester attempted to shoot him, but failed, only hitting a poor bargeman. The irresistible individual was greatly frightened, and demanded permission to leave the court, pleading that he had to return to France to give an account of his mission. Elizabeth graciously allowed him to depart, informing him at the same time that his master should meet with the warmest welcome whenever it should please him to come to England. Two weeks had not elapsed when a foreigner, in dusty attire, attended by only two servants, presented himself at the gate of Greenwich Palace, announcing that he had come to pay a visit to the queen. Elizabeth started in joyful surprise when learning that the heir-apparent of France had arrived, ready to sink at her feet and attempt to win her love.

All that was woman in Elizabeth was stirred as scarce ever it had been before when Francis duke of Anjou came to stand in her presence. He was far from being handsome, but had all the grace of manners and suavity of speech distinguishing the most voluptuous court of Europe, which, together with his easy consciousness of exalted birth, made a deep impression upon the queen. Her strong good sense had never yet been drowned under the sea of adulation that kept constantly flowing around her; the kneeling courtiers, pouring forth flatteries without end, could give but small satisfaction to that deep instinct in the female breast seeking to look upward and not downward to the bearer of manhood. Above all, the duke of Anjou presented himself as the first man who ever wooed her as a woman desiring to be wooed, for her own sake. Big-headed Austrian archdukes, represented by sharp-witted diplomatists, and other lovers admiring by proxy, with a sharp look-out for doweries, were but slightly more satisfactory than the courtiers kneeling in the dust, eager to coin riches and honours out of her smiles. But Francis of Anjou, heir to a great throne, not inferior to that of England, arriving in humble disguise to seek her love, facing the dangers of travel by land and sea, was an apparition coming upon Elizabeth like the sound of romance which her heart had never known before. He stayed but three days at Greenwich, but the time was enough to win the queen, and before he left Elizabeth gave him a distinct promise of her hand. At the beginning of October, immediately after Anjou's departure, the privy council met at Whitehall to deliberate upon the marriage of the queen. The debates were far different from what Elizabeth expected. Remembering that the parliament, together with all her advisers, had been constant in their endeavour to persuade her into matrimony, the address of the commons formally declaring that she might marry "where it should please her, with whom it should please her, and as soon as it should please her," the queen fancied that her privy council would joyfully assent to her contemplated union, praying her not to delay it; and great was her astonishment, therefore, when she found that the majority of her ministers were strongly opposed to the match. Elizabeth, while well remembering the past, had forgotten for the moment that fourteen years had elapsed since the commons had sent in their last petition, that she was now forty-seven, and her lover only twenty-three, and that he was the son of the woman-monster who had prepared the horrors of St. Bartholomew. This last was the chief reason why the privy council, clearly expressing the feeling of the people of England, declared itself opposed to the marriage with the duke of Anjou, hiding, however, the objection under the milder and more diplomatic ground of disparity of years. "In years the queen might be his mother," Sir Ralph Sadler blurted out; "there is more than doubtfulness of issue: few old maids escape." The words were never forgotten nor forgiven by Elizabeth.

The opposition of the members of her privy council was not enough to deter the queen from following the bent of her inclination; and having listened to their reasons she began to look for advice in another direction. After the lapse of a week, in which she had various proofs that her proposed marriage was highly unpopular, she asked the advice of Sir Philip Sydney, known to her as one of the noblest and most independent of her courtiers, and, by the testimony of William of Orange, "one of the ripest and greatest statesmen in all Europe." Sydney, with remarkable boldness, indicated the dangers of the French matrimonial alliance to Elizabeth. "The heart of your people will be galled," he told the queen in a letter, "if not aliened, when they shall see you take for husband a Frenchman and a papist, of whom the common people know this chiefly, that he is the son of the Jezebel of our age, and that his brother made oblation of his own sister's marriage the easier to massacre our brethren in religion. As long as he is but a younger prince in might, and a papist in profession, he neither can nor will greatly shield you, and if he grow to be king, his defence will be like Ajax's shield, which rather weighed down than defended those that bore it." Elizabeth's reply to those manly observations, which she had herself provoked, was to order Sydney to leave the court, after which, with ever rising dissatisfaction, she summoned the privy council for further deliberation. But renewed discussion of the Anjou marriage did not do away with the strong objections against it, which so much excited the queen as to lead her into a most mean and spiteful act. A luckless barrister of Lincoln's Inn, of the name of Stubbs, presuming from what he had heard that the maiden majesty of England was in want of advice concerning her love affair, wrote and published a pamphlet on the subject, entitled "The discovery of a gaping gulf wherein England is like to be swallowed by another French marriage, if not the Lord forbid the banns." The book referred to Elizabeth in terms full of adulation as "the crowned nymph of England," and was only hard upon the duke of Anjou, spoken of as "an imp of the crown of France," and "a son of that Henri II. whose family, ever since he married with Catherine of Italy, are violent enemies of the Gospel of Christ, and whose successors have been, one after the other, as a Domitian after a Nero." To punish the man who dared to call her lover an imp, Elizabeth ordered Stubbs, as well as the publisher of his pamphlet, to be arrested and proceeded against under a barbarous statute passed during Mary's reign of terror; and both were condemned to a long imprisonment, and the loss of their right hands. The sentence was carried out in the most cruel manner, the hands being chopped off with a butcher's knife and mallet in the market-place of Westminster. Poor Stubbs, with very unnecessary loyalty, had the courage, when the torture was over, with the warm blood gushing from his arm and his right hand lying on the ground, to lift his cap with his left hand, crying "God save the queen." But he fainted immediately after, was then thrown into a dungeon, and let out only to die as a beggar, his bones being finally buried in the sands of Boulogne.

Engrossed by thoughts of her lover, Elizabeth had no time nor wish to interfere in the affairs of Scotland. After his arrest by D'Aubigny and his co-conspirators, the earl of Morton was at once brought to trial for the murder of Darnley, the avowed intention of his accusers being to annihilate in him the head of the Protestant party as well as the friend of England. During his regency of nine years the earl had shown himself the staunch friend of Elizabeth, keeping in active communication with Burleigh, and doing everything in his power to sow friendship and goodwill between the two realms, so as to prepare the people for the hoped-for union of the southern with the northern kingdom. In return for these great services, redounding to the advantage of England quite as much as that of Scotland, the earl could well claim the help of Elizabeth in the hour of need; but she had nothing to give but vain promises. Instead of marching a few hundred soldiers across the Border, and chasing the agents of the Catholic League back to their haunts on the Continent, she sent a couple of diplomatists, who were laughed at by the emissaries of Guise and openly insulted. The trial of Morton was a mere farce. He confessed freely that Bothwell had desired him, in the name of the queen, to murder Darnley; but he proved likewise that he had distinctly refused to undertake the deed, and not connected himself in any way with the perpetrators of the crime of Kirk-o'-Field. The examination tending to prove more completely than it had yet been done the guilt of Mary Stuart, it was brought to a sudden close; and on the 2nd of June, 1581, the earl was condemned to be beheaded for a murder which, as known to all the world, had been committed at the instigation of the king's own mother. Morton met his doom with the stern courage of a disciple of Knox and the indomitable pride of a Douglas; but his execution raised such a storm that even the favourites of the boy-king, though holding the entire armed force of the country at their command, and supported by French ships of war, quailed before it. They put themselves in a defensive attitude, enlisting as many men as could be had, and freely distributing gold and honours among their adherents, while their opponents, comprising the leaders of the Presbyterian party, gathered together for attack. Once more Elizabeth was entreated to come to the aid of her friends in the north; but once more she refused. She was deeper than ever entangled in the net of the adroit son of Catherine de Medici.

The queen-mother of France had been delighted with the report of Anjou's affectionate reception; and determined to bring to an immediate conclusion what had now become the most anxious desire of her heart, she prepared a splendid embassy to proceed to England and formally claim the hand of Elizabeth for her son. The embassy, consisting of an immense train of knights and nobles, the flower of the French aristocracy, headed by the prince-dauphin of Auvergne, arrived in the Thames in the summer of 1581, and was received by bands of music and salvos of artillery from the Tower. To entertain the distinguished visitors in a becoming manner, Elizabeth for once neglected all her rules of economy, ordering festivals and entertainments of the most prodigal kind. A new banqueting-house, furnished in the most sumptuous manner, was erected expressly for the accommodation of the prince of Auvergne and his brother nobles; and while the regent of Scotland was led to the block by Frenchmen for the crime of being a Protestant and ally of the English queen, the French visitors of Elizabeth, many of them intimate friends, and nearly all sympathisers of D'Aubigny, made merry in dances, drinking-bouts, and masquerades. In her infatuation, the queen scarcely noticed the threatening aspect with which the people looked at these doings, and it was only when informed that a tournament, preparing by her order, could not be held for fear that it might lead to a riot, and, probably, an attack of the mob upon her guests, that she seemed to awaken to a sense of the public feeling on the subject. But this did not prevent her from continuing the more serious part of the business which had brought the envoys of Catherine de Medici into England. The treaty of marriage proposed by the queen-mother was discussed point by point, and notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the majority of the privy council, finally accepted by Elizabeth. It was settled that the nuptials should take place six weeks after the ratification of the treaty on both sides; that the duke of Anjou should assume the title of king of England immediately after the marriage; that he together with the members of his court, should be allowed the free exercise of all the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion; and that he should superintend the tuition of all the children, offspring of the marriage, till the sons had attained the age of eighteen, and the daughters that of fifteen. According to the terms of the treaty, the number of children expected from the marriage was very great. To the eldest son was assigned the crown of France, and to the second that of England, while the others were to be provided with large domains in both countries. There was not a voice raised to remind the love-sick queen that she was but two years from fifty.

It had been arranged that the treaty should be formally signed by the queen and her ministers at the end of August, just before the departure of the French embassy; but before the fatal day arrived Elizabeth, happily for herself, if not for her people, had sobered down sufficiently to perceive that she was standing on the brink of an abyss, and that one step in advance might lead her to destruction. That her marriage with the duke of Anjou was looked upon with more than aversion, she was unable to doubt, after reports received from all parts of the country and through the most trusted of her servants, and nothing was left, therefore, to her but the choice between her lover and her people. Cold and calculating as was Elizabeth's temper, the struggle was great, and to lighten it, Burleigh, who could not help looking with commiseration upon the spectacle before his eyes, managed to get the embassy away without the treaty, the signature of which was neither refused nor promised absolutely. His argument was that the queen should have a longer personal acquaintance with the duke of Anjou before committing herself definitely to the marriage, the few days he had stayed at the court of Greenwich being altogether insufficient to decide upon so important a step. Acting upon this understanding, the greater part of the magnificent crowd of nobles quitted, with some regret, the Westminster banqueting-house, and went their way back to France, intending to return with the lover in their midst. Burleigh's fervent hope was that the illustrious youth who had turned the head of his poor mistress would never show his face again in England; but he was grievously disappointed in his expectations, based though they were on good grounds. Owing to the sudden influence gained by his courtship of Elizabeth, the duke of Anjou had just been elected regent of the Netherlands, William of Orange gladly quitting his own position for the advantage of his country, reserving to himself the hard work, and leaving to others the glory. Anjou had so far answered the expectations set upon him that, with the help of a number of Huguenot generals and a large army, he had seized the important town of Cambray, which he entered in triumph on the 18th of August, 1581. It was Burleigh's hope that, having become a great conqueror, and with his vanity stimulated to the highest pitch, the dangerous lover would remain in Flanders to earn fresh laurels, or at least would do his simple duty as governor to the country, which in electing him to a post of honour could not spare his services for a moment. Such, perhaps, would have been Anjou's course, he being not altogether devoid of the chivalrous feeling innate in every French breast, had his actions been under his own control. However, he was but a puppet in the hands of Catherine, and as she was bent upon the English alliance, he had to quit his command, his warlike glory, his host of new admirers, and, saddest of all, his mistresses, to go on another voyage to foggy England, with no better object than to woo a lady nearly old enough to be his grandmother. Anjou, whatever his other failings, was an obedient son, and shaking off all feelings of discomfort, he braced himself for the undertaking. After a rapid sail across the Straits of Dover and a fast ride to Greenwich, he presented himself, on the first day of November, 1581, once more before the maiden queen, who seemed fairly overwhelmed with joy at his sight.

In his second visit the son of Catherine de Medici more than completed the conquest made in his first. Regardless of the advice of her ministers, and of the freely-expressed opinion of her subjects, Elizabeth showed an obstinate determination to give her hand to the French prince, whom she declared, on the first day of his arrival, to be "the most deserving and constant of all her lovers." Her visible fondness for him increased so much at the end of a few weeks as to give rise to a great deal of slander, to end which the queen took an opportunity of declaring Anjou publicly her affianced bridegroom. On the 22nd of November, anniversary of her coronation, which was celebrated as usual with great pomp, Elizabeth, in the presence of the whole court and all the foreign ambassadors, took a ring from her finger and put it on that of the prince; and, to leave no doubt that she considered herself fully betrothed, gave orders the same day to Walsingham to draw up for her signature the articles of union previously settled. The report of the queen's marriage, which appeared now fixed beyond revocation, gave rise to the liveliest demonstrations of joy in the Netherlands, bonfires being lighted at Antwerp, Brussels, and other towns, where the alliance was looked upon as a victory of Protestantism over Romish aggression. However, the people of England, without exception, remained staunch in taking the opposite view, as Elizabeth was forced to see before many days were over. The murmurs of all classes of the population got so loud that both Burleigh and Walsingham were compelled to become their mouthpiece, and they frankly told the queen that the nuptials with the hated Frenchman, unanimously held guilty of a share in the massacre of the Huguenots, might lead to a revolt, and even place her throne in danger. Walsingham, expert in intrigue, backed the remonstrance by a cleverly-arranged piece of acting. He instructed the ladies of the court, among whom the match with the French prince was not more popular than among the London mob, to sing a chorus of despair on the same evening on which the queen had been preached at in the privy council, so as to heighten the effect of the one by the other. The maids, and others of honour, played their parts to perfection. On a given signal they surrounded Elizabeth, and throwing themselves at her feet, began sobbing and crying as if all their hearts were going to burst at once at the prospect of ruin impending upon their mistress. Amidst floods of tears, the fair speakers reminded the queen of the wretchedness of her sister in the union with Philip of Spain, imploring her not to enter upon a similar alliance, and not to share her power and glory with a foreign spouse, or to sully her fair fame as a Protestant queen by vowing obedience to a Catholic husband. These lamentations, curiously enough, had more effect upon Elizabeth than all the arguments of Burleigh and Walsingham. The wailings of the court ladies were followed by a sleepless night, and the next morning Anjou found the queen pale, broken-hearted, and in tears. She told him she had passed hours of anguish, and "two more such nights as the last would bring her to the grave." Then, summoning courage for the final declaration, Elizabeth informed the prince "that, although her affection for him was undiminished, she had, after an agonizing struggle, determined to sacrifice her own happiness to the welfare of her subjects." The words seemed to take Anjou by surprise; he tried to remonstrate, but was interrupted by Burleigh, who, seeing the agitation of the queen, politely asked him to withdraw from her presence. It was too good an opportunity for dramatic display to be lost by the son of Catherine de Medici. Rushing to his apartment, he tore the queen's ring from his finger, and dashing it to the ground, informed his hearers "that the women of England were as changeable and capricious as their own climate, or the waves that encircled their island." While delivering this fine tirade, Anjou felt overjoyed at being released from the prospect of a marriage utterly hateful to his mind.

Having nothing more to do in England, Elizabeth's lover was anxious to make his way back to his friends, male and female; but she absolutely refused to let him go. More enamoured than ever of her prince after the report of the ring scene, which she considered a burst of love on his part, she entreated him to remain with her, passionately declaring "that it was her intention to marry him at a more auspicious moment, though for the present compelled to do violence to her feelings." Anjou's plea that he was bound to return to his duty as governor of the people of the Netherlands had not the slightest effect, the queen only railing at the "villains" who would wish to withdraw him from her side. To retain the beloved prince, Elizabeth exhausted her ingenuity in devising festivals, masquerades, and pastimes of all imaginable kinds for his entertainment. One round of amusements followed another; hunts and tourneys filled up the day, and concerts, dances, and theatrical entertainments the night. On New-year's day a grand tournament was held in the quadrangle of Greenwich Palace, in which the prince got several hard knocks, which so much excited Elizabeth that she took him by the arm and led him to his own chamber, repeatedly kissing him on the way. The next morning she visited him before he had risen, and, with a burst of passion, told him once more that she was determined to marry him. Anjou now thought that it was high time to be gone. He made his preparations to start in the first week of January; but she managed to postpone the departure under various pretences, and finally told him that she could not bear the idea of his leaving her, and that he must promise to return in a month, after having settled the most urgent of his affairs in Flanders. The promise was given, Anjou feeling more and more anxious to get away from Greenwich. At last, when his departure could no longer be stayed, Elizabeth told her lover that she was going to accompany him part of the way. Accordingly, on the last day of January, 1582, the whole court, the members of the government and of the privy council, set out to accompany the French prince as far as Rochester. Here they stopped the night, the solemn farewell being arranged to take place the next morning; but when the time had come the queen was more unwilling than ever to part, and insisted that Anjou should see her fleet at Chatham. The inspection took a day, and, amidst the thunder of the guns from the whole fleet, Elizabeth declared to her prince that "all the ships and their ordnance were ready to do him service." Staying another night at Rochester the queen felt terribly sad, and decided upon pushing on, in company with her beloved, to Canterbury. A great banquet was set out here, at the end of which Anjou, now fairly frightened at the perseverance of the aged maiden who was leading him about, almost tore himself away, galloping off on the road to Sandwich, and leaving Elizabeth behind in tears. He did not leave empty-handed, for his sufferings had been compensated by the gift of one hundred thousand crowns, and the promise of an English auxiliary army to aid in freeing the Netherlands from the Spanish yoke and establishing him as ruler. On the 8th of February, Anjou embarked at Sandwich, together with the earl of Leicester, appointed to the command of Elizabeth's forces abroad, and accompanied by a numerous fleet under the lord high admiral of England. The two illustrious personages landed thirty hours after at Flushing, where they were received with great demonstrations of honour by the people and the prince of Orange. Led on to Antwerp, Anjou was proclaimed here with vast pomp, on the 19th February, reigning duke of Brabant, to which title were attached a great many dignities, but very limited powers of sovereignty. William of Orange, called the Silent, had taken his measure of the French prince long before Queen Elizabeth.

The United Netherlands had entered upon a great period of their history when proclaiming the lover of Elizabeth duke of Brabant. Seven months before, on the 26th of July, 1581, the states-general, assembled at the Hague, had declared by a solemn act the dethronement of King Philip, and the establishment of a commonwealth of citizens not subject to any born sovereign. The declaration, published to the world, was startling in its boldness; nothing so grand, from a political point of view, had yet come out of Protestantism. "The people," said the act of the 26th July, "are not made by God for the use of a prince, nor are subjects bound to obey their ruler in everything commanded by him, whether it be just or unjust, and to serve him like slaves. We hold that the prince solely exists and is established for the good of his subjects, to govern them according to reason and to justice. If the prince does not his duty, if he oppresses his subjects instead of defending them, and takes away their natural privileges and ancient rights, he ceases to be a prince and becomes a despot: the subjects, when finding that such a prince cannot be turned from his evil ways by petitions and remonstrances, must no longer recognize his authority. We, therefore, the people of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, bound together in the defence of our persons and our rights, our ancient privileges and customs, the liberty of our country, and the honour of our wives and our children, declare that we will no longer obey the king of Spain, and that we will be governed according to the law of nature." Like a torch hurled aloft, the declaration of the Flemish heretics startled all the Catholics powers of Europe. Protestantism, becoming a protest against civil as well as ecclesiastical infallibility, had lost its last claim on tolerance, and nothing but fire and sword was left to outroot it from the face of the earth. The prince of Parma, who had hitherto treated the Flemish rebels with much indulgence, received immediate orders from Philip to prepare for a great campaign, and fresh armies were sent from over the Alps for the subjugation of the Netherlands. They pushed onward from victory to victory, crushing all resistance before them. Maestricht was taken by storm, and every inhabitant put to the sword, not a child being left alive; Tournay followed, with Oudenarde, and other fortified towns, and the Reiters of Alexander Farnese massacred heretics up to the gates of Antwerp and Ghent. While the Spaniards were thus advancing, the new ruler of the Netherlands, lover of Queen Elizabeth, kept amusing himself with grand shows and ceremonies. He made pompous entries into the chief cities, laurel-crowned like a hero from the battle-field, and amidst the wailing of the people, mourning for the loss of their dear ones, spent his time in dancing and noisy entertainment. The Spanish general treated him with supreme contempt, not admitting him even to be a rebel, but ordering that if caught he should be whipped back into France. Concentrating his armies, Farnese at the same time made a great effort to lead William of Orange into battle, feeling secure of being able to smother him under the weight of his forces. King Philip, less confident of victory than his general, did not lose the occasion to aid him by his favourite means, by offering 80,000 ducats to any individual ready to assassinate the prince of Orange. A Spaniard named Jauregui, clerk to a banker at Antwerp, attempted to earn the money, at the instigation of a Dominican monk; but he only succeeded in wounding Orange, and, seized on the spot, was hung for his trouble, together with the monk. The courage of despair now seized the Protestants of the Netherlands once more. Unable to resist the steady onward tramp of the Spanish armies, they again cut the dykes and broke down the sea-walls, preferring to be buried under the waves rather than submit to foreign yoke.

The handful of men which Elizabeth had sent in aid to the Flemish rebels had proved of very little use hitherto, being ill equipped and badly directed. Sir John Norris, their first commander, had treated them so badly that many deserted to the enemy, while the earl of Leicester, acting as general after his arrival with Anjou, showed himself even more incapable than his predecessor. But ineffectual as was Elizabeth's weakly effort to assist the insurgents, it gave rise to deep resentment on the part of King Philip, and long brooding on the means of taking revenge against her, his subdued hatred at last broke out into open flame. Instigated by the pope, who never ceased preaching a crusade against England, and by the duke of Guise, head of the Catholic League and virtual ruler of France in the place of the imbecile Henri III., Philip roused himself into action, and at the beginning of 1582 firmly determined to chastise the English heretics, together with their queen. It was arranged between the king, Guise, and the pontiff that Elizabeth should be assassinated and her realm be attacked from three sides, Philip taking upon himself to land an army on the coast opposite Holland; Guise, aided by his Scottish agents, invading England from over the northern border, and the holy father despatching, at his own cost, a large force into Ireland. The scheme, as vast as clever, and a signal improvement upon the old plan of Ridolfi, was not of King Philip's making or that of his allies, but had been invented by English brains. Great as was the exasperation of pope and king against the heretic sovereign of England, it was pale and feeble compared with the hatred borne against Elizabeth by those of her own subjects who had become exiles on account of religion, and who were nursing their wrath in daily intercourse with each other at various places on the Continent. The English papists, chiefly priests, who had fled their country soon after the death of Queen Mary, unable to serve heaven any longer by carrying faggots and turning the rack, had congregated chiefly in two cities, where they established seminaries, at Rheims, the Canterbury of France, and at Rome. The seminary of Rheims, originally established at Douay, in Flanders, but transferred to the former city in 1575, was under the direction of Dr. William Allen, formerly principal of St Mary's Hall, Oxford, a learned but most bigoted theologian, who had gathered around him a hundred and fifty priests, some of whom travelled about as emissaries, while others educated English pupils in all the branches of knowledge taught by the Jesuits. Similiar to this establishment at Rheims, though less numerously attended, was the seminary at Rome, liberally endowed, in 1579, by Pope Gregory XIII., from the revenues of two hospitals, and employing its funds mainly in sending agents into England to distribute inflammatory tracts against the government, to disseminate the papal bull of excommunication fulminated against Elizabeth, and, in general, to stir up revolt and civil strife. The influence of the emissaries from Rheims and Rome was the greater, as many of them were very remarkable individuals, distinguished alike for their erudition and their energy in the cause they were preaching. It was among these men that originated the great scheme for the tripartite conquest of England and overturn of the Protestant religion.

The first two emissaries of note, active in promulgating the plan, were Edmund Campian and Robert Parsons, both educated at Oxford, and both admitted, after their flight to the Continent, into the order of the Jesuits. They met at Rome in the beginning of 1580, and interchanging their ideas, and submitting them to the general of the Jesuits, they received orders to proceed to England, to investigate the state of the country, and discover the best means of stirring up a general insurrection, simultaneous with the projected foreign attack. The necessary preparations were soon made, and Campian and Parsons, accompanied by eleven other persons, started before the spring was over, receiving at their departure the solemn benediction of the pope. Their movements were very secret, but not enough to escape the vigilance of Walsingham's seventy foreign spies, some of whom, snugly ensconced in the English seminary at Rome, sent early notice of the expedition. To stop the inroad of the Jesuits, all the ports were ordered to be washed, but they landed nevertheless. Parsons, nominal leader of the band, in the garb of a swaggering captain returning from the wars in Flanders, and his companions in various disguises, as merchants, sailors, soldiers, and Huguenot immigrants. Dispersing all over the country, their presence was soon known to Walsingham, who set his vast internal police organization in movement to lay hold of the dangerous missionaries. But although issuing many proclamations, threatening with the severest penalties all who should harbour them, the Jesuit leaders eluded his grip for more than a year, till the summer of 1581, when Campian was caught, and Parsons fled back to Rome. Led from his hiding place in Berks, where he had been arrested, to the Tower, with the inscription on his hat "Edmund Campian, a most pernicious Jesuit," the unfortunate emissary was put to the torture, and, confessing little, was condemned to suffer the death of traitors. He was hanged at Tyburn on the 1st of December, 1581, after a vain attempt of several Catholics of high rank to interest the duke of Anjou in his favour. With his immense influence over the queen, the French prince could have obtained a pardon without the least difficulty; however, when told that an act of mercy would be most beneficial towards softening religious hatred, and filling the wide gulf between Catholicism and Protestantism, he drily retorted that "he cared for none of these things." Elizabeth was said to have admired the words; but Anjou's sister, Margaret, not by any means a pattern of morality, remarked, in reference to them, that "if all infidelity were banished from the face of the earth, her brother could supply the void."

Campian's death did not in the least discourage the indomitable fanatics of Rheims and Rome. Parsons had no sooner reported to the general of the Jesuits the result of his expedition, when two other members of the order, William Holt, and William Creighton, offered their services in the same dangerous undertaking. England having been well explored, it was resolved to send Holt and Creighton to Scotland, of which the latter was a native. It was not an unwise determination, for the state of the northern kingdom at the moment seemed more dangerous to England than it had been ever since the dethronement of Mary Stuart. After the execution of Morton, the whole power of the state had fallen into the hands of the two favourites of the boy-king, the count d'Aubigny, elevated to the earldom of Lennox, and the captain of Oohiltree, converted into an earl of Arran, both of whom received pensions from the pope and the head of the Catholic League. The danger of this situation, which left the realm open, on the side of Scotland, to the invasion of any enemy, while encouraging revolt among her own subjects, was too great for Elizabeth to be borne quietly, and, pressed by her council, she was on the point of sending an army across the Border, when the great love affair interrupted further proceedings. However, Burleigh did his best to repair the vagaries of his enamoured mistress by despatching Sir Thomas Randolph to the north, with the special object of working, together with Sir Robert Bowes, previously appointed, at the reconstruction of a new and strong Protestant party, the leaders of which were to be chosen among the friends and adherents of the late regent. The attempt was very successful, and before many months were over d'Aubigny and his ally saw opposed to them a strong phalanx of bitter foes, who openly threatened to hurl them from their high position, and cut off their heads as traitors. Loudest in their threats were the leading ministers of the Presbyterian kirk, who hesitated not to denounce the new rulers from the pulpit as conspirators against the commonwealth and agents of "the devilish pope." To intimidate his enemies, d'Aubigny exiled the boldest of the preachers, John Durie, minister of Edinburgh, and throw others into prison; but this had no effect but that of making the denunciatory sermons more loud and vehement than before. It was at this moment, when an outbreak seemed imminent, that the two Jesuits, Holt and Creighton, appeared at the court of Scotland, well furnished with letters of introduction. They brought with them a curious proposal, sprung from the fertile brain of Mary Stuart, and highly approved of by the pope and the king of Spain, to the effect of liberating the captive queen by a rapid raid across the Border, and reinstalling her on the throne in association with her son. It was a brilliant stroke for revolutionising England, and sowing the seeds of a mighty civil and religious war at the smallest possible expenditure.

The two Jesuits warmly recommended their scheme to d'Aubigny, and succeeded in gaining him over by their reasoning, although before he had shown no great desire to see Mary Stuart in Scotland, fearing that he should not keep his position after the reinstallation in power of the king's mother. But while consenting to serve King Philip and the holy father, d'Aubigny told the emissaries that he had neither sufficient funds nor soldiers at his command to execute the enterprise demanded of him, and therefore desired them to go back to Paris, to deliver a letter to Jean Baptiste de Tassis, Spanish ambassador at the court of France. The letter, circumspect and cautious in tone, and somewhat in the shape of an inquiry, ran as follows:—"Your king and the pope, according to what I am told, appear to desire to make use of me in the design which they have conceived of restoring the Catholic religion and of delivering the queen of Scotland. Being persuaded that this enterprise is intended to promote the welfare and safety of the said queen of Scotland, as well as of the king her son, to whom the crown will be preserved by consent of the queen his mother, I am ready to employ my life and possessions in the undertaking." This note, dated March 7, 1582, the Jesuits took to Paris, where, immediately after their arrival, they had a secret interview with the Spanish ambassador, at which the duke of Guise, head of the Catholic League, the archbishop of Glasgow, Mary Stuart's representative, and Dr. Allen, chief of the English seminary at Rheims, were present. Philip's envoy showed himself less anxious than the others invited to the meeting to further the deliverance of Mary Stuart, and even gave rise to some distrust by asking Creighton whether he might communicate the scheme to the king of France. "By no means,—en ninguna manera," the Jesuit burst forth; "everything would be lost by so doing, for the whole plan would be communicated immediately to the queen of England." The suspicious question of Jean Baptiste de Tassis, evidence of diplomatic incapacity, prompted Holt and Creighton to write at once to the general of the Jesuits, asking him to induce King Philip to nominate his ambassador in England to conduct the enterprise, instead of his French envoy. Philip was willing, and thereupon the central direction of the great undertaking, which was to serve as the first step for the overthrow of Protestantism in England, was transferred from Paris to London.

Philip's envoy at the court of Queen Elizabeth, appointed after a lengthened interruption of diplomatic intercourse, consequent upon the expulsion of Don Gerald, was Don Bernardino de Mendoza, a Spanish noble of ancient lineage, bold and haughty, as well as a master in intrigue. He had been for some time in secret communication with Mary Stuart, and being appointed to direct the plan for her deliverance, he entered into an animated correspondence, the captive queen promising to put herself entirely under his guidance. She showed her confidence at once by sending him the original of a long and very curious letter addressed to her by d'Aubigny, with the consent, it was stated, of her son, the young king. In this letter the ruler of Scotland for the time being promised to raise an army of 15,000 men, with the help of the pope and the king of Spain, and after freeing her from bondage to overrun the realm of Elizabeth and to seat her on the throne of two kingdoms. Mary Stuart, in forwarding this communication to Don Bernardino, added her own remarks on the great project in a ciphered note. She told the ambassador that she approved the plan of d'Aubigny entirely, but that to insure its success it was absolutely required that the Catholic king should send his succour at once, so as to leave no time for preparation to her enemies. "I will arrange," she wrote, as if sitting on a throne, instead of in the darkness of a prison—"I will arrange with all diligence to strengthen and increase the number of, armed adherents in my kingdom, and will appoint the ports and harbours necessary for the reception of the troops of his majesty." Next to speed in executing the scheme, Mary recommended extreme care and prudence. "My life is in danger," she continued, "and so is the entire state of my son, if this enterprise should be discovered; but I trust you will not allow it to be proved in any way that I am personally engaged in the undertaking. If necessity requires that I should come forward, I have other means at hand, much more convenient, which I may employ for the purpose. But for you, all cautions are requisite to secure the end." Mary Stuart had good reason to preach caution, for her letter was deciphered and copied for Sir Francis Walsingham before it reached the hand of Don Bernardino de Mendoza.

The envoy of King Philip sent his reply promptly by the messenger who had brought the letter—a priest, disguised as a travelling dentist, hiding his ciphered notes in the inside of a little looking-glass. But before the messenger had got to Sheffield Castle, a courier, despatched by Walsingham, had sped across the Border to carry the particulars of the whole plot to Elizabeth's ambassador. Sir Robert Bowes, without losing a moment, unfolded the web of the great intrigue to the leaders of the Presbyterian party, already united in common action against d'Aubigny, urging them to take a decisive step for freeing the country from the thralldom of the foreign adventurers before it was too late. The appeal was effective, and a league was forthwith organized for overthrowing the hated agents of the pope. The bond was signed by the earls of Gowrie, Mar, Glencairn, Rothes, Argyll, Eglinton, and Montrose, Lords Lindsay and Boyd, and a number of the leading Presbyterian ministers, the general agreement being that the revolution should be effected without bloodshed. This appeared difficult of performance, d'Aubigny having at his command a numerous force, and making men to arrest his enemies, of whose proceedings he was aware to some extent. However, a stratagem, devised by the earl of Gowrie, son of that Ruthven who had played so conspicuous a part in the murder of Rizzio, brought the whole undertaking to a fortunate issue. While hunting in the neighbourhood of Perth, in the last days of August, the young king was invited by Gowrie to pay him a visit at his castle of Ruthven, and d'Aubigny not being present for the moment, he accepted the invitation. He had no sooner entered the castle when the confederate earls, at the head of a thousand men, surrounded it, disarmed the royal guards, and informed James VI. that he must consider himself a prisoner until his favourites had been chased from the land. He was then carried to Stirling, notwithstanding his tears and entreaties, while d'Aubigny threw himself into Edinburgh, calling upon the pope and King Philip for help. But long before a Spanish ship could sail up the Forth, the citizens drove him out of the capital, and he had to fight his way, with a few hundred followers, to Dumbarton. Here he embarked on board a vessel despatched by his patron, the duke of Guise, which carried him to France, where he died soon afterwards, as was generally believed of poison. Catherine de Medici justly considered him an obstacle in the marriage of her son with the maiden queen of England.

The victory of the confederate earls having made Elizabeth virtual ruler of Scotland, Mary Stuart once more set to making embroidered nightcaps, and playing poor injured innocence. Unaware that her active participation in the plot for invading England was as well known to the queen as to herself, she began writing humble letters of supplication, representing herself as entirely estranged to the affairs of this mundane world, and given up wholly to prayer and meditation. To make herself more completely a nun, she begged, in the most innocent manner, to be allowed to go to some quiet place abroad—to Rheims, or to Rome. "I beseech you," she wrote to Elizabeth, a month after the flight of d'Aubigny, "for the honour of the grievous passion of our Saviour and Redeemer, Jesus Christ, to permit me to withdraw out of this kingdom to some place of rest, to seek solace for my poor body, worn out with constant grief and pain, and to prepare my soul for God who daily summons me. Give me this contentment before I die, that, seeing all things well set at rest between us, my soul, delivered from my body, may not be constrained to pour out its complaints before God for the wrong which you have suffered me to be done here below, but, on the contrary, in peace and comfort with you departing from this captivity, it may proceed to Him who knows the hearts of men." This very touching prayer had the less effect as Walsingham had just received information that the Jesuits, not in the least discouraged by the failure of their last scheme, were making fresh efforts towards the invasion of England, the murder of Elizabeth, and the elevation of Mary Stuart to the throne. Impelled by Dr. Allen, who had acquired a great influence over him, as well as by the duke of Guise, the Spanish envoy at Paris showed greater energy than before in the enterprise, and warmly recommended to his master a new arrangement, coming from the seminary at Rheims. "The duke of Guise," Tassis wrote to the king, "has resolved, since the change which has occurred in the affairs of Scotland, to rely more upon the Catholics of England, so as to commence the undertaking in that country. He thinks that he has brought matters into so forward a state that he may be able soon to put his plans into execution." Those plans, detailed in the letter of the ambassador, were that Elizabeth should be assassinated, and that England should be invaded at the same time from four different sides, an insurrection having been previously stirred up, with a simultaneous attack upon Ireland to divert the attention of the government. There seemed only one obstacle in the way, which was the as yet incomplete reconquest of the Netherlands. It was from here only the invasion could be launched, the state of France, divided almost equally between the Huguenots, including the "politicians," and the adherents of the Catholic League, with the king reduced to a cipher, making any attack from this side impossible. Consulting with the general of the Jesuits, Philip arrived at the decision, that before carrying war into England he would crush the last embers of the rebellion in the Netherlands.

Among the exiles at Rheims and Rome the determination of the Spanish king caused some dissatisfaction, but they consoled themselves by sending fresh emissaries into England to prepare the great revolt while the Flemish heretics were being exterminated. The latter task appeared to be getting less difficult at the commencement of 1583, when an event hailed with delight by Philip took place in the Netherlands. Elizabeth's lover, the duke of Anjou, after having exhausted triumphal entries into cities and other novelties, bethought himself of becoming a traitor to the people which had elected him for their ruler, by throwing French garrisons into Dunkirk, Bruges, Ostend, Antwerp, and other fortified towns, with the intention of annexing these places permanently to France. The plot, carefully elaborated, succeeded in regard to Dunkirk, but at all the other places Anjou's soldiers were beaten back by the citizens—at Antwerp, after a desperate resistance, in which more than two thousand Frenchmen, who had succeeded in entering the city, lost their lives. Thereupon Anjou tried to enter into negotiations with the Spanish general, but these leading to no result, the prince of Parma very reasonably mistrusting him as deeply as the Flemings after his treacherous behaviour, nothing remained for him but to retire to France, execrated by a whole people. Fortunately for himself and for his country, his inglorious career was now nearly at an end. Broken with disease, consequence of his debauches, he arrived at his estate of Château Thierry in the middle of June, and before twelve months were over had laid himself down to die. Elizabeth felt, or professed to feel, utterly overcome by the report of the death of her wooer, refusing to enter the apartments at Greenwich and Whitehall where she had been at his side, and exhibiting other tokens of deep grief. But the queen had political reasons, besides personal causes, for being affected by the loss of the amiable, if deceitful, prince of France. Hitherto, Catherine de Medici had upheld the alliance with Elizabeth to the best of her power in the councils of the Catholic League, hoping steadfastly that her son might yet wear the crown matrimonial of England; but henceforth she had no ground for sacrificing herself any longer, thus becoming another powerful enemy ready for the invasion of the kingdom.

The great enterprise made considerable progress during the year 1583. While an army of Jesuits were overrunning England, kept in check partly by Walsingham's army of spies, another file of the soldiers of Rheims and Rome had been despatched into Scotland, and achieved a great success. James VI., not yet fifteen, but intelligent and deceitful far beyond his years, had made immediate efforts, after his capture by the confederate earls, to re-enter into communication with the friends of his mother, and, opposing cunning to force, offering plentiful promises and shedding abundant tears, had managed to gain the goodwill of some of his keepers to the extent of being allowed intercourse with strangers. Among these was a Frenchman named Méneville, one of the agents of the Catholic League, who had no sooner gained access to the royal youth when he promised to secure his deliverance from restraint. Several other priests and Jesuits were called in to assist, who, having put themselves in communication with the archbishop of Glasgow, Mary Stuart's representative at Paris, obtained through him from King Philip the sum of eleven thousand crowns, "to be employed," as marked in the note accompanying the money, "in certain affairs of importance." With this large sum at their command, Méneville and his friends saw their road smoothened before them. They bribed the ever greedy Hamiltons, enlisted Border troopers, and corrupted the guards of Stirling Castle; and all being ready, the young king, on the 27th of June, 1583, was led from his place of confinement by the earls of Huntly, Argyle, and Crawford, and conveyed to the fortress of St. Andrew's. The first step of James VI., on having regained his liberty, was to recall his favourite, the captain of Ochiltree, nominal earl of Arran, as his chief adviser; and the second to write a letter to the duke of Guise, offering his renewed participation in the plan for the invasion of England and the overthrow of Protestantism. "The great affection and friendship," the king wrote to the head of the Catholic League, under date of the 19th of July, 1583, "which you do not cease to manifest to the queen my mother and liege lady, as well as to myself, which I have learned from your letters, and from those in which my mother told me of the extreme confidence which she places in you, whose advice and counsels she desires me to follow, induce me to accept the overtures which have been made to me on your behalf. All that you have planned for the liberation of my mother and for the furtherance of our claims appears to me very good, and the means prepared seem to be suitable, provided that matters are adroitly conducted." This letter had the effect of once more altering the preparations for the attack upon England, in so far as the landing of the Spanish troops was concerned. A march from over the Scottish border clearly offered the least difficulties, and was accordingly determined on in the councils of the Catholic League.

The invasion of England, so long under discussion, now seemed imminent. At the end of August the duke of Guise despatched one of the shrewdest of his emissaries, a Jesuit named Richard Melino, to Rome, to inform the holy father that the great enterprise was on the point of being launched, and that nothing more was wanted but money. "The queen of Scots," Guise told the pontiff, "has written to me, as well as the king and some of the principal nobles, all giving information that things are in readiness on the frontier of England, and on the coast where the Spanish fleet is to disembark. By present arrangements, it will be sufficient for his Catholic majesty to supply four thousand soldiers, if means should not be found to send a greater number. But it is indispensable that there should be money enough to maintain an army of ten thousand men for some months, and also cuirasses, pikes, and arquebuses sufficient to arm five thousand soldiers. As the preparations and dispositions of the undertaking are subject to great changes, and as the secret of affairs, which necessarily pass through many hands, runs the risk of being discovered if any delay takes place; and farther, as the king of Scotland has written that, unless he receives prompt assistance it will be difficult for him to maintain himself in the liberty which he has so miraculously regained—being hard pressed by the English queen, who neglects no means of restoring her faction in Scotland—your holiness is besought, in the name of all the Catholics, liberally to grant a supply of money, which is the only thing now needed, and to furnish, for once, a sum proportionate to the greatness of the enterprise." After dwelling again on the absolute necessity of losing no further time, the head of the Catholic League proceeded to give the details of the proposed invasion. He informed Gregory XIII. that the army destined for the purpose would embark at Dunkirk, recently occupied by the troops of the Catholic king, and would land on a convenient point between Dunbar and Berwick, to march at once across the Border. "In this part of England," Guise apprised the holy father, "the Catholics are so numerous that in a few days twenty thousand of them will join the invading army on horseback," the nobles specified as furnishing troops being the earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Worcester, Arundel, and Rutland, Lords Dacre, Montague, Wharton, and several others. "To facilitate the success of the enterprise," the duke of Guise continued, "your holiness is besought to renew the bull of Pius V. against the queen of England, to grant indulgences to all who engage in the expedition, and to appoint Dr. Allen as bishop of Durham to act as apostolic nuncio." The last sentence lifted the curtain hiding the prime movers of the "groat enterprise." Without Dr. William Allen and the seminarists of Rheims and Rome, neither King Philip, nor the pontiff, nor the head of the Catholic League, would have mustered pluck to invade the seagirt realm of heresy.

Fully aware of the danger threatening England by the doings of these fanatics, Elizabeth's ministers did everything in their power to counteract their efforts. On the demand of Burleigh, a number of severe laws against all who should enter into communication with the inmates of Anglo-Catholic seminaries on the Continent were passed during a short parliamentary session held at the commencement of 1581; and other statutes to the same effect, but conceived in a still more rigorous spirit, were promulgated by the next parliament, which met on the 23rd of November, 1584. It was enacted, among others, that all "Jesuits and popish priests" still in the kingdom should leave it within forty days; that those remaining beyond that time, or returning subsequently, should be deemed guilty of treason; that those who harboured them, or furnished them relief in any shape, should be guilty of felony; and, finally, that all subjects of the queen in course of being educated in Catholic schools on the Continent should return to England within six months, if called upon, and present themselves before a bishop or two justices of the peace, and refusing to do so, should be deemed guilty of treason. Besides these laws, designed to uproot the seminaries of Rheims and Rome with all their branch establishments, the parliament of 1584 passed another aimed directly at Mary Stuart. By the latter statute, government was empowered to name commissioners for the trial of any "pretender to the crown" who should attempt or imagine any invasion or insurrection, and should encourage the assassination of the queen. The latter deed was held to be so far within the range of probability that, in case of its taking place, a council of regency was appointed to govern the kingdom, to settle the succession, and to take vengeance for the act. In order to give immediate force to this law, a number of zealous reformers, headed by Sir Francis Walsingham, organized an English Protestant association as a grand opponent of the French Catholic League. The members of this association, the statutes of which were solemnly confirmed by parliament, engaged to defend the queen with their lives, to revenge her death or any injury committed against her, and to exclude from the throne all claimants, what title soever they might possess, by whose suggestion, or for whose behoof any violence should be offered to her majesty. Aware that the Protestant association was mainly directed against her and her friends, Mary Stuart, with wonderful self-confidence, demanded to be enrolled a member—an offer politely refused by Walsingham, who held clear proof in his hands that she was once more plotting, in concert with the Jesuits, the assassination of Elizabeth.

The fear of a violent death of the queen, which had taken possession of all minds, strongly manifesting itself in the rise of the association, as well as the new enactments of parliament, was not solely due to the continued machinations of popish emissaries, but aggravated by an event which filled the whole of Europe, as far as it had not succumbed under Jesuit morals, with profound horror. On the 10th of July, 1584, William of Orange, noblest and most valiant hero of Protestantism produced on the Continent since the reformation, had been foully murdered at Delft, in South Holland, by an assassin paid by the king of Spain and encouraged by the holy father. After several previous attempts of ridding himself of his great adversary by secret murder, which failed for want of proper tools, King Philip had found the right man at last in one Guion, or Gerhard, a native of France, who, after having been properly moulded by priests, with promises of riches in this world and the heavenly crown in the next, was sent into the Netherlands to execute the design. Representing himself as a zealous Protestant, he got access to the prince of Orange, who received him in the most kindly manner, and even allowed him to stay in his own house. This gained, the wretch posted himself among the servants in the dining-room, and on the prince rising from his meal, he approached, shot him through the body, and escaped in the wild confusion that ensued. The assassin was seized soon after and executed; but the wound he had inflicted was mortal, and the murderer's confession that the deed had been committed at the incitement of Jesuit priests, while it heightened the rage, could not lessen the deep grief with which the people of the Netherlands heard of the death of their great leader, looked upon by all as the father of the country. King Philip reaped nearly the whole of the benefits he expected from the murder. Bereft of their genial chief, the republicans had to retreat everywhere before the forces of Alexander Farnese, who successively occupied the entire southern provinces, from the River Maes to the mouth of the Scheldt. In less than three months after the assassination of William of Orange, Brussels, Ghent, Malines, and all the other cities of Flanders and Brabant, had opened their gates, Antwerp alone holding out by opening the sluices and calling the sea in for defence. It was clear that without foreign assistance, Protestantism would have to succumb in the Netherlands in blood; once more, therefore, the people despatched an embassy to England, imploring the queen in the name of all that was dear to them and to her, that she would throw her sword in the balance against the sword of Philip.

War against Spain had now ceased to be an aggression, and become a mere question of self-defence. Notwithstanding all the exertions of Burleigh and Walsingham, and the unsparing use of rack and gallows, England swarmed with Jesuits, let loose by King Philip and the pope; and many of those who were caught openly avowed that their immediate object was the assassination of the queen, which deed was to be the precursor of the invasion. Under these circumstances Elizabeth hesitated no longer, and in the spring of 1585 signed another treaty of alliance with the people of the Netherlands, stipulating to send an army of eight thousand men, under the command of the earl of Leicester, to their aid. Before the signature of the treaty, the queen took the bold step of chasing the ambassador of Philip, centre of all the intrigues against her, from the realm. On the 18th of January, Don Bernardino de Mendoza was summoned before the privy council to be informed of the decision of the queen. Walsingham, addressing him in Italian, told him "that her majesty was ill satisfied with his behaviour, he having kept up a secret correspondence with the deposed queen of Scots, with the object of delivering her from prison, of overthrowing the government, and of procuring a foreign invasion, and that, therefore, he was ordered to leave the country within fourteen days." Nothing abashed, Mendoza retorted by giving accusation for accusation, telling the members of the privy council "that they had kept up for years hostilities against the Catholic king his master, while professing to be at peace with him, and that he was glad to leave England, but could not do so before he had received the instructions of his government." At these words both Burleigh and Walsingham rose from their seats, informing the ambassador, in earnest tone, that he must leave the country without delay, or he would expose himself to punishment. Mendoza drew himself up to his full height, a sarcastic smile overspreading his dark features. "It does not belong," he exclaimed, darting a fierce glance at Burleigh, "either to the queen of England, or to any other person in the world, except the Catholic king my master, to judge of my conduct, and I defy any of you to proceed further, unless it be sword in hand. But though I laugh at your threat of punishment, I will depart with pleasure if you send me my passports. Since I have not been able to please Queen Elizabeth as a minister of peace, I will endeavour to give her satisfaction as a minister of war" — "Pues no le havia dada satisfaccion siendo ministro del paz, esforzana do aqui adelante para que la triviese de me en la guerra." With this burst the Spaniard swept out of the room, and eleven days after, on the 29th of January, quitted England. Henceforth Elizabeth had no enemy so fierce, next to her own subjects at Rheims and Rome, as Don Bernardino de Mendoza.

The army sent in aid of the Netherlands sailed in the autumn of 1585, and was landed safely at the mouth of the Rhine, taking possession of the fortified town of Brielle, sixteen miles west of Rotterdam. But its further course was ill-fated, as indeed was all but inevitable from the incapacity of the commander-in-chief. Whatever object Elizabeth had in view by appointing her favourite the leader of the expedition, whether it was secret dislike of the Dutch republicans, and Calvinists to boot, or mere infatuation for the handsome but brainless earl, the end was equally sad for the fame of English arms. Received at his arrival with the wildest enthusiasm, Leicester had not been three months in the country before the people found that he was but another Anjou. After gaining some slight advantage, in an action against the Spaniards, and relieving the little town of Grave, he gave himself the airs of a conquering hero, travelled up and down the country with a magnificent retinue, including the young earl of Essex, his son-in-law, Lords Audley and North, Sir William Russel, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Gervase Clifton, and numerous other English nobles, and on the strength of this brilliant suite and of his own valour, demanded to be invested with the supreme power of government in the United Provinces. Had he but showed a grain of genius, or only of good sense, the people would have been only too glad to appoint him regent, and so gain the invaluable goodwill of his royal mistress; but this being absolutely impossible in view of his total incapacity, it became the difficult task of the actual leaders of the revolution to curb his narrow vanity without giving offence, and to protect the troops under his command against the effects of his own ignorance. The task was mainly in the hands of the successor of William of Orange in the civil government of the country, John van Olden-Barneveldt, one of the shrewdest politicians of the age, and whose counsels had steered the course of the insurrection from the commencement. But though he managed the royal favourite with all the tenderness and skilfulness requisite under the circumstances, it was impossible to counteract entirely the effect of his combined pride and stupidity; and the English troops, so far from rendering any assistance to the insurgents, only hampered their movements. Their total want of success was only redeemed by the individual bravery of most of the men and nearly all the officers, foremost among the latter Sir Philip Sydney, model knight of the age. But even he, worth an army had he been in the right place, was sacrificed to Leicester's imbecility. Ordering an attack upon the vanguard of the prince of Parma in a dense fog, without knowledge of his own position or that of the enemy, Leicester caused the death of Sydney, who was mortally wounded at the head of a body of horse which he was commanding. The greatness of his soul was strikingly shown even in the hour of agony. Lying on the bare field, bleeding, and parched with thirst, a bottle of water was brought to Sydney by one of his friends, when at the moment of raising it to his lips, he perceived a common soldier near, likewise wounded, glancing with deadly eagerness upon the welcome drink. "That man's necessity is greater than mine," exclaimed the dying hero, resigning the water for which his feverish body was thirsting to his fellow-sufferer. Perhaps nobler words never ascended to heaven amidst the hideous carnage of the battle-field.

Elizabeth was little affected by the ill-success of her arms in the Netherlands, her own safety and the condition of the realm engrossing her whole attention. Walsingham had discovered through his host of spies that the long-intended blow was about to be struck, and that the assassination of the queen, to be followed by the invasion of the realm, had been firmly settled among the arch-conspirators abroad. After many vain attempts of the duke of Guise and the Jesuits to induce Philip to carry out the old scheme of attacking England from three sides, and after constant promises, never fulfilled, that he would land troops in Ireland, in Scotland, and on the coast of Norfolk, all the plans engendered at Paris, Rheims, and Rome finally reduced themselves to the certainty that the Catholic king would not move before Elizabeth was killed and an intestine war had broken out. Of the exceeding value of assassination Philip had received a new proof in the case of William of Orange, and feeling sure that the stab or pistol shot which should put the queen of England out of the way would save him a million in money, and, perhaps, a couple of armies, he distinctly intimated to the emissaries of the Catholic League, who were urging him towards what the pontiff had been pleased to call the "sacred expedition," that before filling a throne in accordance with the wishes of the holy father the throne must be vacant. This being fully understood, the English exiles who had plotted for years the overthrow of Protestantism in their own country could hesitate no longer. The difficulty of murdering the queen had become greater with every succeeding year; but the obstacles in their way served but to rouse their energy, and they determined, in order to accomplish the deed, to engage a number of assassins at the same time, so that if one should fail another might succeed. The first man who offered himself for the task was an English Catholic named John Savage, who had served for several years as officer in the prince of Parma's army in the Netherlands. Having been examined sufficiently to leave no doubt of his zeal, Savage was taken to Rheims, sworn to service by Dr. William Gifford, one of the sub-directors of the seminary, and then despatched into England, well provided with money and arms. It was arranged that he should shoot the queen when going to chapel at Whitehall, stationed in a gallery through which she was known to pass, and that the bullet failing, his poniard should finish the work. In the wake of Savage, and with the double object of watching him and seeking other assassins, followed John Ballard, a Jesuit who had travelled in England for many years under various disguises, and had now adopted military costume and the name of Captain Fortescue. Savage steadily made his way to Whitehall, and Ballard closely followed his steps; but in the track of both, unknown to either, crept two other men, secret agents of Elizabeth's minister of state. Burleigh had saved England from one great plot of murder and invasion, and it was the high ambition of Walsingham to rescue the kingdom from another not less terrible conspiracy.

It was a frightful battling of spies against traitors, of bloodhounds against assassins, of hangmen against Jesuits, that now ensued in the realm of Elizabeth. While the emissaries from Rheims were gliding about in the dark, murder in the breath of their nostrils, Walsingham's secret agents, villains most of them of the darkest dye, kept sneaking behind, ready at any moment to pounce upon them, and lead them to the rack and the gallows. Whether he could trust the wretches he employed, Elizabeth's minister had not the slightest means of knowing; however, he confided in the superiority of numbers, and pitching two spies against one Jesuit, and the power of gold against the strength of fanaticism, he hoped to succeed in the end. Sir Francis Walsingham had acquired a great knowledge of human nature, heavenly and beastly, in the course of his long travels, and soon found that he was not mistaken in his calculations. His agents proved to be far more sharp-witted than the priestly emissaries, and in a very short time unravelled a plot, which, in magnitude and chances of success, far exceeded that spun by Ridolfi fifteen years before. John Ballard arrived in London on the 22nd of May, 1586, and five days after put himself into communication with a young gentleman named Anthony Babington, possessed of considerable landed property at Detlück, in Derbyshire. Babington had got acquainted some years previously at Paris with the archbishop of Glasgow, and through his persuasion become an enthusiastic adherent of Mary Stuart, undertaking the dangerous task of carrying letters to and from the captive queen. But the idea of serving her otherwise than in an honourable manner had never entered his mind, and when Ballard informed him that it had been resolved to murder Elizabeth in order to put Mary on the throne he received the proposal with a show of indignation. However, to change the current of thought of the enthusiastic youth, and to demonstrate the absolute necessity of the assassination for the success of the "great cause," was not difficult to the keen Jesuit, trained to play upon human hearts and brains like a skilful performer on a musical instrument. Babington, won over by the specific arguments of the priest, consented to associate with Savage in the work of murder; and, to make success all but certain, proposed to admit five of his most intimate friends, all good Roman Catholics, into the conspiracy. This was readily assented to by the Jesuit, and Chidiock Tichbourne, a young gentleman of Hampshire; Patrick Barnwell, scion of a noble Irish family; John Charnock, a Lancashire squire; Edward Abington, son of a royal treasurer at Whitehall; and Charles Tilney, one of the queen's gentlemen-pensioners, swore a solemn oath on the crucifix, before Ballard, that they would kill Elizabeth or perish in the attempt. Many as had been the plots against the queen's life, never before had there been such a terrible band of the highest and most unselfish class of fanatics with their daggers directed against her breast.

Babington and his friends, made bold by their enthusiasm, held regular meetings at a lonely house at St. Giles-in-the-Fields, near London, to deliberate on the execution of their great scheme. To these meetings the conspirators admitted several of their friends, sworn to secrecy by dreadful oaths. But this did not prevent the introduction of Walsingham's agents. The spies had never left Ballard in all his journeys; they dogged every step of Savage; and they had wormed themselves, under profession of the most ardent attachment for Mary Stuart, into the confidence of Babington. One of these secret agents, named Gilbert Gifford, specially attached to Ballard, and who had come with him from Rheims, having played his part so well as to be admitted even into the seminary as a candidate for holy orders, soon gained the confidence of all the conspirators to a supreme degree, so that he was not merely allowed access to the meetings, but intrusted with the details of the great plan as settled by the chiefs. These were in substance that Savage, assisted by three others, should murder the queen, while Babington and his friends on the same day were to liberate Mary Stuart, to proclaim her sovereign, and to take her into Norfolk, in order to place her at the head of the army of invasion which was to be despatched from the Netherlands at the moment the report of Elizabeth's death had arrived. All the particulars of this arrangement having been approved of at the meetings held at St. Giles's, it became necessary to enter into correspondence with Mary Stuart, so as to gain her consent and co-operation in the important events which were to lift her from a prison to a throne. The correspondence, absolutely necessary as it was, at the same time was attended with the very greatest difficulty. Mary had been transported, on the 25th of August, 1584, from Sheffield to Wingfield Castle, and not being deemed safe enough here, the captive queen had been conveyed, on the 13th of January, 1585, back to her old prison at Tutbury, the gloomy gates of which had closed behind her exactly sixteen years before. Three months after her arrival at Tutbury, Mary Stuart received a new keeper in the person of Sir Amias Paulet, a rigid Calvinist, who kept watch over her in the strictest manner, not allowing her to go a step beyond the prison walls without his company and that of the guard, consisting of eighteen armed men chosen among his own retainers. Not believing her secure even at Tutbury, Paulet obtained permission to carry the queen to Chartley, in Staffordshire, where she arrived at the commencement of 1586. A report was spread soon after that the royal prisoner was preparing for flight, upon which Mary's keeper wrote to Burleigh to impress upon him the fact that she was more than safe in his custody. "The queen cannot escape," Sir Amias drily informed his friend and patron, the lord treasurer, "without great negligence on my part. But if I should be violently attacked, I will be so assured, by the grace of God, that she shall die before me." It was no easy task, under these circumstances, to Babington and his co-conspirators to enter into communication with Mary Stuart.

But great as were the obstacles, they were overcome by the fierce determination of the captive queen. The severe treatment under which she was suffering had embittered her spirit more and more, and the bitterness was increased by the course of events that was taking place in her own country, and which left of all her hopes none but the final one, of freeing herself from captivity by some desperate act. After having been thrown like a shuttlecock from the hands of his Calvinist tutors into those of papal agents, then back again to the grip of Presbyterian lords, and after that once more into the embraces of Jesuits, the boy-king of Scotland had finally fallen, apparently beyond rescue, into the hands of the Protestant party anxious for the union with England, and had placed himself directly under the orders of Elizabeth's ambassadors. Mary Stuart had come to understand by this time somewhat of the character of her son—like herself an accomplished hypocrite, though without either her fire of passion or her mental energy; and perceiving that, young as he was, he had turned his eyes already to the dazzling prospect of two crowns, and had sunk his filial duty entirely under the cravings of his vanity, she was beginning to look upon him with deep resentment approaching to hatred. To all the other causes impelling her to burst her bonds, there was added now one more in the desire for revenge against her own son. There was nothing more to hope from him, and the wrath of seeing him in close alliance with her greatest enemy was in itself enough to rouse her into the last energy of despair. For some time before Ballard and Babington had laid the foundation of their great conspiracy, Mary Stuart had been in correspondence on the same subject with Don Ber nardino de Mendoza, appointed Philip's envoy at Paris after his expulsion from London; and he having given her a hint of the meetings that were taking place at St. Giles-in-the-Fields, she was all anxiety to enter into communication with the men who exerted themselves in her behalf. Strictly as she was watched at Chartley, the captive queen had still the use of a large number of servants, as well as of two private secretaries, the one a native of Scotland called Curle, and the other a Frenchman of the name of Naou. By the aid of these assistants, on whom she could rely absolutely, Mary was able to receive and answer a great number of letters, which, however, all had to pass through the hands of Sir Amias Paulet, so that the main difficulty was to discover a mode of conveyance beyond the reach of his keen supervision. The means so anxiously sought, the royal prisoner at last found, with the help of her friends outside, in the casks in which a brewer of the neighbourhood supplied at regular intervals the ale for the consumption of her household. Paulet, while carefully examining every article that came in and passed out of the castle, did not think of the beer-barrels, and Mary easily converted them into letter-carriers by placing her papers in a wooden box, small enough to be passed through the bung-hole. Unfortunately for the captive queen, her very shrewdness and circumspection had no other effect but that of accelerating her ruin. Her letters passed in perfect safety the gates of Chartley Castle, unknown to Sir Amias Paulet; but once out were delivered into the hands of Gilbert Gifford, whom Babington had appointed his chief agent in the intercourse with Mary Stuart. The spy discharged his office by carrying every piece of paper he received first into Walsingham's secret cabinet, and forwarding it afterwards to the deluded victims who had put their trust in him. The astute minister had perfected his police system by employing two men expressly in opening and copying letters; one of them, Arthur Gregory, possessing extreme skill in undoing the seals of papers and closing them again, without leaving the slightest trace of their having been tampered with, and the second, called Philipps, an adept in deciphering correspondence. Thus a huge net was weaving around the conspirators at the very moment when they were preparing to apply the match which was to set all England in flames.

Mary Stuart's first letter to Babington, dated the 25th of June, was very cautious, she entreating herself to thank him for the great affection he was showing towards her, and begging him to continue in the same course. Being addressed as "my dear friend" in this note, the youth's head got all on fire, and he replied in a fervent strain of mixed loyalty and love, informing the queen, his "very dear sovereign," of all that he had been doing for her, in conjunction with Ballard and other trustworthy adherents. After telling her that he was engaged in a plan for her deliverance, "in conformity with the wishes manifested by his holiness the pope, the Catholic king, and the chief Christian princes," he proceeded to enumerate the details of the conspiracy for liberating her, invading England, and assassinating Elizabeth. "Myself in person," he wrote, evidently impressed with his own importance, "with ten gentlemen and a hundred others of our company and suite, will undertake the deliverance of your royal person from the hands of your enemies. As regards getting rid of the usurper, from subjection to whom we are absolved by the act of excommunication issued against her, there are six gentlemen of quality, all of them my intimate friends, who, for the love they bear to the Catholic cause and to your majesty's service, will undertake the tragic execution. It remains now that, according to their great desert and your majesty's goodness, their heroic enterprise should be honourably recompensed in themselves, if they escape with their lives, or in their posterity if they fall, which assurance I would gladly give them by your majesty's authority." Finally, Babington requested the captive queen, whom he pledged himself to serve unto death, to appoint persons to act as her lieutenants, and to raise the populace in Wales and in the northern and eastern counties. This terrible letter, written on the 6th of July, was placed on the evening of the same day in the hands of Gifford, with instructions to carry it immediately to Tutbury, and forward it to Mary Stuart by the usual channel, awaiting the reply. Gifford proceeded straightway to Walsingham, and before midnight was past, Babington's note had been deciphered in the secret cabinet. Walsingham felt that the crisis was now approaching, and ordering Gregory and Philipps to accompany Gifford to the neighbourhood of Chartley, so as to open and copy all letters without a moment's loss of time, he impatiently awaited the reply of Mary Stuart to the proposals made to her by the leader of the conspiracy.

The imprisoned queen had not the faintest idea of the snares surrounding her on all sides when opening Babington's letter. To watch her more closely, Philipps had installed himself in the castle, to the infinite disgust of Mary, who suspected him to be a spy, and did not fail to advertise her friends of his arrival. Walsingham's decipherer had the pleasure of seeing his own portrait in the first letter put into his hands. "The man," she described Philipps, "is of low stature, slender every way, dark, yellow-haired on the head and clear yellow-bearded, pitted in the face with the small-pox, short-sighted, and, as it seems, about thirty years of age." Notwithstanding the presence of this forbidding personage, Mary Stuart confided to her former channel of communication, only taking the precaution of composing the reply to Babington's letter at intervals, in the middle of the night. She received it on the 12th of July, and on the 17th had the answer ready, and put it into the beer-barrel—vulgar beer-barrel, big for the nonce with the fate of a queen. If the youth chosen to head a conspiracy of boundless import had been imprudent, Mary Stuart was a thousand times more so. In her reply to Babington she did not hesitate to approve fully the details of the great plot, going so far as to give advice regarding the better accomplishment of the scheme of assassination. Her anxiety was to have Elizabeth killed before her friends should make the attempt to liberate her from prison, fearing that otherwise she herself would perish under the sword of her guards. She counselled to watch the movements of the queen very closely, and "all affairs being prepared, then shall it be time to set the six gentlemen to work." The "six gentlemen," or, in other words, the six assassins, were recommended to act as reporters of the deed as soon as perpetrated, so that there could be no error in the matter. "There can be no certain day appointed," Mary continued, "of the accomplishing of the said gentlemen's designment; and to the end that others may be in readiness to take me from hence, I would that the said gentlemen had always about them, or, at the least, at court, four stout men furnished with good and speedy horses, ordered, so soon as the said design shall be executed, to come with all diligence, to advertise thereof those that shall be appointed for my transporting." Touching her own deliverance, the royal prisoner had no less than three plans ready. "The first," she informed Babington, "is that in my walking abroad on horseback on the moors, betwixt this and Stafford, where ordinarily very few people do pass, a fifty or threescore horsemen, well armed, come to take me, as they may easily, my keeper having with him but eighteen horsemen. The second mean is to come at midnight, or soon after, to set fire to the barns and stables, which are near to the house, and whilst that my guardian's servants rush forth to the fire, your company, having every one a mark whereby they may know one another in the night, may surprise the house, where I hope, with the servants I have about me, to be able to give you correspondence. And the third mean is that some bring carts hither, they ordinarily coming early in the mornings, which carts may be so prepared that, having got to the midst of the great gate, they may fall down or overwhelm, whereupon you may come suddenly with your followers to make yourself master of the house and carry me away." It was truly a marvel, and not arguing much for the zeal of her friends that a queen so fertile in resources should have remained in prison for eighteen years.

The fatal letter to Babington was not despatched alone, but the same cask which held it contained ciphered messages for the queen's agents at Paris and Madrid, and for Philip's envoy at Paris, all urging the hastening of the preparations for the invasion of England. Having taken copies of these important documents, Walsingham ordered Gifford to carry them to France and deliver them personally, taking care to bring back the replies. Both the archbishop of Glasgow and Mendoza received the spy, known to them from his connection with the Rheims seminary, in the most cordial manner, his youth, engaging manners, and apparent zeal for religion, disarming all suspicion as to the part he was playing. Philip's envoy, in particular, was so much pleased with the bearer of Mary's letters, that he praised to the king the extreme capacity of the agent the conspirators had chosen, informing his master at the same time that, in order to encourage Babington and his friends, he had sent to them, by two different ways, two letters, one in Italian and the other in Latin, "stimulating them to an enterprise worthy both of their orthodox faith and of the ancient valour of the English, and assuring them that if they succeeded in killing the queen they should immediately be assisted by his Catholic majesty with an army from the Netherlands." "I made this promise," Mendoza continued, "as they requested the assurance, upon my faith and word of honour, and I urged them at the same time to hasten the execution of their enterprise." King Philip's reply was not long in coming, a service of couriers, with the swiftest horses at their disposition, having been established between Paris and Madrid, for the special purpose of transmitting the correspondence relating to the invasion of England. The king entirely approved of the steps already taken by his envoy, adding that, things having proceeded thus far, not a moment should be lost to carry out his share in the undertaking. "I have ordered," Philip informed Mendoza, instructing him to communicate the facts to the conspirators, "that two bodies of troops shall be prepared to set sail for England, the first from Spain and the second from Flanders. As our success depends mainly upon our secrecy and diligence, the troops will be got ready with little noise, and will not be so considerable as to prevent them from promptly leaving Spain and Flanders, as soon as we hear that the principal execution which Babington and his friends have undertaken has been accomplished in England." To this letter Philip joined two despatches, written in triplicate on account of their importance, directed to the prince of Parma, governor of the Netherlands. By the first of these despatches, which Mendoza was instructed to send directly to its destination, the prince was commanded to make preparations for the attack upon England, and by the second he was ordered to start. This second despatch the king desired should be sent to Farnese by three couriers immediately after receipt of the news that Elizabeth had fallen under the stroke of the assassins. "In this case," Philip wrote, "send it at once and in haste to the prince, that he may set sail with his troops without awaiting any fresh orders from me." Gilbert Gifford copied the despatches and hurried back to England.

Walsingham's net was full, and the time had come to draw it up. Gifford arrived in London late on the 2nd of August, and had a long conference with the minister; and early on the morning of the 3rd orders were issued to seize all the persons known to be connected with Babington, Ballard, and the other conspirators. A number of them were taken at once; but before the arrest of all could be effected, Ballard, who moved about in constant disguises, changing his dress and his dwelling every day, got the alarm, and communicated it to Babington, Savage, and several of their friends. They held a consultation late at night to consult about their safety. "What is to be done?" asked Ballard. "Nothing," replied Savage, "but to kill the queen immediately." "Very well," cried Babington, "then go to court to-morrow and strike the blow." Savage objected on the ground that his court-dress, in which alone he could hope to penetrate to the queen, was not ready, upon which Babington gave him his ring and all the money and valuables he had with him, to purchase what he wanted. However, the effort to get a court-dress was very vain, for the spies which followed in the steps of the conspirators had seized both Savage and Ballard before many hours were over. Babington and a few of his distracted companions hid themselves for some days longer in St. John's Wood, but they were soon hunted up, and carried to the Tower. Of all the individuals engaged in the plot there remained now only one untouched, the greatest of all. Mary Stuart continued writing ciphered letters, urging on the murder of the queen and invasion of the realm, till the morning of the 8th of August, when Sir Amias Paulet, looking unusually friendly, proposed to her to join in a hunting party, in the neighbouring park of Tixall. She gladly accepted, and was riding on joyously, swelled with hopes of her speedy triumph, when suddenly Sir Thomas Georges, a royal officer, presented himself before her with a body of soldiers, informing her that the Babington conspiracy had been discovered, and that orders had been issued for her removal to Tixall Castle. The queen got deadly pale, and her lips seemed to tremble; but recovering herself quickly, anger took the place of despair, and she called upon her servants to resist her being carried off to another prison. Sir Thomas Georges could but smile at the useless threat, and ordering Curle and Naou, the two secretaries, who were riding in the suite of their mistress, to be arrested and taken to London, he gave instructions to separate Mary Stuart from all her attendants, and to place her under strict confinement at Tixall Castle, allowing no communication whatever with the outer world. While the unhappy queen was carried off to her new prison, Sir Amias Paulet went back to Chartley to open her desks and those of her secretaries, and seize all the papers contained therein. With extreme imprudence, the queen had not only not destroyed many of the most dangerous letters she had received, but even in many instances kept copies of the replies she had returned, thus proving her participation in the great conspiracy in the most complete manner. As often before in the course of her stormy life, Mary Stuart forged weapons against herself more formidable than any that could have come from the hand of her enemies.

The discovery and annihilation of the terrible plot directed against the civil and religious liberty of the realm caused the most boundless joy in all the towns of the kingdom, particularly in London. Bonfires were lighted in every street, and the bells kept ringing night and day, while shouts of enthusiasm rent the air wherever Elizabeth showed herself, touching her unto tears. Intimately-mixed with the exultation of the masses was a general cry for revenge, and for several weeks persons suspected of sympathy with the conspirators could not leave their houses without danger of being torn to pieces. To allay the public excitement, Walsingham ordered that Babington, Ballard, Savage, and their accomplices should be put at once upon their trial for high treason. The evidence against them was so overwhelming that not one attempted a denial of the charges, but all pleaded guilty; nevertheless, to satisfy the craving for revenge of the ferocious multitude, they had to undergo the most frightful tortures before suffering the punishment decreed by law. At last, on the 20th of September, after their bodies had been torn to pieces on the rack, seven of the chief conspirators, Babington, Savage, Ballard, Barnwell, Tilney, Abington, and Tichbourne, were taken to St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and drawn and quartered in the presence of an immense crowd, their shrieks under the infliction of the hellish cruelties they were made to undergo touching even the stony hearts of the mob, and causing a mitigation of punishment to simple death for the remaining criminals. Of all of them, the youth Tichbourne met with the greatest sympathy, it having become known that the sole reason of his participation in the plot had been his affection for Babington, the depth of which he described at the trial with touching simplicity. "I had a friend," the youth exclaimed, "and a dear friend, of whom I made no small account, whose friendship has brought me to this. He told me the whole matter, I cannot deny, as they had laid it down to be done; but I always thought it impious, and denied to be a dealer in it. Yet the love of my friend caused me to be a man in whom the old proverb was verified: I was silent, and so consented. Before this thing chanced, we lived together in the most happy manner. We wanted nothing that we could wish for; and, God knows, nothing was less in my head than matters of state. Now give me leave to declare the miseries I sustained after I was acquainted with the action, wherein I may justly company my estate to that of Adam, who could not abstain one thing forbidden to enjoy all other things the world could afford. The terror of conscience awaited me. After I considered the dangers whereinto I was fallen, I went away, and appointed my horses should meet me in London, intending to go into the country. I came to London, and then heard that all was discovered, whereupon, like Adam, we fled into the woods to hide ourselves." It would have well become Queen Elizabeth to pardon this simple, misguided youth, or at least to save him from those hellish tortures inflicted alike upon Jesuits and their victims.

After the despatch of the conspirators in London, the great question, engrossing the public mind as well as the deliberations of the privy council, was the course of proceedings to be adopted against Mary Stuart. The cry that she should be put upon her trial, and, if found guilty, should suffer the punishment awarded to traitors, was general; but Elizabeth still made mien to shelter her under various pretexts. It was not so much sympathy with Mary which induced the queen to extend her protection, but the terror of falling a prey to some desperate fanatic at the moment she was tried for her life, which apprehension was increased by the fierce threats uttered by the English Catholics abroad, duly reported through Walsingham's agents. However, the absolute necessity of getting to the one great centre of all the plots and conspiracies which had endangered and continued to threaten the realm, made itself too powerfully felt to be neutralized by vague fears and anxieties; and both Burleigh and Walsingham told the queen that the trial of Mary Stuart could not be prevented without placing in jeopardy, not only her throne, but the religion, liberty, and independence of the nation. Thus pressed, Elizabeth at last gave her consent to indict her royal sister before a special tribunal, formed in accordance with the parliamentary statute enacted two years before, in view of the very events that had happened. But before putting her upon trial, Mary's two secretaries, who had been kept in separate confinement since their separation from her, were interrogated, and the depositions of both went to make her guilt, if possible, still more clear. Curle as well as Naou confessed to the participation of their mistress in the conspiracy for the murder of the queen and the invasion of the kingdom, both furnishing at the same time precious information as to the method employed by Mary Stuart in carrying on her secret correspondence. Shut up in her closet, mostly in the dead of night, the captive princess had been in the habit of dictating the principal points of her despatches in French to Naou, who, after having reduced them to the proper shape, submitted the papers to her for correction. This accomplished, the letters were given to Curle, the Scotch secretary, who translated them into cipher, ready to be sent off. It was in this way large stores of the most dangerous documents had accumulated in the closet of Mary, all of which fell into the hands of Walsingham on her forcible removal from Chartley, skilfully planned for this object. When, having been shut up for seventeen days in a small room at Tixall Castle, the prisoner was taken back to her old residence, and found all her papers gone, the dread of the fate awaiting her came upon her with crushing force. For a moment, but a moment only, she affected anger and indignation at seeing her property ransacked. "There are two things," she exclaimed, "which the queen of England can never take from me, the royal blood which gives me a right to the succession, and the attachment which makes my heart beat for the religion of my fathers." After this piece of declamation, nature asserted its rights: Mary Stuart sank to the ground, burying her face in her hands.

The commissioners who were to form the special tribunal for the examination and trial of Mary, in accordance with the act passed in the session of 1584, were appointed in the latter part of September. They were forty-six in number, comprising the chief state officers, many of the leading peers, the principal councillors of the crown, and the most eminent judges and lawyers in the kingdom. The list, made up with evident impartiality, included the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, Lord Burleigh, the marquis of Winchester, the earls of Oxford, Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Warwick, Pembroke, Leicester, and Lincoln, Viscount Montague, Lords Howard, Hunsdon, Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Cobham, Stafford, Grey of Wilton, Lumley, Sturton, Sands, Wentworth, Mordaunt, St. John of Blotso, Buckhurst, Compton, and Cheiney, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir James Croft, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Francis Knollys, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Amias Paulet, and Sir Walter Mildmay, Secretaries Davison and Wolley, and Judges Wray, Anderson, Gawdy, Manwood, and Periam. Many of these members of the commission were known to be favourably inclined to the illustrious prisoner over whom they were to sit in judgment, and a few among the peers were held to be her partisans to the extent that King Philip had included them in his list of enemies of Elizabeth. The president of the commission, called the high court of justice, was the lord chancellor, Sir Thomas Bromley, the most learned lawyer in England, and he drew up the indictment on the 5th of October, 1586. On the following day Mary Stuart was conducted by Sir Amias Paulet to Fotheringay Castle, Northamptonshire, a large feudal pile, birthplace of Richard III., which had been chosen to serve for the trial on account of its ample accommodation. Mary made no resistance to being taken to Fotheringay; but when, on arriving here, a letter of the queen was placed in her hand, enjoining her, in somewhat imperious terms, to answer the charges which would be preferred against her before the high court of justice, she broke out into violent anger. "What!" she cried, addressing Paulet, "does not your mistress know that I am a queen born? Does she think that I will degrade my rank, my condition, the race from which I spring, the son who is to succeed me, the foreign kings and princes whose rights would be injured in my person, by obeying such a letter as that?—Never! Humbled as I may seem, my heart is too great to submit to any such humiliation." It would have been wise on the part of the captive queen to adhere to this resolution, and steadfastly to refuse the jurisdiction of the court, on the good old plea of "rank and race." But her determination did not last a week, being entirely upset by the plausible arguments of Sir Christopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain of Elizabeth, who had been specially deputed to persuade the royal prisoner to appear before the commission, so as to destroy herself the most formidable obstacle in the way of her trial. "You are accused," Sir Christopher argued, his graceful bearing and his handsome face and figure heightening his eloquence, and leaving a deep impression upon the susceptible heart of Mary Stuart; "you are accused, but not condemned, and it depends but upon you to deny the charges. You are, it is true, a queen, but the royal dignity does not exempt its possessor from replying to the imputation of a crime such as neither the civil nor the canon law, nor the law of nations, nor the law of nature, could save from prosecution. If you are innocent, the queen's commissioners, who are just and prudent men, will rejoice with all their hearts at your proving your innocence. The queen herself will be no less pleased, I assure you. When I left her, she declared to me that nothing ever gave her greater pain than to see you accused of such a crime. Dispense, then, with that vain privilege of royal dignity which cannot now avail you. Appear in court, and maintain your innocence; and do not lay yourself open to suspicion by avoiding the trial, or risk sullyng your reputation with an everlasting stain." Mary listened to the voice of the charming vice-chamberlain, and allowing her reason once more to succumb under her imagination, consented to plead before the high court of justice.

On the morning of the 14th of October the queen of Scots descended from her apartments, in the upper floor of the castle, into the great hall of Fotheringay, escorted by a detachment of halberdiers, and leaning on the arm of Bourgois, her French physician. The hall had been arranged in the form of a court of justice. At the upper end, under a dais surmounted by the arms of England, stood a chair of state, reserved for Queen Elizabeth, to the right of which were circular benches filled by the lord chancellor, the lord high treasurer, the members of the privy council, and fourteen earls, while on the left were similar benches for the other members of the court. In the centre were seated, around a table, the crown lawyers, with several clerks to take the minutes of the proceedings, and opposite them a velvet chair was placed for Mary Stuart. On making her appearance before this imposing assembly, she saluted the lords with great dignity, which gave way, however, on seeing that her chair had not been placed under a dais like that on the other side. "I am a queen," she cried, with some petulance; "I was married to a king of France, and my chair should be there," pointing to the vacant seat of Elizabeth. The judges took no notice of the exclamation, and when Mary had taken her seat, after a little hesitation, the lord chancellor arose to address the court. In a short oration, replete with arguments, he stated the reasons which had induced the queen of England to bring the prisoner at the bar to trial, declaring his own conviction that, had she neglected to do so, she would have deserved to be accused of slighting the cause of God, and of bearing the sword of justice in vain. The clerk of the crown then read out the royal commission constituting the court, reciting that since the first day of June, in the twenty-seventh year of the queen's reign, "divers matters have been compassed and imagined tending to the hurt of our royal person, as well by Mary, daughter and heir of James the Fifth, king of Scots, and commonly called queen of Scots and dowager of France, pretending title to the realm of England, as by divers other persons, with the privity of the said Mary." The reading of the commission having come to an end, the crown serjeant rose to state the charges brought against Mary Stuart, but she interrupted him suddenly, coming forward to address the court. In a speech of great animation she informed the members of the court that she did not recognize the commission by virtue of which they pretended to try her; that, as a free princess and an anointed queen, she was answerable to nobody but God, and that she would reply to them only under reserve of this protest. These were words of empty sound, the futility of which Mary herself ought to have known, the fact that she had come before the court to be tried being an acknowledgment of jurisdiction far more important than the feeble protest she uttered against it. Burleigh, who rose after her, told her as much, adding that all persons within the realm were subject to the laws of the realm. It was like a faint echo of the far-sounding Declaration of Rights, uttered, five years before, by the people of the Netherlands. The great truth, come into the world with Protestantism, that "subjects are not made by God to serve a prince, but that princes are made to serve their subjects," had grown so far as to be acknowledged by a lord high treasurer, in the trial of a purple-born queen.

The first day of Mary Stuart's trial was taken up with the delivery of the act of accusation by the crown serjeant, acting as public prosecutor. After giving a full account of the conspiracy of Babington and Ballard, he maintained that Mary had actively participated in the plan for invading the kingdom, as well as in that for the assassination of Elizabeth, having not only known and approved, but greatly encouraged these schemes, with a view of raising herself to the throne. In proof, copies of her letters were brought forward, together with numerous others written by Don Bernardino de Mendoza, the archbishop of Glasgow, Dr. Allen of Rheims, Babington, and the English conspirators. The written confessions of Mary's two secretaries, Curle and Naon, and those made by Babington, Ballard, Tichbourne, and Savage were likewise adduced, the whole forming a mass of evidence all but irresistible in its conclusion. However, Mary did not shrink from the attempt of overturning the whole fabric of accusation against her. She boldly denied having either sent or received the letters produced by the crown serjeant, and disposing of them as vile forgeries, called upon the court to admit of no other documentary evidence but her own handwriting. This was a sufficiently safe mode of defence, for having dictated all her dangerous correspondence to her secretaries, and never written a line herself, it was not easy to bring forward any proofs in this respect. There then remained the confessions of Babington and his co-conspirators, which Mary declared to be likewise inventions, either of her enemies, or extorted by the rack; and, finally, the depositions of her own secretaries, which, she could not help feeling, formed the most dangerous part of the evidence against her. The confessions of both Curle and Naon, Mary Stuart was fully aware, had not been extorted by torture, but been freely given, and to get rid of their testimony she adopted a new line of defence. Curle, she said, was an honest man, yet rather simple-minded, and easily led by others, while Naon, on the other hand, was a man of great cleverness and vast natural gifts. From the depositions made by both, Mary argued, she must conclude that Naon had become a traitor to her, and had led away Curle, who had always been under his control. Her two secretaries, she admitted, had written all her letters, and put them in cipher; but she had seldom verified the documents actually sent away, and they had every opportunity of inserting things which she had never dreamt of dictating to them. She declared it very possible, also, that they might have received letters for her without delivering them, and that they might have sent away others in her name, and with her ciphers, without showing them to her. Getting excited in her demonstration, so as almost to believe in her own arguments—"And am I," she cried, "am I, a queen, to be judged guilty on such proofs as these? Is it not manifest that there must be an end to the majesty and security of princes if they are made to depend on the writings and the testimony of their secretaries? I claim the privilege of being judged from my own words and my own writings, and I am certain that no proof of guilt will be found against me." There was something akin to the puerile in this plea, not at all becoming the dignity of the captive queen.

Still more than in charging her secretaries with treachery, and in asking for evidence which she admitted did not exist, Mary Stuart forgot herself when, towards the end of the first day's trial, she turned upon Sir Francis Walsingham with the accusation of keeping spies in his service. Her attack, in which she insinuated even that the secretary had intended to murder her secretly, was so sudden, and so fierce and personal, that Sir Francis sprang to his feet. "I call God to witness," he exclaimed, "that I have done nothing, as an individual, not befitting an honest man; nor anything, as the servant of my royal mistress, unworthy of my office. I have employed extraordinary means to get at the knowledge of this fearful plot, because of the extraordinary dangers that were threatening the queen and the kingdom. I have traced with the greatest care all the schemes directed against her majesty and against the realm, and I freely confess that even if that traitor Ballard had offered me his aid to discover them, I would not have repulsed them." The words, spoken from the heart, made a great impression upon all the members of the court; and Mary Stuart herself seemed to wince under the defeat which she had suffered in assailing a statesman whose matchless probity even his enemies did not doubt. Soon after Walsingham's speech the sitting was adjourned till the following day, when Mary came into the court as before, leaning on the arm of her physician. Her pale face betokened a sleepless night, and it became evident before long that she had discovered the weakness of her previous defence, and resolved upon a new mode of tactics. Ceasing the useless course of denying everything, and of seeking to clear herself by blackening others, she began to admit part of the evidence against her, trying to construe its purport in a different manner from that of the act of accusation. She confessed to having sent various letters, produced the day before, to Mendoza and the archbishop of Glasgow, and even acknowledged that her secretaries, acting under her orders, had sent several communications to Babington, but she insisted that the whole of these letters were written with no other object than that of gaining her freedom by innocent means, and that any other construction put upon them was false. Unfortunately for herself, Mary, following this course of argument, soon lost herself in a network of contradictions. Thrown off her guard by the skilful questions of the crown lawyers, she gradually came to admit her knowledge of the prepared invasion of the kingdom and overthrow of the government, denying, however, that she had encouraged either, and, still more, that she had been cognizant of the plot for the assassination of Elizabeth. "I have been anxious," she exclaimed, "that the safety of the Catholics should be provided for, but I never wished that it should be obtained by means of bloodshed and murder. I have preferred the part of Esther to that of Judith, seeking rather to intercede with God for the people than to deprive even the meanest of them of life." This sort of declamation, as it meant nothing was worth nothing, least of all as coming from the lips of the murderess of Kirk-o'-Field. Pressed harder and harder by the crown serjeant, by Burleigh, and other members of the commission, Mary Stuart at last acknowledged further letters produced in court as her own, in which she minutely expounded plans for King Philip "to set on the queen of England," promising to aid in the invasion by stirring up the Catholic lords of Scotland; and by delivering her son into the hands of either the king or the pope. These important and dangerous admissions made, she again sought shelter behind her supposed inviolability as a queen. "With what injustice," she cried, "am I treated. My letters have been picked out and perverted from their original meaning, and no consideration is shown for the religion I profess, and the sacred character I bear as a queen. If my sentiments, my lords, are personally indifferent to you, at least you might consider the majesty of royalty which is injured in my person, and think of the example you are setting." Here, indeed, was the firm ground for Mary Stuart to stand upon. If, as she and her Catholic friends pretended, royalty was sacred and irresponsible, then neither this nor any other tribunal could judge and condemn her; if, on the other hand, as laid down by the Protestants, and distinctly maintained by Burleigh, princes no less than subjects were responsible to the laws of God as well as of the realm in which they live, then all her arguments were vain and futile. Of her guilt in the participation of Babington's plot there could be no reasonable doubt. The commissioners felt all this, and at the end of the second day's proceedings, they adjourned their sittings for ten days, intending to meet no more at Fotheringay Castle, but reassemble at Westminster.

The high court of justice reopened on the 25th of October in the Star Chamber at Westminster, with the chief object in view of hearing the two secretaries of Mary Stuart, and subjecting them to a personal examination. All the members of the commission favourable to the royal prisoner felt that it was the evidence of these secretaries on which her life depended, the rest of the documentary proofs being, to some extent, liable to misconstruction, or, at all events, not sufficiently conclusive to allow them to arrive at a unanimous verdict. Curle and Naon were brought before the court accordingly, and strictly examined, questioned, and cross-questioned; but neither their words nor their behaviour tended in the least degree to shake the depositions which they had previously made. They declared, too, that their testimony had been freely and voluntarily given, without threat of punishment or hope of reward, but for the sake of truth alone. Having affirmed again on oath the authenticity of the correspondence of their mistress with Babington, and thus placed her complicity in the great plot beyond question, the commissioners had but one duty more to perform. On the same day on which the secretaries had been examined, the members of the high court unanimously pronounced Mary Stuart guilty of high treason. The sentence, signed by all the commissioners, bore that "the Babington conspiracy was with the privy of Mary, daughter and heir of James the Fifth, king of Scots, pretending title to the crown of England," and that "she hath compassed and imagined within this realm divers matters tending to the hurt, death, and destruction of our sovereign lady the queen." Added to the judgment was an important declaration concerning the succession to the English crown, signed likewise by all the members of the court, stating that "the sentence does nowise derogate from the title and honour of James king of Scotland, who remains in the same place, degree, and right as if the sentence had never been pronounced." By order of Burleigh, an official proclamation of the verdict of the high court of justice was issued and published in London and throughout the kingdom, giving rise to the most unbounded expressions of joy. According to the report of Pomponne de Bellièvre, French ambassador extraordinary at Elizabeth's court, "the earl of Pembroke, the mayor and aldermen of London, and other persons of quality assisted at the proclamation of death against the queen of Scots, and at the same instant all the bells of the city began to ring. This was followed universally throughout the realm of England, and the people continued these ringings for the space of twenty-four hours, and also made many bonfires of rejoicings." Monsieur de Bellièvre, who had looked, some years before, with great equanimity of mind upon the slaughter of a hundred thousand Huguenots, professed to be greatly shocked at these expressions of joy, which he ascribed to the low civilization of the heretics among whom it was his misfortune to dwell.

To obtain the co-operation of parliament in his efforts to restore peace to the realm, Burleigh had summoned it while the trial of Mary Stuart was pending, and four days after the passing of the sentence against her the session opened at Westminster Hall. The first work of both the lords and commons was to approve the sentence of condemnation, and to urge upon the queen the necessity of carrying it into execution without loss of time. But Elizabeth showed the greatest hesitation to take this extreme step. She feared as much as ever that the dagger of some desperate fanatic would be upon her breast as soon as she had signed the warrant of execution, and she likewise was haunted by the dim consciousness that she was doing wrong, as a queen, in sending a queen to the block. She felt as deeply as Mary Stuart herself the "sacred character" of princes, and the necessity proclaimed before the commission at Fotheringhay of upholding the "majesty of royalty," and her instinctive hatred of Calvinism was due not a little to the teaching of those daring revolutionists that sovereigns should have no impunity for crime, but that all human creatures should be equal before the law. Nevertheless, with all these time-honoured notions of the right of princes to do wrong, Elizabeth had too much common sense not to be aware that the feeling of the age, as far as her own subjects were concerned, was running against her, and that the immense majority of the people of England were calling for the death of the captive queen from the profound conviction that the "majesty of royalty" ought to succumb under the majesty of the law. It was under the pressure of these conflicting thoughts and feelings that the queen received, on the 10th of November, a parliamentary deputation, come to press Mary Stuart's execution, "because," the members informed her, "upon advised and great consultation, we cannot find that there is any possible means to provide for your majesty's safety but by the just and speedy execution of the said queen." Elizabeth's reply was noble and touching, though somewhat affected. "If my own life alone depended hereupon," she cried, "and not the safety and welfare of all my people, I would, I protest unfeignedly, willingly and readily pardon her. Nay, if England might by my death obtain a more flourishing condition and a better prince, I would most gladly lay down my life. Yet for your sakes it is, and for my people's, that I desire to live." The queen then requested the deputation to subject the matter once more to discussion, with a view of discovering some method for making Mary Stuart harmless without putting her to death. Both houses deliberated for a full week, after which they presented another address. In it two different plans for debarring the prisoner of Fotheringhay from further machinations, without carrying out the sentence, were mentioned as having received the attention of parliament. The first was to place her under strictest confinement, and to exact from her on oath the promise of not stirring up sedition; and the second to let her depart out of the realm, on the condition of a like promise, both on oath and in writing. Neither of these measures, the address stated, would guard the kingdom against revolt and invasion of the papists, whose hopes were centered in Mary; "and therefore," it continued, "unless the just sentence pronounced against her be executed, your majesty's person will remain in great danger, religion cannot be long preserved among us, and the flourishing condition of these realms is threatened with early and disastrous ruin." "In sparing her," parliament finally argued, "your majesty not only encourages the audacity of the enemies of God, the foes of your own authority, and of your kingdom, but your majesty dispirits and discourages the hearts of your affectionate people, and provokes the hand as well as the wrath of God."

Elizabeth's reply was strongly characteristic of her own indecision, and not a little oracular. "If I should say unto you," she told the deputation from the lords and commons, "that I mean not to grant your petition, by my faith, I should say unto you more than perhaps I mean. And if I should say unto you I mean to grant your petition, I should then tell you more than is fit for you to know. And thus I must deliver you an answer unwelcome." Unsatisfactory as was the response, parliament had to be content with it, making allowance for the exceedingly difficult position of the queen. While her own subjects clamoured for Mary Stuart's death, foreign monarchs hurried ambassadors to England entreating her to stay the execution, not without hints of other consequences that might ensue if it should take place. The two sovereigns most anxious, to all appearance, to save the life of the prisoner of Fotheringhay, were the young king of Scotland and Henri III. of France. It was but natural that James VI. should interfere in favour of his mother, and Elizabeth herself approved of it, although her manner showed that she had her suspicions of his filial affections being very hollow. The arguments of James, whose pedantry and hypocrisy, young as he was, had become already conspicuous to his subjects, were chiefly of a theological and philosophical nature. "What thing, madame," the learned youth wrote to Elizabeth, "can greater touch me in honour, that both is a king and a son, than that both my nearest neighbour, being in straightest friendship with me, shall rigorously put to death a free sovereign prince, and my natural mother, alike in estate and sex to her who so uses her, albeit subject, I grant, to a harder fortune, and touching her nearly in proximity of blood. What law of God can permit that justice shall strike upon them whom he hath appointed supreme dispensators of the same under him; whom he hath called gods, and therefore subjected to the censure of none on earth; whose anointing by God cannot be defiled by man, unrevened by the Author thereof; who, being supreme and immediate lieutenants of God in heaven, cannot therefore be judged by their equals on earth. . . . In case, madame," the youthful theologian concluded his epistle, "you want to know further of my mind in this matter, my ambassadors have been fully acquainted therewith." The envoys referred to by the son of Mary Stuart were Sir Robert Melville and the laird of Gray. Delivering his message, the latter whispered to Elizabeth: "Mortua non mordet,"—the dead do not bite.

Far more serious than the embassy of James VI. of Scotland was that of Henri III. of France. Though as careless about the fate of Mary Stuart as of anything else under the sun not affecting his personal amusements, Henri III. was too entirely under the influence of the Catholic League, the real ruler of France, to be dispensed from exerting himself in favour of the imprisoned queen, and as soon as she had been placed upon trial, he despatched Pomponne de Bellièvre, one of his mother's favourites, on a special embassy to Elizabeth. The envoy, after suffering dreadfully from sickness in the voyage from Calais to Dover, arrived in London just before the publication of the sentence against Mary Stuart, and immediately applied for an audience, but was left to wait several days, the queen observing sarcastically that his utter prostration from the effects of the sea required a somewhat longer rest. Admitted at last to the royal presence, Bellièvre delivered the letter of his master, together with an oration of immense length, going deep into history, down to Adam and Eve, and proving conclusively, to his own absolute satisfaction, that princes could do no wrong, and that therefore Mary Stuart could not be guilty. Elizabeth listened patiently, and answered pleasantly; but some not altogether agreeable remarks about Catherine de Medici escaping her lips, she did not get rid at once of Pomponne de Bellièvre. The ambassador extraordinary reporting to his court all that happened, with a few malicious additions, not long after applied for another audience, and on the 6th of January presented himself once again at Greenwich Palace, where the queen was spending the Christmas holidays. Bellièvre's speech this time was very brief, and with a strong threat at the end. "The grand rule for governing well and happily," said the friend of Catherine de Medici, "is to avoid the shedding of blood: one execution leads to another, and they are followed by a never-ending train of evil consequences." After this moral exhortation, singularly becoming in the envoy of a sovereign who had originated the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Bellièvre brought forward his menace. "If it be your majesty's good pleasure," he exclaimed, "to set at nought such high considerations, and to disregard the prayers of the king my master, then he has charged me to tell you, madam, that he shall resent your proceeding as a thing adverse to the common interest of kings, and most especially offensive to him." It was enough to rouse the queen into violent anger. "God's death, Monsieur de Bellièvre," she cried, swearing her usual oath, "are you charged by the king to hold this language to me?" "Yes, madam," replied the envoy, somewhat frightened; "I have been expressly commanded to do so by his majesty." "Then have you," interrupted Elizabeth, "the order signed by his hand?" "Yes, madam," Pomponne cried, more and more alarmed, "the king my master, your good brother, has expressly charged me, in letters signed by his own hand, to address this remonstrance to your majesty." With which words he presented a copy of the orders he had received. The queen looked at the paper, and briefly telling the ambassador that she would reply to his master, swept out of the room.

Pomponne de Bellièvre got his passports and left London on the 13th of January, and the day after Elizabeth penned a letter to King Henri III. "Sir, my good brother," the letter ran, "the old ground, on which I have often based my letters appears to me so changed at present, that I am compelled to alter the style, and, instead of returning thanks, to use complaints. Good God! How could you be so unreasonable as to reproach the injured party, and to compass the death of an innocent one, by allowing her to become the prey of a murderess? But, without reference to my rank, which is nowise inferior to your own, or of my friendship to you, most sincere—for I have well nigh forfeited all reputation among the princes of my own religion, by neglecting them, in order to prevent disturbances in your dominions; exposed to dangers, such as scarcely any prince ever was before, expecting, at least, some ostensible reasons and offers for security against the daily danger, for the epilogue of this whole negotiation—you are, in spite of all this, so blinded by the words of those who, I pray, may not ruin you, that, instead of a thousand thanks, which I had merited for such singular services, Monsieur de Bellièvre has addressed language to my ears, which, in truth, I know not well how to interpret. For to tell me that if I did not save the life of that woman I should feel the consequence, seems to me the threat of an enemy, which, I assure you, will never put me in fear, but is the shortest way to make me despatch the cause of so much mischief. Let me, I pray you, understand in what sense I am to take these words; for I will not live an hour to endure that any prince whatsoever should boast that he had humbled me into drinking such a cup as that. Monsieur de Bellièvre has, indeed, somewhat softened his language by adding that you in nowise wish any danger to accrue to me, and still less to cause me any. I, therefore, write you these few words, and if it please you to act accordingly, you shall never find a truer friend; but, if otherwise, I neither am in so low a place, nor govern realms so inconsiderable, that I should, in right and honour, yield to any living prince that would injure me, and I doubt not, by the grace of God, to make my cause good, for my own security. I beseech you to think rather of the means of maintaining than of diminishing my friendship. Your realm, my good brother, cannot abide many enemies. Give not the rein, in God's name, to wild horses, lest they should shake you from your saddle. I say this to you, out of a true and upright heart, and implore the Creator to grant you long and happy life.—ELIZABETH.

For several weeks after the departure of the French embassy, the indecision of the queen continued to increase. There were daily meetings of the privy council, in which the augmenting danger of postponing the execution of Mary Stuart was debated upon, so as to induce Elizabeth to put her sign-manual to the death-warrant. But all the persuasion of Burleigh, Walsingham, and Davison—the latter secretary of state in place of Dr. Wilson, former colleague of Sir Francis—had little effect; and it was not till the first of February that, after a long conversation with Lord Admiral Howard, she roused herself into action. Howard told her very plainly that, whatever she might do, the invasion of the kingdom by the Spaniards was a settled affair, the armaments of Philip for the purpose having become a matter of public notoriety; and he earnestly inquired of her whether it would be compatible with her duty as a sovereign to nourish a dangerous foe at her back while facing another in front. Elizabeth had a high opinion of the integrity and wisdom of the lord admiral, and his words made such an impression upon her, that she asked him to tell Secretary Davison to prepare the death-warrant at once, and bring it to her for signature. The order was executed immediately. It was not yet ten o'clock in the morning when Davison presented himself before the queen with the warrant, which, after careful perusal, she signed with a firm hand, desiring the secretary to get the seal of state affixed to it by the lord chancellor. This was done in the course of a few hours, during which Burleigh assembled the members of the privy council for another earnest deliberation. The question was whether the execution should be any longer delayed, and the whole of the preparations for it be made only under the express sanction and approval of the queen, or whether they should take it upon themselves to make the fatal arrangements.

The latter was finally decided upon, chiefly through the influence of Burleigh and Davison, both of whom insisted that the painful hesitation of her majesty, though honourable to her feelings, should not be unnecessarily prolonged, and that as she had done all that her duty required by signing the death-warrant, it would be cruelty to distress her still further by bringing before her mind the details of the tragedy about to be accomplished. These arguments having prevailed, Elizabeth's warrant for the execution of Mary Stuart was handed to Robert Beale, clerk of the privy council, together with a letter signed by Burleigh, Leicester, Hunsdon, Knollys, Walsingham, Derby, Howard, Cobham, Hatton, and Davison, instructing the keepers of the condemned queen to erect the scaffold and make the other needful preparations for the fatal act, and ordering the earls of Kent and Shrewsbury to be present at the execution as representatives of the government.* Armed with these two documents, the clerk of the privy council set out for Fotheringay Castle on the evening of Saturday the 4th of February. He did not leave London alone, but in his company travelled a man of sinister aspect, dressed in black from head to foot. It was the hangman.

Mary Stuart received the first announcement of her condemnation on the 10th of November, through Lord Bathurst, specially despatched for the purpose by the queen. He told her that the judges had unanimously pronounced her sentence, and that both houses of parliament had ratified it, urging, moreover, her immediate execution; to all which she listened with great outward calmness, remarking merely that she was prepared to shed her blood for the holy Catholic religion. In this mood she continued for the next two months, evidently resigned for death, but still behaving like a reigning queen, with a kingdom to dispose of. In a long letter to the pontiff, Sixtus V., she formally made Scotland over to him, remitting to him, at the same time, her own authority over her son, beseeching his holiness to act the part of a father to him, and, above all, to bring him over to the faith of Rome. She further desired that her son should intimately connect himself with the Catholic sovereigns of Europe, and, if possible, marry a daughter of King Philip. The secret messenger to whom this letter was intrusted had to carry others for Mendoza, the duke of Guise, and the archbishop of Glasgow, in all of which she spoke of herself as a martyr of religion, unjustly condemned by the enemies of the true faith. She also requested Mendoza to inform his master, King Philip, that she transmitted her right to one crown and her claim to another to him, in case her son should not allow himself to be converted to

* Among the many tales, invented by Jesuits and others, to the detriment of Elizabeth, is one, published in most modern histories, which charges the queen with planning the secret murder of Mary Stuart after she had signed the warrant for her execution, and with inducing the two secretaries, Walsingham and Davison, to write a letter to that effect to Sir Amias Paulet. There are copies of this pretended letter, with Paulet's reply—very clever papers both, if not too clever for the purpose for which they were manufactured. Suffice it to say that these novelistic productions were not put forward till the year 1722—the hottest period of Jacobite plots, when it became the fashion to malign the Protestant queen, and to raise the murderers of Kirk-o'-Field on a pedestal as an innocent saint.

the Roman Catholic faith. While thus handing Scotland and England, like insignificant chattels, over to a foreign despot, she spoke in a different strain to Elizabeth. "I supplicate you," she wrote, "to permit me to send a jewel and a last adieu to my son, with my dying benediction, for of my blessing he has been deprived since you sent me his refusal to enter into a treaty from which I was excluded by his wicked council." Being able to keep up epistolary communication with the pope and the Spanish king, the captive queen might well have found means to forward letters to Scotland without special permission, and the request addressed to Elizabeth could be meant for little else than a blind to hide her other designs. Such also, probably, was the purport of a concluding sentence, running: "I would wish that all my papers should be brought to you without reserve, that it may be manifest to you how much I had your safety at heart." The letter, dated the 19th of December, 1586, remained without the reply earnestly requested by Mary Stuart, it having come previously to the knowledge of the privy council that she continued in clandestine correspondence with Mendoza, Guise, and other declared enemies of the realm. But the pride of the captive queen, which led her into a continuation of political intrigues at a moment when the salvation of her soul ought to have been her sole object, was abated somewhat at the end of two months after the announcement of her condemnation, when she seemed to become for the first time aware that the sentence passed against her was no more threat, but a dire reality. By permission of Elizabeth, her former chaplain, a priest named Préau, was allowed to offer her the last consolations of religion, and he finally succeeded in drawing her mind away from the vanities of earth. At the end of January she appeared to have become absolutely reconciled to her fate, so much so as to express more than once a wish that the fatal hour would come. The wish was soon to be accomplished.

At two o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday the 7th of February, the servant in attendance on Mary Stuart announced to her that several visitors had arrived at Fotheringhay Castle who wished to speak to her. Mary told her attendant that she felt unwell, but that if the business on which the strangers called was pressing she was ready to see them. The reply was that the business admitted of no delay, and a minute after the visitors, three in number, were ushered into the presence of the queen of Scots. She was sitting at the foot of her bed, before a small work-table covered with books and embroidery. Bowing respectfully, the new-comers advanced towards her, when she recognized in them the earls of Shrewsbury and of Kent and the clerk of the privy council. Addressing Mary, bareheaded and with low voice, Shrewsbury informed her that the sentence of the high court of justice, which had been signified to her more than two months before, would be carried into execution the next morning. "God be praised for the news you bring me," the queen cried, a slight pallor overspreading her face; "I could receive no better report than that announcing me the end of my miseries, and the grace which God has granted me to die for the honour of His name and of His Catholic apostolic church." Then worldlier thoughts again crossed her mind. Inquiring of Shrewsbury what had become of Curle and Naou, her two secretaries, and learning that they were still alive, and likely to be pardoned for their misdeeds, having acted under compulsion, she exclaimed with bitterness, "What! I am to die, and Naou is not to die! I protest that Naou is the cause of my death." After a pause she continued: "Born a queen, the daughter of a king, the granddaughter of Henry VII., the near relation of the sovereign of England, and queen-dowager of France, I must protest against the indignities and injuries to which I have been exposed for nineteen years in this country, though I am a free princess, subject to nobody, and recognize no superior in this world except God." The earl of Kent, zealous Protestant, deemed this burst sufficient to offer Mary Stuart the aid of the dean of Peterborough, who, he said, would teach her the true faith, and prepare her for death. She indignantly rejected the offer, requesting to be attended in her last hours by her own almoner, which, however, was refused, both earls protesting that it could not be done, it being against their religion and their conscience. Then she asked at what time she was to die. "At eight o'clock in the morning," Shrewsbury replied, and bowing once more, the earls and their companion withdrew. Mary now ordered supper to be brought, earlier than usual, and, calling all her attendants round her, sat down to table, Bourgoyn, her physician, waiting upon her. The supper finished, she poured some wine into a goblet, and drank to them, asking they might pledge her in return. They all fell on their knees, crying bitterly, but she bade them be of good cheer, and, assuring them of her love, distributed her jewels, trinkets, and dresses among them. After this Mary retired to her room to write a number of letters and her will, in which she appointed the duke of Guise her chief executor. It was past midnight when she had finished, whereupon she went to bed, and slept soundly till six o'clock in the morning. By her express orders her servants dressed her with great magnificence, and she herself picked out one of her handkerchiefs, having a thick fringe of gold, as a bandage for her eyes on the scaffold. Fully dressed, she knoeled before her private altar, reciting with great fervency the prayer for the dying, but before she had concluded there was a loud knocking at the door. Not noticing it, still kneeling before the altar, the door opened, and the sheriff of Northamptonshire, holding a white wand in his hand, advanced close to the praying queen. "Madam," he said, softly, "the lords await you, and have sent me to you." "Yes," replied Mary Stuart, rising from her knees, "let us go."

At the lower end of the great hall of Fotheringay Castle a scaffold had been erected, thirty inches high and twelve feet square. It was covered with black frieze, as were also a block in front, with a low chair close to it, and a cushion on the ground. Up the steps of this scaffold Mary Stuart walked, a few minutes after eight o'clock on the morning of Wednesday the 8th of February, 1587, carrying herself with queenly ease and dignity, as if ascending a throne. She wore a long gown of dark crimson velvet, the train of which, lined with sable, was carried by Sir Andrew Melville, and over it a cloak of figured satin of the same colour, with standing-up collar and hanging sleeves. Round her neck hung a mass of chaplets, crosses, and scapularies, the whole enveloped by a thin white veil, covering her figure from head to foot. Thus attired, the queen of Scots stepped to the front of the scaffold, sitting down on the dismal black chair behind the block. On her right were seated the earls of Shrewsbury and of Kent; to the left stood the sheriff of Northamptonshire, with his white wand of office, and in front of him a man in black, leaning on a glittering axe. The ground below the scaffold was filled with soldiers, commanded by Sir Amias Paulet, at whose back were ranged several hundred gentlemen and labourers, inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Deep silence pervaded the hall after the queen had taken her seat on the low chair; till, at the end of a minute, Robert Beale, the clerk of the privy council, stood forward to read the death-warrant signed by Elizabeth. When he had finished, Mary Stuart arose, and, making the sign of the cross on head and breast, began to address the earls near her and the people at the foot of the scaffold. "My lords and others," she exclaimed with a firm voice, "I am a queen born, a sovereign princess, not subject to the laws, a near relation of the queen of England, and her lawful heiress. After having been long and unjustly detained prisoner in this country, having endured much pain and suffering, though nobody had any right over me, I am now brought to forfeit my life. I thank God for permitting me to die for my religion; but I must protest before my death, in presence of this company, who will bear witness, that I never contrived any means for putting the queen to death, nor consented to any injury being done against her person." Dwelling at some length on the wrongs inflicted upon her, she began to get more and more animated; but on a sudden, as if remembering her position, sank down to pray. Upon this the earl of Kent made a sign to a clergyman who was standing in the background, and Dr. Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, approached Mary Stuart. "Madam," the dean exclaimed, "the queen, my most excellent sovereign, has sent me to you." Before he could say another word Mary, interrupting him, cried: "Master dean, I am firm to the ancient Roman Catholic religion, and I intend to shed my blood for it." But the dean, paying little attention to her protest, continued to exhort her to repent, to renounce her superstition, and to have no faith in the Roman pontiff, but in Jesus Christ alone. Getting excited, Mary at last told the preacher that she would hear him no longer, and with a resolute tone of voice, as if still a queen, commanded him to be silent. The earl of Kent now interfered, and speaking in his own name and that of his colleague, cried: "We desire to pray for your grace, that God may enlighten your heart at your last hour, and that thus you may die in the true knowledge of Jesus Christ our Saviour." Mary Stuart hastily answered, "My lords, if you wish to pray for me I thank you for it, but I cannot join in your prayers because we are not of the same religion." For nearly an hour the struggle between the new faith and the old continued on the scaffold, with the dark man in front grimly looking on, leaning upon his axe.

Mary Stuart's determination was equal even in her last hour, to that of her antagonists. The dean of Peterborough having commenced to read the English liturgy, she forthwith attempted to drown his voice by reciting loudly the three psalms of penitence and mercy of the Roman church, commencing, "Miserere mei Deus," "In te Domine speravi," and "Qui habitat in adjutoris." After that she commenced praying in English for the pope, for the holy apostolic faith, for the Catholic kings and princes, for the king her son, for the queen of England, and for the restoration of the true religion to Scotland and to England. The long prayer ended she arose, signifying her readiness to meet her doom. On the hangman approaching to unloosen the upper portion of her dress, she turned him off, exclaiming, with a smile, that she was not accustomed to such "valets de chambre," and beckoned two of her maids, who were kneeling at the foot of the scaffold, to come and assist her. The trembling girls, their eyes suffused with tears, were unable to perform the office, on which she tore off her veil, laid down her purple cloak, and stripped herself of her gown, retaining only a petticoat of red taffety flowered with velvet. Then, her eyes being bandaged, she knelt down on the black cushion, and clasping the crucifix to her breast, stretched forth her neck to the executioner. Groping for the block, her lips kept uttering prayers, "Miserere mei Deus," and "In manus tuas Domine." While the heavy axe was flashing through the air Mary Stuart moved slightly, and the blade fell upon the back of the head instead of upon the neck. She uttered no sound of grief or complaint, and a long sigh only continued to steal from her breast. Once more the executioner lifted his axe; then there was another flash, and a long spurt of blood, and a queen's head was rolling on the ground. Lifting up the gory head by the hair, the executioner held it forward over the scaffold, calling out, "God save Queen Elizabeth." "Thus," added the dean of Peterborough, running forward, "may all her enemies perish." "Amen!" cried the earl of Kent.

The gates of Fotheringay Castle were kept closed for several hours after the execution, and nobody was allowed to leave the place till noon, when Henry Talbot, son of the earl of Shrewsbury, had taken his departure as queen's messenger. He carried the report of Mary Stuart's death, drawn up by the clerk of the privy council, and signed by the two earls as chief witnesses, which paper, riding hard, he placed into Burleigh's hands on the morning of the following day. The news that the realm had been freed at last from its arch enemy spread rapidly through the city, and in the afternoon the bells of all the churches of London were set ringing, while when the evening approached, the streets were lighted up by bonfires, the rich went feasting the poor, and joy was spread on every countenance. Among the few who did not share in the general joy were Burleigh and the chief members of the privy council. For some days past the queen had dropped ominous words, which made them fear that they had taken too bold a step in ordering the execution of Mary Stuart without her reiterated consent, which fears were increased by her behaviour immediately after the arrival of the messenger bringing the news that the fatal act had been accomplished. On having the report communicated to her, Elizabeth affected excessive grief, shed tears in abundance, ordered mourning habits to be made for herself and her whole court, and, behaving as if the execution had taken place entirely against her wish, reproached her ministers in the most violent terms. Burleigh, who knew his mistress intimately, fully appreciating her high qualities, yet by no means blind to her extraordinary defects and weaknesses, saw at a glance the whole drift of her behaviour. Afraid as ever of war, and fearing that the death of Mary Stuart might lead her into an armed contest not only with Spain, but also with France, and, perhaps, with Scotland, she had conceived one of those weak, womanish notions, in which she was prone of indulging sometimes, of being able to change hard facts by putting on a stage costume. Not wiser through the failure of former exhibitions of this kind, as that in which she degraded herself in the eyes of the Protestant world by repudiating the earl of Murray and the Scotch reformers, she now once more took refuge in a masquerade, with the belief that it would avert the evils threatening her and her country. After putting herself in mourning for Mary Stuart, and ordering pompous funeral obsequies in her honour, she wrote a wonderful letter to James VI., assuring him that the decapitation of his mother was the effect of "a miserable accident," on account of which she felt "extreme dolour." Not content with this piece of dissimulation, or, to take the most favourable view, extreme self-deception, she banished Burleigh, Leicester, Hatton, and the other privy councillors who had signed the letter accompanying her death-warrant, from her sight, and ordered Davison, as the most guilty of all, to the Tower. The unfortunate secretary was actually tried before the Star Chamber, and sentenced to pay a fine of ten thousand pounds and to be imprisoned during her Majesty's pleasure. The judge who condemned him, Sir Roger Manwood, did so on the technical ground that the warrant for the execution of Mary Stuart which Elizabeth had signed "was not so peremptory and irrevocable as he held it," and that he ought not to have taken it upon himself to send it to Fotheringay without further orders. Though a point in law, it was scarcely so in justice, and Davison's condemnation did not add to the fame of Elizabeth, either among her friends or her enemies.

The tragi-comedy which the queen was performing met with some success, though it was more apparent than real. King James VI., who on the report of his mother's execution had talked loudly of war, pretended to be satisfied by the explanation of the "accident" given to him by the sovereign of England, and humbly excused his rashness in thinking or speaking about hostilities. But this did not prevent him from entering into secret correspondence with the prince of Parma in the Netherlands, offering to assist him in the case of an English invasion, and at the same time to allow the Jesuits free access to all parts of his kingdom, to prepare for the coming of a papal nuncio. The eyes of the young king were bent in one direction—towards the crown of Elizabeth; he was quite ready to accept it from her hands, if given freely, but he was no less ready to accept it from the pope or the king of Spain, should other means fail. Thus the alliance with Scotland was secured, as Elizabeth believed, by her own cleverness; and she had the satisfaction, soon after, of finding that her political relations with the French king, which threatened a rupture for the moment, were preserved in the same manner. Mary Stuart had numerous friends in France, above all the mighty head of the Catholic League, the duke of Guise; and the report of her execution created such a burst of rage that Henri III. was compelled to send a letter of defiance to Elizabeth threatening war. It was an exceedingly vain threat from a king scarcely powerful enough to protect his own person from insult, whose country was torn to pieces and utterly exhausted by internecine war, and whose only policy, in maintaining the mere shadow of regal authority, was to take alternately the part of one of the two great factions opposing each other in the field, allying himself at one moment with the Huguenots and the moderate Catholics, the so-called Politicians, and the next with the fanatics of the Catholic league. Elizabeth was fully aware of this state of things, yet thought it necessary to coax and flatter Henri III., to avert his simulated wrath. Inviting the French envoy, Baron d'Autepine de Chateaufort, to Greenwich, she overwhelmed him with the most flattering attentions, talked of the deep grief which the death of Mary Stuart had caused to her, assured him that she had signed the warrant for her execution only for form's sake, to satisfy her people, and never meant to have it carried out, and, finally, swore a great oath that if the members of the privy council who "had played her out trick" had not been so long in her service, she would have their heads cut off. The baron was too good a diplomatist and too well acquainted with the resources of his royal master, not to make men to believe every word uttered by the queen, in consequence of which her intercourse with Henri III. soon became as cordial as that with James VI. Elizabeth did not doubt having achieved a wonderful success through clever acting, and the two kings, her faithful allies, had reason to think the same of themselves.

Philip of Spain now was the only enemy in the field threatening vengeance for the execution of the queen of Scots. That he would not succumb to a piece of masquerading seemed tolerably certain; nevertheless, Elizabeth, elated by the prodigies of her policy, made an attempt to turn off his anger by compliments, and gain his goodwill by promises. The war in the Netherlands had been languishing for some time, owing to the utter incapacity of Maurice, who, instead of taking the field against the prince of Parma, kept quarrelling with the Protestant leaders, Maurice of Orange, son of the murdered chieftain, and John van Olden-Barneveldt, who prudently declined to make the supreme power over to him. Being under mere nominal command, bereft of discipline, suffering from want of food, and cut down under disease, the English troops which had been sent in aid of the distressed insurgents soon became bands of freebooters, and a number of them even went over to the Spaniards, not singly, but in a body with flying standards, guns, and ammunition. The disgrace might have easily been averted by appointing a general fit for his post; but Leicester was too great a favourite of the queen to make such a course possible, and he choosing, from motives of vanity, to retain his command, it was impossible for Burleigh to get rid of him. While the trial of Mary Stuart was going on, the handsome earl was summoned to England as one of the judges, but he returned soon after to the Netherlands, to the despair of the Flemings, who, greatly as they valued the English alliance, felt almost inclined to relinquish it on his account. Under those circumstances, Elizabeth met with little opposition in her privy council when proposing, as part of her great plan of theatrical diplomacy, to enter into negotiations for peace with the Spanish commander in the Netherlands. Commissioners were appointed accordingly to proceed to Flanders and meet the agents which Philip, on the desire of the queen, had nominated as his representatives to treat for peace. A master in deceit and cunning, the king seemed to feel a sort of grim delight to play another short game of dissimulation with the maiden queen, persuaded that, however clever she might be as a royal actress, he would beat her in hypocrisy.

While receiving Elizabeth's peace envoys, King Philip was actively preparing for war. Slow in coming to a resolution, the son of Kaiser Charles was obstinate in adhering to it when once made; and he was fully determined now to launch an army against England, and to stake all his immense resources to snatch the crown from the head of Elizabeth. For seventeen years the great scheme of invading England had been before his mind, and for more than four years he had made active preparations of carrying it into execution, until now he saw that postponement was no longer possible. The execution of Mary Stuart had little to do with spurring his slow mind into action, though it served to increase the energy with which the pope and the chief of the Catholic League sought to impel him towards the last decided step. Philip himself had other reasons, far more weighty in his opinion, to start his legions for the long-prepared attack. He was on the pinnacle of kingly fame, yet everywhere the power of England crossed and thwarted his designs. English gold, if not English valour, upheld the struggle of his rebellious subjects in the Netherlands; English influence and English gold, again, braced the arms of the Huguenots, preventing him to make himself master of France by means of his allies of the Catholic League; and English hands, not with gold but with good English steel, opposed him in the most cherished of his possessions, the kingdom of Portugal. This last was the point where Philip's honour, pride, and ambition felt most touched. He had made himself master of the Portuguese kingdom in 1580, at the death of the last of the monarchs of the house of Avis, and continued to hold it, in spite of the resistance of the people proclaiming itself in constant insurrections. The legitimate ruler of Portugal, Don Antonio, had flown to England at the entry of thirty thousand Spanish troops into Lisbon; and though not much encouraged by Elizabeth, who as usual made large promises, but scarcely gave him money enough to buy food for himself and a couple of servants, his mere existence was deemed by the king the greatest source of danger threatening his new authority. Owning an empire fabulous in wealth west of the Atlantic, the possession of Portugal, with its splendid harbours facing this empire, was of extreme importance to Philip, and he was prepared to risk the utmost to keep it under his sway. But here, as elsewhere, England opposed the stretch of his ambition, fostering the rebellion of the Portuguese, and sending its cruisers across the seas in the name of Don Antonio. Ruler of two continents, Philip was made to feel that his arm could not hold them both, and his power over one at least was a shadow as long as the greatest of his foes were masters of the intervening space. It was for being kings of the seas as much as for being Protestants that Philip determined to conquer the people of England.

He had, without doubt, some real and grave complaints to make about the doings of the sea-kings. Nominally, Philip had been at profound peace with England from the day of his accession; he had shown himself for many years most kindly disposed towards Elizabeth, at a time she most required help; and he had even borne quietly insults from her hands which he would have accepted from no other monarch without instantly declaring war. Notwithstanding this peaceable attitude, the subjects of Elizabeth, with the tacit consent of the government, had made war against him almost from the moment he ascended the throne. The whole Atlantic, from the banks of Newfoundland down to the Gulf of Guinea, was swarming with pirates sailing under the English flag, banded together so as to form fleets of war, and strong enough to attack every Spanish convoy carrying treasures from the west to the east. All the complaints of Philip about this wholesale piracy, unheard of among civilized nations not at war with each other, had proved utterly vain, ending in little else but insult being added to injury, by Elizabeth and her ministers professing, in a softly innocent manner, to be absolutely unaware of the doings of the sea-rovers. Among these foes, sweetly ignored by the English government, there had arisen two names more formidable to the king of Spain than whole armies. John Hawkins, equipping fleets with the scarcely concealed assistance of the queen, had ruined half the commerce with the West Indies; and his kinsman and pupil, Francis Drake, treading in his footsteps, bid fair to destroy the other half. To free himself of foes like those on their own element was impossible to Philip; he had armies and generals in abundance to fight battles on land, but not a boatful of men nor a captain in all his dominions fit to face the Hawkinses and Drakes of the sea. To a man like Philip, accustomed to hurl vast armies from one end of Europe to the other, and calmly indifferent in shedding the blood of thousands and tens of thousands to gain his own ends, the idea of getting rid of these storm birds by laying hold of their nest was but natural, and the moody reflection of seventeen years only increased the determination. He could not but feel deeply humiliated at the thought of having been beaten by the sea-rovers on all occasions, even in the field of intrigue; of having made Hawkins a grandee of Spain, and of having for thanks his fleets destroyed and commerce annihilated by his kinsman Drake. Hate of Francis Drake, far more than love of Mary Stuart, impelled King Philip in his great preparations for the invasion of England.

Francis Drake to a very great extent deserved the hate with which King Philip honoured him. Born in 1546, the son of a naval chaplain, he had taken to the sea as soon almost as he had left his mother's lap, and from the moment his hands could hold a sword had swung it against Spain. The little fortune he possessed he had risked in Hawkins's great expedition to the West Indies, which ended so unfortunately to all concerned, except Elizabeth, who cleverly reimbursed herself by laying hold of the golden ducats of Philip in Plymouth Harbour. Not being able to do the same, Drake swore hatred against what he considered Spanish tyranny, resolved to repair his losses upon King Philip or his subjects whenever and wherever he could. "The case was clear in sea divinity," according to Thomas Fuller, and Drake acted like a man possessed of a very good case. In 1572, having obtained a commission from Elizabeth, he set sail with two small ships, manned by only seventy-two persons, for the isthmus of Panama, captured the town of Nombre-di Dios, then invaded Mexico, stormed Vera Cruz, loaded his vessels with treasure to the brim, and returned to England in little more than a year. In 1577 he started again, this time with a fleet of five small vessels and one hundred and sixty-four men, passed the straits of Magellan, ravaged and plundered the Spanish possessions in Chili and Peru, and crossing the Pacific Ocean, returned by way of the Cape of Good Hope, performing the voyage around the world in two years and ten months, and bringing back spoil worth a million sterling. On his return to England, the Spanish ambassador violently demanded his punishment as a pirate; but the queen, as always, pretended to know nothing, declared her great affection for King Philip, and, a week after, visited Francis Drake on board his ship at Deptford, conferring upon him the honour of knighthood. "A more false and deceitful woman than this queen does not exist," Mendoza informed his master, speaking of the Deptford trip.

All the previous exploits of Drake had been more or less on his own account, but in the spring of 1587 he resolved on a kind of public undertaking against King Philip. As if trying how far his majesty might be driven into exasperation by the never-ending attacks of his sea enemies, he chose the very moment of Mary Stuart's execution, while all the priests of the Continent were cursing the island heretics, to fall upon the most Catholic king. With a strange faith in the perfection of her diplomacy and the blindness of those whom she beloved dupes, Elizabeth at one and the same time despatched envoys to the Spanish king to treat for peace and encouraged Drake to attack Philip, going so far as to give him four of her own ships, and consenting to the city of London furnishing him with twenty-four more vessels, well stocked with guns and ammunition. All this was done nominally in secret, and against the orders of the government, but was in reality so much a public affair that the ministers in many of the churches preached about the enterprise "against Antichrist and his members." The pirate fleet of the citizens of London and the queen set sail from Plymouth Sound on the 2nd of April, 1587; and seventeen days after, on the 19th of April, Sir Francis Drake with his twenty-eight vessels dashed into the harbour of Cadiz, defying the guns of the fortress and the large men-of-war at the entrance, and laid hold of the entire shipping. After securing everything valuable, and sinking, burning, and destroying more than a hundred vessels, in the course of two nights and one day, he went off as he had come in, the mere terror of his name being sufficient to keep the big galleys of Philip in the distance. From Cadiz, Drake sailed to Cape St. Vincent, where he took three forts, burnt the shipping along the coast to the mouth of the Tagus, and then challenged the commander-in-chief of the Spanish navy, the marquis of Santa Cruz, whose war vessels were lying in the river, to come out and fight him. The marquis politely declined, whereupon Drake, to lose no time with cowards, started for the Azores, expecting something good to turn up in that direction. He was not mistaken in his hopes, for before he had reached the islands, he fell in with a marvellous good prize in the shape of a huge ship, called a carrack, coming from the Spanish main, loaded with gold, silver, diamonds, and other treasure almost to overflowing. Though accompanied by several men-of-war, Drake seized the ship, called the St. Philip, without any trouble, and then bethought himself of returning to England, considering that the joint-stock enterprise of the citizens of London and Queen Elizabeth had paid itself by this time. The undertaking was looked upon by all concerned as a very good joke, and very profitable in the bargain, and Drake humorously observed that he had been "singeing the king of Spain's beard." Elizabeth herself seemed to be under the impression that Philip's beard would stand a great deal of singeing before getting on fire, and having taken her share of the useful Spanish carrack, she earnestly continued the peace negotiations.

It suited the grim mood of Philip to play and be played with a little while longer. He amused the earl of Derby, Lord Cobham, and several other commissioners whom Elizabeth had sent into the Netherlands to treat for a suspension of hostilities, with propositions and counter-propositions, continuing all the while in the most zealous manner his preparations for the invasion of England. The plan, originally formed on but a small scale, had grown in his mind with every successive injury which he had suffered from the English government or English privateers, until it reached the most colossal proportions. To chastise the race who had insulted him in a manner no nation had ever dared before, Philip had resolved to gather the warlike power of all his immense possessions, and concentrating it upon one point, hurl it upon the doomed realm of Elizabeth. The grand decision was arrived at in the summer of 1587, after the report of the expedition of Francis Drake had reached the king. Just previous to it, in a council of war held at Madrid, Philip seemed inclined to fall back upon the old scheme of attacking England from three sides, which was strongly recommended by most of his advisers. Among these were Sir William Stanley, an English refugee, friend of Babington, who offered to make himself responsible for the success of a landing in Ireland, and a firm establishment in that kingdom of Spanish rule. This counsel was backed by Colonel Semple, a Scotchman in Philip's service, and Plato, an Italian engineer, the latter of whom had constructed a chart of the British coast, travelling for the purpose in the course of several years around the whole shore of Scotland and England. The king attached much weight to these opinions; but still more to those of the marquis of Santa Croce and of the prince of Parma, both of whom advised that the invasion should take place simultaneously in Ireland, Scotland, and England, the necessary forces to be assembled in Flanders, and to be started from some large harbour on the coast of Holland or Zealand. All these plans were overturned by Philip after the attack of Drake, in his desire to be not only revenged upon England, but to have a great, a speedy, and a signal vengeance. He determined to collect all the ships at his service in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, to put an army composed of the most select of his troops on board, and to throw the whole force, aided by auxiliaries from the Netherlands, into the Thames, right upon the capital of England. The depth of Philip's hatred was to be measured by the greatness and boldness of the enterprise, immeasurably above any other he had conceived in his life.

All through the spring, the summer, and autumn of 1587 the wharfs and ports of Sicily, Naples, Catalonia, Andalusia, Castile, and Biscay resounded with the noise of shipwrights, sailmakers, carpenters, smiths, and a legion of other artisans, building the great navy, or "Armada," of King Philip. The object of the Armada, ostensibly, was the conquest of new empires beyond the Atlantic; and to spread this belief printed reports were everywhere distributed dwelling upon the riches of the countries about to be annexed to the crown of Spain, and inviting adventurers to join in the undertaking. Not a few doubted the assertions thus made, but were none the wiser for the doubt. The entire secret of the enterprise, with all its details, King Philip had communicated to only four persons—the pontiff Sixtus V., the prince of Parma, Mendoza, and the duke of Guise. Sixtus V., among all the associates of Philip, was the most resolute as well as the most powerful. The king, to increase his chances of success, was desirous not to put religion too much in the foreground, and to hold out the prospect of toleration to the people he intended to subjugate; but the pontiff insisted that it should be otherwise, and that the attack upon the island heretics should be a fierce crusade. Philip was compelled by the superior energy of his ally to assent to this demand, and the pope thereupon appointed a legate for England in the person of Dr. Allen, chief of the Rheims seminary, to whom he also gave a cardinal's hat. The new legate entered upon his duties at once by preparing a furious manifesto against Elizabeth, reproaching her with the disgrace of her birth, the shamelessness of her heresy, the duplicity of her character, and the dissoluteness of her manners and morals. This manifesto, together with a new papal bull renewing the anathema fulminated against the queen by Gregory XIII., was to be profusely distributed in England on the landing of the Spanish troops, Cardinal Allen declaring himself persuaded that his paper alone would have the effect of upsetting the throne of Elizabeth. In return for the concession granted to him by the king, Sixtus V. made over to him the two crowns of Scotland and England, regarding them as fiefs of the holy see. Previously, the bishop of Ross, acting as executor of Mary Stuart, had issued a declaration in French, English, and Latin, informing the world that Philip was the only legitimate ruler of the two realms, the king of Scotland having rendered himself incompetent by his heresy both to govern his own country and to succeed to the right of his mother. Thus the claims of King Philip were amply secured, legally and ecclesiastically, and all that remained was the formality of taking possession of his property.

The general plan of the Armada, which Philip's courtiers called beforehand "the Invincible," was that all the ships should meet in the roads of Lisbon to embark the greater part of the army of invasion, and that the rest should join on the coast of West Flanders with the prince of Parma, nominated the military chief of the expedition. Having no strong confidence in the wisdom or power of perseverance of the king of Spain, the pope persuaded him to leave a great part of the management of the vast enterprise in the hands of his able commander of the Netherlands, as being nearer to the seat of operations. This was assented to after some hesitation on the part of Philip, and Parma received orders to enter upon the double task of preparing an army for the invasion of England in the south, while prosecuting the war against the insurgents in the north of the Netherlands. Farnese entered with immense zeal upon the undertaking. By his command the great forest of Waes was cut down to build flat-bottomed boats, which, floating down the rivers and canals to Antwerp, Nieuport, and Dunkirk, were to carry a force of sixty thousand men to the mouth of the Thames, under the escort of the Armada. In addition to the troops which he was able to spare in the campaign of the Netherlands, the army embarking for England was to be formed by five thousand men from northern and central Italy, four thousand from the kingdom of Naples, six thousand from Castile, three thousand from Arragon, and five thousand from Austria. While these hosts, drawn together from the ends of Europe, as far as Philip's sceptre reached, were putting themselves in movement; while an army of workmen was building flat-bottomed boats, and another army busy in making gun-carriages, fascines, and all the material requisite for building bridges, besieging castles, and forming camps, the envoys of Elizabeth continued energetically in their peace negotiations. Sitting in the shade of the great Waes forest, which was being felled to span the British Channel, the earl of Derby, Lord Cobham, and their brother commissioners kept debating with the envoys of Philip the exact wording of the various paragraphs in the treaty of everlasting peace and friendship which was to bind Spain and England. They had got close to each other the representatives of both nations, and all that was wanting to complete harmony consisted in slight shades of difference, to be got over by a very little more talk. Lord Derby thought that ten or eleven more sittings would settle all the trifles still under discussion.

The report of the great armaments of the king of Spain could not fail to alarm Elizabeth, but her hopes in the success of her diplomacy had not altogether ceased. One great source of her confidence was in the attitude of both the rulers of Scotland and France. James VI., who had now been declared of age, expressed himself ready to come with an army in aid of England should a foreign invasion take place; while Henri III., scarcely less liberal in promises, offered the queen to fall upon the Spanish troops in the Netherlands in case Philip should attack her. Elizabeth was confident that, with these allies, she would be more than a match for all the forces the Spanish king might send into the field; and, knowing his timidity and his irresolute character, she felt assured that, however willing to ruin her, he would shrink back, if only at the last moment, from an enterprise all but certain to result in defeat. These calculations would not have been altogether unjustified, had not the queen left two important elements out of account. She had forgotten, seemingly, that the king of France was a mere nominal king, under the absolute control of Guise, and that Philip himself, with all his immense power, might arrive at a point where it would be impossible for him to stop, carried away by the mere impetus of the tremendous forces he had set in movement. It was not, long before the first of these facts made itself manifest in a startling manner. At the commencement of 1588, when all England was full of rumours of the coming invasion, and the queen alone appeared confident that it would not take place, the envoys accredited at the court of Henri III. reported threatening signs of an approaching revolution. The king himself was as full as ever of promises to assist Elizabeth, offering to conclude an offensive and defensive alliance with her; but the political situation of France had made it too evident to the English commissioners that such a treaty would be mere waste paper. Even the shadow of power which had hitherto clung to Henri III. was fast falling away. In the early part of April, a splendid Spanish embassy crossed the Pyrenees, not accredited to the king but to the duke of Guise, chief of the Catholic League. The head of the embassy, Don Juan Iniguez Moreo, came to offer to Guise, in the name of his master, the sum of three hundred thousand crowns, and an army of six thousand infantry and two thousand horse, to take possession of the throne of France and expel the shadow-king. A formal treaty was concluded on these conditions, and on the 12th of May the duke of Guise, at the head of the forces of the League, marched into Paris, and drove out Henri III., making it impossible for him, as was said by the prince of Parma, "to assist the queen of England even with his tears, as he needed them all to weep over his own misfortunes." A fortnight after the flight of Henri III. the Spanish Armada left the Tagus with full sails, its course directed towards the British Isles.

The queen of England as yet had made little preparation to parry the stroke of the tremendous double sword uplifted at the borders of the Tagus and the Scheldt. While Philip was arraying half the power of Europe against her realm, Elizabeth had contented herself to assemble a few troops in the neighbourhood of London, and to erect some insignificant fortifications on various parts of the coast and on the river Thames, leaving the chief defence of the country to the people themselves. It was a noble trust, and one fully warranted, yet as far as the queen personally was concerned, was the result of weakness rather than strength. Deeply impressed with the belief that the negotiations of the earl of Derby and her other commissioners in the Netherlands would result in a peace being concluded between her and the king of Spain, and fearful, in the meanwhile, to throw away money upon useless armaments, she kept more awaiting events than preparing for them, with, perhaps, the dim consciousness at the bottom of her mind of her subjects being republicans, fully able to take care of themselves without the intervention of crown and sceptre. The queen's advisers did nothing to destroy this belief. Burleigh to a great extent shared the hopes of his mistress in peace, and Walsingham, better informed by his spies of the extent of Philip's preparations, entertained an utter contempt for the naval power of Spain. Both, however, did not for a moment forget the immense responsibility resting upon them, and to gather all the advice that could be had under the circumstances, they convoked a sort of general council in the autumn of 1587. The council, which met on the 27th of November, consisted chiefly of men known for their military experience, such as Lord Grey, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Grenville, Sir Roger Williams, and Sir Richard Bingham; but it included also a personage known partly as an unsuccessful adventurer in expeditions to America, and partly as a most successful courtier. This man was Sir Walter Raleigh. The son of a Devonshire gentleman, born in 1552, Raleigh, though only thirty-five years of age, had led a most eventful life, fighting with the Huguenots of France and the "Beggars" of Flanders, defending the English rule in Ireland against Catholics and Spaniards, and crossing the Atlantic more than once in search of unknown worlds. Introduced at court by one of his friends, Elizabeth had taken a fancy to the bold and far-travelled adventurer, as handsome in person as courtier-like in manners, and, giving him several lucrative offices, had attached him to her person. It was by the special desire of the queen that Raleigh was made a member of the council meeting to deliberate upon the probabilities of a Spanish invasion, and at the very beginning he took a leading part in the discussion. He asserted, with the confidence of a man fully acquainted with the facts of the case, that English troops could never hope to contend successfully on shore with the old warlike, highly-trained legions of King Philip, and that the only way to oppose an attack of Spain would be to meet it on the sea. With this opinion for basis, Raleigh advised to arm not only the ships of the royal navy, but all the craft that could be gathered around the shores of the kingdom, to turn fishing-smacks into war-vessels and sailors into soldiers, and to destroy the fleets which Philip might send against England in a number of small fights, rather than one great encounter. The counsel was so eminently practical that Burleigh, whose wisdom was common sense in its highest perfection, immediately became a convert to Raleigh's plan, and recommended it warmly to the queen and his colleagues. It scarcely needed the recommendation to Elizabeth, she being able to see at a glance that the proposed scheme of defence was not only the simplest and most expeditious, but the cheapest. The national forces which Raleigh proposed to raise would cost her nothing, while her own navy, small as it was, consisting of only twenty-eight sail, had become so expensive that she seldom hazarded to put the ships in commission, preferring to let them lie in harbour at Chatham, Portsmouth, or Plymouth. Those considerations had no little weight with a queen looking upon public economy as one of the first principles of good government; and her chief counsellors assenting, she resolved to adopt the plan of a naval defence of England in its chief features. The high admiral, Lord Howard, obtained orders to guard the Channel with the vessels of the royal navy, while to Raleigh was intrusted the command of the maritime forces of Devon and Cornwall, and to two other famous sailor-adventurers, Hawkins and Drake, that of portions of the south coast. One more great navigator, Martin Frobisher, who had plucked fame by seeking a ship's passage to ancient Cathay through the polar seas of Northern America, was installed as captain at the side of Raleigh, Hawkins, and Drake. Never before in the history of England had the defence of the country, and its fate for all times to come, been left in the hands of the sons of the people as it was at this moment, when assailed by the combined forces of the greatest monarch of the world and the head of Catholic Christendom.

It was well for Elizabeth to leave the people to defend the people, for no other power, royal or oligarchical, could have done it half so effectively. Of the real dangers threatening the realm neither Elizabeth nor her ministers had any true conception till almost the time it was past; and but for the deep instinctive feeling of the nation and the nation's best sons, the old legions of Philip, steel-hardened in battle, might have set their foot upon the soil of England, lighting the fires of the inquisition once more from one end of the kingdom to the other. The great Spanish fleet which left the river Tagus a fortnight after the flight of Henri III. from Paris, on the 28th of May, 1588, represented the most formidable armament ever borne on the broad waters of the Atlantic. The Armada, called the Invincible, consisted of the enormous number of one hundred and fifty-four ships, carrying an army of 21,855 soldiers, besides 8766 sailors, and 2088 slaves chained to the oars of the galleys. There were also on board the Armada 3165 guns, most of them of large calibre, besides 20,000 muskets, 10,000 halberds, 100,000 quintals of gunpowder, and everything else required for the invasion and conquest of a kingdom. Of provisions of all kinds there was the greatest abundance, one hundred and forty-seven thousand pipes of wine being stored alone for the service of the officers and of the volunteers, many of the latter belonging to the noblest families of Spain. All these were attended by their suites of servants, by chaplains and physicians, less as if going into battle than of taking possession of a realm already conquered. This view was still more indicated by the representatives of the church which the pontiff, by the wish of Cardinal Allen, had sent on board the Invincible Armada. These were one hundred and eighty priests and monks, most of them members of the society of the Jesuits, who carried with them vast numbers of copies of Cardinal Allen's manifesto against the queen of England as well as of the papal bull of excommunication, besides several cargoes of chains, wheels, racks, whips, and other instruments for bringing back heretics to the bosom of the true apostolic church. The immense fleet of war, attached to which hung a multitude of trading vessels, was divided into seven squadrons, each with a separate commander. The first detachment, forming the vanguard, consisting of twelve tower-like galleons, propelled by slaves, was under the command of the duke of Medina Sidonia, who was accompanied by the prince of Asculé, Philip's illegitimate son, special representative of the mighty king, owner of the Armada. The second division, called the fleet of Biscay, was commanded by the vice-admiral, Juan Martinez de Recaldo; the third, the fleet of Castile, was under the orders of Don Diego de Valdez; the fourth, the Andalusian squadron, under those of Don Pedro de Valdez; the fifth, the squadron of Guypuscoa, under those of Don Miguel de Oquendo; the sixth, called Levanticas, or the Eastern fleet, drawn chiefly from the harbours of Venice, was commanded by Don Martin de Bertendonna, and the seventh, the South-Italian squadron, by Hugo de Moncada. Commander-in-chief of the whole fleet was the duke of Medina Sidonia, appointed by Philip just before the start from the Tagus, on the sudden death of the marquis of Santa Cruce, the most distinguished naval officer of Spain. The death of the marquis was the first great misfortune that happened to the Invincible Armada. His successor, the duke of Medina, possessed no other fitness for the high post to which he was nominated by the king than that of being a grandee of the first class. Absolutely ignorant of naval matters, and unaccustomed even to the sea, the first thing that happened to the high admiral after leaving the yellow waters of the Tagus was to fall a victim to the mal de mer.

On the day of the sailing of the Armada, the commander-in-chief issued a proclamation, declaring the destination of the great fleet to be England and the purpose a religious crusade. "I do ordain and command," ran the proclamation, signed "Don Alonso Perez de Guzman, duke of Medina Sidonia, count of Niebla, marquis of Cashesho, lord of the city of St. Lucar, captain-general of the ocean and of this armament of his majesty," "I do ordain and command that the general officers of the fleet and the army, all captains, lieutenants, pilots, masters, soldiers, mariners, and whatsoever other people for the land or sea service cometh in this armament, all the time that it endureth, shall be governed by these my rules. First, and before all things, it is to be understood by all the above-named, from the highest to the lowest, that the principal foundation and cause that have moved the king his majesty to make and continue this armament hath been and is to serve God, and to return unto His church a great many contrite souls that are oppressed by the heretics, enemies to our holy Catholic faith, which hold them subject to their unbelief and unhappiness. And for that every one may put his eyes upon this mark, I do command and desire that all shall duly confess themselves, and receive the sacrament with full contrition for their sins, by the which contrition, and zeal to do God competent service, He will carry and guide us to His great glory, which is that which particularly and principally is intended. In like manner, I do charge and command all officers to have particular care that no mariner, soldier, or other that serveth in this armament do blaspheme or rage against God, or our Lady, or any of the saints, upon pain of being sharply corrected and well chastised. Likewise I do command that all quarrels, defiance, and injuries that are and have been before this day, shall be suppressed and suspended, so that none goeth in this armament for the time that it continueth and lasteth, although they be old quarrels. Also, for that it is known that great inconveniences ariseth, and offence groweth unto God by consenting that common women and such like go with armies, I do ordain and desire all captains and masters of ships not to consent that any such be taken on board, and whosoever doeth, or dissembleth therewith, shall be grievously punished. But I do command that the company of every ship, at the break of every day, on the tolling of the bell on the main-mast, shall say the morning prayers, and at night the 'Ave Maria,' with sometimes the 'Salve Regina,' and, at least the Saturdays, the litany." After further instructions, in great detail, for the management of the Armada, the "captain-general of the ocean" furnished the sailing orders. He directed that all the vessels of the fleet, in due order, should "set their course for the Scilly Islands, having good care of their soundings; but, if, by chance, any ship or ships do lose the fleet they shall not return into Spain, in any manner, upon pain of death of all concerned, and being declared traitors." As general meeting-place for the Armada, the duke of Medina appointed Mount's Bay, "which is betwixt the Land's End and the Lizard: there shall you seek the whole navy, or find pinnaces with order what shall be done." These instructions were drawn up by Philip himself, under the advice of his ministers and of several Englishmen sent to him by Cardinal Allen. The king finally ordered Sidonia not to offer or accept a battle on any account until he had effected his junction with the army and fleet of the prince of Parma, on the coast of the Netherlands. The order was destined to be fatal to the success of the Invincible Armada.

The immense fleet dropped down the Tagus with a fair wind, amidst the sounding of trumpets from every vessel, the ringing of bells from all the churches of the Portuguese capital, and the jubilation of countless multitudes who were lining the hills on both sides of the river, gazing upon a sight such as human eyes had never beheld before. For several days the voyage was highly prosperous, a soft southerly breeze drifting the Armada towards the Bay of Biscay, aiding the fierce labours of the two thousand slaves whose oars propelled the huge "galleons," and "galleasses," floating towers of a floating city. But suddenly, before the fatal bay—stormy graveyard of the Atlantic—was reached, a hurricane arose from the west, dashing the floating towers against one another like tiny leaves in a forest, and scattering the crowd of smaller vessels in all directions. Had the duke of Medina Sidonia been a few miles further north, it might have saved all further trouble to Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher, the white-capped billows of the Biscayan sea doing most effectually the work for which they were preparing; but fortunately for the duke, if not for England, the winds arose when he was near a sheltered port, and before great mischief was done the Armada had dropped anchor in the landlocked harbour of Corunna, or, as called by English sailors, the Groyn. A few vessels only, running before the storm, were unable to attend to the signals from the duke of Medina's ship, and made their course straightway to the Scilly Isles, as prescribed in the sailing-orders. Their arrival here created great consternation, and the report that the whole Spanish fleet was approaching was forthwith carried to the high admiral, who had been driven into Plymouth by the same tempest which scattered the Armada. He left the port at once, to look out for the enemy, but soon learnt that the Spanish ships were fugitives, anxious to return to their country with the first wind. The report of the misfortune of Philip's armament reached London, in a greatly exaggerated state, almost before it came to Plymouth; and the queen had no sooner received it when she despatched orders to Lord Howard to dismantle the largest vessels of the royal navy, and to send the crews on furlough, so as to save the expenses of their board and wages. For once Elizabeth's economy might have proved fatal to the kingdom, had not the high admiral taken upon himself the bold step of disobeying her orders. Howard informed her majesty, in all humility, that he preferred maintaining the sailors at his own expense to discharging them, and this done, and fearing further remonstrances, he called a council of war of the chief officers of the navy, to deliberate whether it would be wise to look for the Armada in Spain instead of waiting for it on the English coast. Daring as was the proposal, all were in favour of the Spanish trip, and on the 8th of June the English fleet left the Channel with a fair north wind. But after forty-eight hours' sail, before reaching Cape Finisterre, the wind wheeled round to the south, with the effect of not only staying Howard's progress, but making him consider the fearful imprudence of leaving his country unprotected, in a wild chase after an unknown enemy. The reflection was serious enough to make him reverse his course, and with the south wind full in his sails he hurried back to England, reaching Plymouth once more on the 10th of June. Nothing more had been heard in his absence of King Philip's fleet; and some of the sceptics among the sailors were beginning to think that the wonderful Armada might turn out a more phantasm, like the sea-serpent and other ocean mysteries. Lord Howard himself held the belief that the enemy would not make his appearance during that year at least, so that he commenced laying up his ships, and took to playing at bowls with his officers, thinking no more of the Armada than of the Flying Dutchman.

The lord high admiral of England was playing merrily at bowls with Drake, Hawkins, and other friends on the afternoon of Friday the 18th of July, when a messenger came rushing up to the playground at the Hoe in furious haste. The Armada was coming, he gasped forth. A Scotch sea-rover, named Fleming, had seen at sunset on the previous evening, when off the Lizard, the approach of the gigantic fleet, its outline so vast as to darken the horizon. The report brought the game of bowls to a premature end, Drake being the only one who desired that the contest should be played out, insisting that there was plenty of time to finish the match and to beat the Spaniards. Lord Howard did not think so, but hurried off to his post, issuing orders to all the ships to leave the harbour immediately. The departure was not easy, the wind blowing right ahead; but by dint of strenuous efforts, continued all through the night, the whole of the vessels were warped out, and, pushing forward with all haste, the high admiral found himself in view of the Spanish fleet on the evening of Saturday the 20th of July. It was an imposing sight. The great Armada was drawn up in a vast semicircle, like the crescent of a moon, the length from horn to horn spanning more than seven miles, and the huge galleys, with the regular dip of their slave-driven oars, appearing like strange monsters of the sea. Facing this mighty armament, the English fleet looked almost insignificant. It consisted of not more than ninety-six vessels, the greater number of them merchantmen, with a few guns on board, and but four, the "Triumph," the "Victory," the "Ark Royal," and the "Revenge," of a size approaching that of the larger Spanish ships. Sailors less bold and experienced than Hawkins, Drake, Frobisher, and their companions might have lost courage on comparing their forces with those of the enemy, but they only rejoiced at the sight. They knew that the floating towers were formidable merely in appearance, being unwieldy in the extreme, dependent in their movements entirely on the labour of the poor slaves who were sitting at the bottom exposed to shot and shell. Against these galleons and galleasses their own little vessels, short of build, and rigged so as readily to tack, were more than a match, as the English sea-rovers had found in many a previous encounter, and as they fairly trusted now to find again. But still more than in their vessels the commanders of England's fleet trusted to their men. They knew that they were fighting for life, and liberty, and religion, and home, and wife, and children; they knew that the people of the big Armada were all, from the princes and dukes on the deck of the high galleys, to the chained oarsmen at the bottom, but the slaves of a vile despot. It was with a stout confidence and a cheerful heart that the free men of England took to battle with the slaves of Spain.

Without hesitating for a single moment, the English commander gave the signal for the attack upon the Armada as soon as the huge mass of ships appeared in sight. Not counting the merchantmen, the high admiral had under his command but thirty-four ships, of an aggregate burthen of 11,820 tons, manned by 6279 sailors, all of them acting likewise as soldiers. This force was divided into four squadrons, Lord Howard, in the "Ark Royal," of 800 tons, commanding the centre; Drake, in the "Revenge," of 500 tons, directing the right wing; Hawkins, in the "Victory," of 800 tons, having the left wing in charge; and Frobisher, in the "Triumph," of 1000 tons, the largest vessel of the fleet, bringing up the rear. Before setting upon the enemy, the high admiral sent a pinnace, the "Disdain," commanded by Jonas Bradbury, an old sailor, to the commander-in-chief of the Spanish fleet, challenging him to battle. The duke of Medina Sidonia, in compliance with the orders received from his master, declined the contest, sailing grandly along the coast, his course directed towards the Straits of Dover. With a calm sea, and a wind entirely in his favour, the duke might have steered right towards Plymouth, crushing the little navy before him under the weight of his big ships, and landing his twenty-two thousand soldiers on the soil of England. All the more experienced officers of the Armada, notably the vice-admiral, Martinez de Recalde, and the commanders of the Castilian and Andalusian squadrons, strongly urged the necessity of this course upon their chief; however, the duke of Medina, strongly conscious of his own incapacity, was afraid to disobey the orders of the king, and instead of using his forces under the most favourable conditions he could hope to find, led them into destruction. From the moment the huge fleet set sail towards the narrowest point of the Channel, its ruin was all but certain. Unable to keep closely together under all circumstances, the Spanish ships were attacked one by one by their bold little foes; and whenever a big galley lagged behind, it was pounced upon by them in an instant, as eagles might pounce upon a sheep strayed from the flock. Thus, in the first day's sail along the coast, the 22nd of July, the flag-ship of Pedro de Valdez, leader of the Andalusian division, and one of the best sailors of Spain, was taken by Drake, after an obstinate resistance. Drake's men found 55,000 ducats on board, which they divided among themselves like brethren, and then set cheerfully to work to capture more galleons and galleasses. On the day following, Tuesday the 23rd of July, the Armada had advanced opposite to Portland, when, unable to

but the possibility of constant attacks from the crowd of men in his rear and at his sides any longer, the duke of Medina resolved to face them. On a signal from the flag-ship the great fleet formed in battle order, amidst the intense anxiety of thousands of spectators who were watching its proceedings from the shore. To them it seemed that the fate of the kingdom was hanging in the balance.

Drake, Hawkins, and all the young officers of the English navy were eager for battle, but the high admiral did not feel warranted to engage in the contest without summoning a council of war. It met in the morning of the 23rd of July, and Sir Walter Raleigh, who arrived just at the moment from the Cornish coast where he had been stationed, took part in it. His opinion, given in the teeth of the majority, was strongly against a regular battle, and in favour of irregular warfare after the mode already commenced. He argued it would be madness "to clap ships together" under the particular circumstances, with vessels of the largest size on the one hand, and comparatively small, swift boats on the other: for which reason he eloquently recommended his friends and companions to "fight loose." The advice was so eminently sensible as to convince all but the most hot-headed of the English sailors, and it was decided accordingly to follow the counsel of Raleigh, and to turn the battle offered by the duke of Medina into a series of skirmishes. The resolution had scarcely been come to when the whole Spanish fleet was seen bearing down upon them, leaving Lord Howard scarcely time to disengage his vessels and send them in small divisions upon the rear and wings of the enemy. Frobisher, commanding the "Triumph," the largest and most unwieldy of all the English ships, was unable to get out of the way sufficiently soon, and had to sustain for more than two hours a hand-to-hand fight with some of the huge galleasses, assisted by only five merchantmen. But the English fought like lions, and the little vessels, ever in motion, pouring in a broadside and then sheering out of range of the Spanish guns, effectually kept the big galleys at bay, and the result of the day's contest was entirely in favour of Howard's fleet. After disabling nearly every ship on the western wing of the Armada, the high admiral, with his valiant aides-de camp, Drake, Hawkins, and Raleigh, went to the assistance of Frobisher, and, having disengaged him from his foes, swept round to the rear of the Spanish fleet, scattering destruction to right and left. When the approach of night made an end of the struggle, the duke of Medina found that he had lost one of the finest of his Venetian galleys, a large number of men, and vast stores of provisions and arms, captured on board several transports. The English, on their part, had scarcely suffered at all, the day's tussle being looked upon by most of them as mere sport, "a morris-dance upon the waters." They would have gladly danced a little longer, if necessary by starlight, but were prevented doing so for a very curious reason. Queen Elizabeth, whose cognomay was not checked even by the danger of invasion, had provided her fleet in the most sparing manner with gunpowder, and for want of this indispensable article the English navy had to beat an ignominious retreat on the evening of the 23rd of July. The duke of Medina, while grimly brooding over the day's misfortune, was happily ignorant of the tremendous fact that no greater enemy was lying between his mighty fleet and the shore of England than five score vessels without ammunition, as helpless to defend themselves as lions without teeth.

All through Wednesday, the 24th of July, the English navy was lying idle, crouched against the shore, and abstaining from any movement. Lord Howard, while waiting for fresh supplies of gunpowder, was glad enough to see that the Armada was getting under weigh again, its course directed to the east. Slowly the gigantic crescent of floating towers moved onward, till, on the morning of Thursday, the 25th of July, it stood opposite the Isle of Wight. Now, again, Lord Howard gave the order to attack, having previously divided his ships into four squadrons, the first commanded by himself, the second by Sir Francis Drake, who had been appointed vice-admiral, the third by John Hawkins, and the fourth by Martin Frobisher. Hawkins shot ahead at once, his eagle eye having perceived a large Portuguese galleass, disabled in the fight off Portland, dropping behind the rest of the fleet, like a wounded elephant too weak to join the herd. To attack the huge ship, to pick off the wretched slave-rowers at the water's edge man by man, and to make the rest of the crew prisoners, was the work of less than an hour, and although three other galleasses came rushing up at the full speed of their oars to attempt a rescue, the prize remained in the hand of the victors. But in the meanwhile the heavy "Triumph," Frobisher's ship, had got again into difficulties, set upon by several galleons; and but for the ready assistance of a couple of brave little merchantmen, who took her in tow, carrying her swiftly beyond the reach of the Spanish guns, the duke of Medina would have had the satisfaction of seizing the largest vessel of the English navy. As it was, the result of the day's skirmishing was again highly unfavourable to the Armada, a number of transports being captured, besides the great Portuguese galleass. The finest vessel of the Spanish fleet, the "San Martino," flag-ship of the commander-in-chief, would have been taken by Drake and Howard, but for the fatal parsimony of the queen in doling out gunpowder and ammunition to her brave sailors. Already the mainmast of the "San Martino" had been shot away, and most of her rowers killed, when Drake, just before attempting to board the ship, found that he had no powder left. Nearly all the other vessels of the English navy were in the same condition, and, therefore, instead of following up the advantages gained during the day, they had to sneak back in all humility into the shelter of the shore. The next morning, Friday, the 26th of July, Lord Howard held another council of war, in which it was resolved to attack the Spanish fleet no more till having got to the narrowest point of the Straits of Dover. Until that time, a lapse of at least twenty-four hours, her majesty, it was hoped, would take pity upon the defenders of the realm, and let them have some more gunpowder and a few "pellets." The day of Friday, Lord Howard, not being able to shoot Spanish grandees, employed in making English nobles. He knighted

Hawkins, Frobisher, and three other brave sailors, after which, with a fair breeze from the south-west, he followed on the skirts of the great Armada, which went sailing majestically along, close to the shore of England.

Thousands of anxious eyes were watching the gigantic fleet from off the coast of Sussex, and thousands of eager hands were grasping swords and muskets, daggers and lances, oars and paddles to aid in driving back the hated enemy. To see the huge crescent of Spanish ships sailing proudly along, with the English fleet following humbly in the rear, seemingly afraid to meddle with the great foe, filled the multitude on shore with alarm and despair, and wildly patriotic, regardless of everything else but the honour of the country, the people of the coast came rushing on to attack the Armada. From every harbour, from every port, from every creek and every inlet of the sea, vessels great and small, yawls and pinnaces, cobbles, sloops, and fishing-boats, shot forward to have a thrust at the Spaniards. Learning that the English fleet was short of powder and ammunition, the earl of Sussex, Lord Buckhurst, Sir George Carey, and a number of other gentlemen, Catholics as well as Protestants, set to work to procure the necessary supplies from private stores and the forts and castles along the coast, and before the dawn of another day Lord Howard was enabled to follow closer in the rear of the Armada. In the meanwhile all England was in the highest state of excitement. The immense danger threatening the realm, while it heightened the courage of some, filled others with dismay, the silent fear that the government had not done its full duty towards protecting the country having seized many thousand minds. It was evident from the first that the queen vastly underrated the formidable power of the floating armament hurled against England. Neglecting her fleet, the chief bulwark of the kingdom, Elizabeth concentrated all her efforts in gathering and drilling some sixty thousand militiamen for the defence of her own person and of the capital. The queen's body-guard, commanded by her kinsman, Lord Hunsdon, consisted of rather more than one half of this force, mainly raw recruits got together in haste, while the other half, to whom the defence of the metropolis was intrusted, had been put under the orders of the handsome royal favourite, the earl of Leicester. To think of opposing such a vain and silly courtier, whose past career had fully shown his absolute military incapacity, to the most experienced generals of Europe, commanding veterans seasoned on a hundred battle-fields, was a monstrous infatuation approaching to madness, for which the queen might have dearly paid had her people been less patriotic, her sailors been less skilful, and her great sea-rovers been less zealous and daring. Leicester's army was quartered in a camp formed at Tilbury, on the river Thames, opposite Gravesend; and while the Spanish fleet was sailing up the Channel, Elizabeth, with her ladies and gentlemen of honour, amused herself passing these troops in review, and delivering fine orations—greatly praised as models of wisdom by an admiring posterity. What Leicester, the persons of honour, and the orations would have done for England had the grip of the Drakes and the Hawkinses into the flesh of the huge Armada been a little less firm, so as to allow the duke of Medina and the prince of Parma to throw a hundred thousand Spanish veterans against the silken tents of Tilbury, admiring historians have seldom found time to calculate.

Towards the evening of Saturday, the 27th of July, the Spanish fleet cast anchor in the narrowest part of the Strait of Dover, its right wing leaning against Calais Harbour, and the left stretching forth some five miles west, right opposite to Dunge Ness. The object of the duke of Medina in thus suddenly coming to a halt was to put himself into communication with the prince of Parma, who had been anxiously awaiting for more than a month the arrival of the Armada to carry his army of invasion over to the English shore. The month's delay, caused by the tarrying of the great fleet in the harbour of Corunna, had brought a Dutch blockading squadron, commanded by Count Justin of Nassau, a relative of Orange, before Dunkirk and Nieuport; and the mouth of the river Scheldt being likewise closed by Flemish vessels, the prince of Parma found himself shut off from the sea. To reopen the communication, the duke of Medina, immediately after throwing anchor before Calais, despatched messengers to the prince of Parma, inviting him to join the forces under his command with his own. The reply was discouraging in the extreme. The prince informed the commander of the Armada that the boats made to transport his troops into England had become warped and leaky from lying on shore exposed to the sun; that his provisions were all but exhausted through the long delay that had occurred, and that a great portion of his soldiers were suffering from disease, aggravated by want. But notwithstanding these adverse circumstances, Parma promised to get his troops ready for embarkation at Nieuport and Dunkirk in the course of a week or ten days, if receiving proper assistance, including the levying of the blockade. The contents of this important despatch became known immediately, through vigilant Dutch spies, to Lord Howard, who saw that not a moment was to be lost to frustrate the designs of the enemy. He had kept with his fleet within a mile westward of the Armada, hoping to be able to renew the guerilla warfare, and to take advantage of any weak point in the arrangements of the Spanish ships. However, no such opportunity offered, the vessels of the Armada being stationed admirably in close phalanx, knit together in one formidable mass by the towering galleys. Even the boldest of Howard's officers pronounced an open attack out of the question; and opinions were greatly divided as to what should be done next, when Drake proposed a bold scheme for loosening the tight embrace of the floating fortifications. It was a stratagem old as naval warfare, that of sending "fire-ships" into the ranks of the enemy, leaving the wind and the flame to seek its own victims. The proposal was adopted at once, and Drake's men set to work forging new weapons for the destruction of the mighty Armada.

All through Sunday, the 28th of July, the sailors and carpenters laboured energetically to convert eight small barks into "fire-ships." The vessels, stripped of all unnecessary gear, were loaded with resin, pitch, brimstone, and other highly inflammable material, after which volunteers were called for to man them. Scores were anxious to take part in the dangerous task, and the due number being chosen, with two old sailors, Captains Young and Prowse for commanders, all was found to be ready soon after midnight. The wind was not quite favourable at the moment, but as if to favour the action of the fire it shifted in an hour after, and then, near two o'clock in the morning, the order was given to start. Onward went the eight fire-ships through the stillness of the night, every soul on board the great Armada being asleep, save the sentinels pacing the decks. When right among the Spanish ships, Drake's sailors applied their torches, and jumping into their boats, paddled back with all speed to their companions. Another minute, and huge flames went shooting up into the sky, while the quiet of the waters was broken by fierce screams of horror and despair. Drifting along among the big galleys, tossed from one to the other, and carrying death and destruction everywhere, the eight fire-ships in a few moments spread intense terror among the Spanish fleet; the sleepers rushed from their berths, and the slaves rattled their chains, while the voice of the officers seemed powerless to stay the overwhelming fright and disorder. To save themselves from destruction, most of the ships cut their cables and slipped their anchors, attempting to get free of each other, though with but indifferent success. Some were driven ashore near Gravelines, others on the coast of Picardy, and others in Flanders; and in the course of a few hours the proud Armada, the shadow of which but the day before had hung darkening over the realm of England, had been scattered to all the winds. The morning sun of Monday, the 29th of July, rose upon a crowd of big ships flying in every direction, with another crowd of smaller vessels close on their heels. Some of the largest of the galleasses took refuge in the port of Calais, but even thither they were followed by Howard's men, notwithstanding the threatening attitude of the French governor, who directed his cannon upon the English vessels. The daring act so much alarmed the prince of Asculé, son of King Philip, who had hitherto remained in the flag-ship of the duke of Medina, one of the few which had not slipped its anchor, that he went on shore, to despatch couriers to Paris and the Netherlands. Returning in the evening, the flag-ship, too, was gone, and the prince had to embark in a smaller vessel, called "Our Lady of the Rosary." It was a fatal change, resulting in the moody lord of the great Armada never setting eyes again on his much-beloved son.

The duke of Medina Sidonia bore himself bravely during the fatal day of the 29th of July. Helpless to repair the terrible confusion into which his whole fleet had been thrown by the approach of the fire-ships, he made attempts to summon at least the larger of the galleys around him, and to range them in battle order between Calais and Dunkirk. In this he was partly successful; but before he had been able to take up a good position, the wind, which hitherto had been blowing south-west with moderate force, changed into a north-westerly gale, which threatened to throw him upon the dangerous shore of Flanders. The duke now summoned a council of war to deliberate upon the state of the Armada. Two courses offered themselves for consideration: to make further attempts to rally the dispersed ships and effect a union with the prince of Parma, or to sail back to Spain. The latter was unanimously resolved upon by the war council, the general demoralisation and dread of the enemy having spread to such an extent that all despaired of being able to remain any longer on the offensive. The terror which had taken possession of all minds drove the Spanish officers to the further resolution of not returning by way of the Channel, but, to prevent another encounter with the English navy, to sail into the North Sea, and seek the Atlantic again by doubling Scotland and Ireland. Absolute despair only could prompt to the adoption of such a route, the natural dangers of which could not fail to represent themselves, even to sailors as unskilled as the duke of Medina Sidonia, as infinitely more serious than the losses to be encountered in a battle. However, the resolution to risk the utter destruction of the great Armada by a sail round the iron-bound coast of Britain, through waters utterly unknown to Spanish mariners, was no sooner adopted than carried out. On the evening of the day on which the English admiral had sent out his fire-ships, King Philip's fleet—still a mighty fleet, counting, after all the losses suffered, not less than one hundred and twenty sail—was steering northward, a fresh shifting of the wind to the south accelerating its flight. The sight was one to rejoice the hearts of English sailors. "We have the armament of Spayne before us," Drake wrote to Sir Francis Walsingham, on the evening of Monday, the 29th of July, "and I mind, with the grace of God, to wrestle a fall with them. There was never anything pleased me better than the seeing the enemy flying with a south wind to the northwards. God grant you have a good eye to the prince of Parma, for with the grace of God, if we live, I doubt it not but ere it be long so to handle the matter with the duke of Sidonia as he shall wish himself at St. Mary among his orange-trees."

Drake and his companions expected confidently either to annihilate every vessel of the great Armada in its wild course towards the Arctic regions, or to force it to surrender. The task would have offered no vast difficulty but for a repetition of the great evil through which the English navy had lost already so many advantages, the want of powder and shot. Elizabeth continued doling out gunpowder to her sailors as if it had been gold; and while everything was in abundance in the royal camp at Tilbury, where Leicester, thick in velvet and jewelry, assumed the airs of a great conqueror, seemingly impressed with the idea that the Spaniards were keeping out of the river Thames solely in fear of his terrific sword, the men who continued bearing the brunt of the fight, and whose brawny arms were holding the fate of England, got neglected and almost despised. It was the more unwarrantable as the greater part of the fleet which was keeping the Spaniards at bay had been furnished and was maintained at the expense of private gentlemen, merchants, and shipowners, little more being expected from government than the supply of these vessels with arms and ammunition of war. But this was grossly neglected, and the consequences, which twice before the flight of the Armada might have been fatal had there been a true admiral instead of a mere first-class grandee at the head of Philip's fleet, became a fatal detraction of England's glory when witnessed for the third time. Arrived off the coast of Aberdeenshire, distracted by the thought of the perils before him in unknown seas, and beholding the enemy close at his heels, snatching off his stragglers to right and left, the duke of Medina made up his mind to surrender to the English admiral, deeming it better to fall into the hands of honourable adversaries than to encounter the horrors and miseries of shipwreck and death on a foreign shore. The resolution was formed during the second day of the flight, but the duke imparted it to no man but his confessor, who implored him to postpone the execution for at least twenty-four hours, and to attempt to rally his ships during this time. Before the twenty-four hours were gone, the English navy, as if by enchantment, had fallen away from the skirts of the Armada, which once more sailed proudly alone on the northern seas. There was much rejoicing on board the Spanish fleet, the priest declaring the retreat of the enemy to be due to a legion of saints descended from heaven and hovering over the waters—not dreaming of anything so mundane as the want of gunpowder. The duke of Medina fairly thought himself saved; but the confidence was short, for an enemy infinitely more terrible than the English fleet was on the point of spreading his fangs and laying hold of the doomed Armada.

Five days after the departure of the English ships a storm arose, which lasted from four in the afternoon till ten o'clock next morning. It once more scattered the great Armada, the van of which, headed by the flag-ship of the duke of Medina and twenty-seven of the fastest of his galleys, succeeded in rounding the north coast of Scotland, passing by Cape Wrath, while the rest lagged behind, some drifting northward to the Arctic regions, and others cast against the shores of Caithness and Sutherland. When the gale had abated, the ships still able to keep under weigh pursued their course, the direction of the commander-in-chief being that all should try to make for the nearest or readiest harbour of Spain or Portugal. To facilitate their voyage, they threw overboard the whole of their live stock and vast quantities of guns and ammunition, hoping to fly swifter across the waters in their unburdened vessels. But even this precaution proved fatal to many of the huge ships. For ten days the captains groped their way through the unknown seas, tossed hither and thither, but on the eleventh, when the majority of the ships had passed the western islands, and come in sight of the coast of Connaught, a furious gale sprung up once more, threatening every vessel still afloat with instant destruction. The gale lasted, with short interruptions, for nearly a week, strewing the Irish coast with wrecks, and casting but few Spanish sailors ashore to tell the final story of the proud Armada. Their tale, as given in examination before the magistrates, was piteous in the extreme. The deposition of one Joan Antonio, a native of Genoa, made on the 15th of September, furnished a startling picture of misery and suffering. "He saith," the examiners reported, "there were in all seven hundred men in his ship, called 'Our Lady of the Rosary,' at their coming forth; he saith, there were about five hundred in the ship as she sunk: the rest perished by fight and by sickness. He saith, his ship was shot through four times, and one of the shot was between the wind and the water, whereof they thought she would have sunk, and the most of her tackle was spoiled with shot: the ship struck against the rocks in the Sound of the Bleskies, a league and a half from the land, upon Tuesday last at noon, and all in it perished except he, who saved himself upon two or three planks that were loose. He saith, the gentlemen in his ship intended to save themselves by the boat, but found it so fast tied that they could not get it to move." Among the "gentlemen" who thus perished in "Our Lady of the Rosary" was one for whom King Philip mourned deeper than for the loss of his whole Armada—his son, known as the duke of Ascule.

Of this duke of Ascule, the man saved from the wreck, together with other witnesses, gave some interesting particulars. "He saith," the examiners further reported of Joan Antonio, "the prince of Ascule, the king's base son, came in the company of the duke [of Medina Sidonia] in the duke's ship, called the galleon of 'St. Martino,' of a thousand tons; but at Calais, when the English navy came near them, the prince went to the shore, and before his return the duke was driven to cut off his anchors and to depart."

whereby the prince could not recover that ship, but came in the ship called 'Our Lady of the Rosary'; and with him there came in also one Don Pedro, Don Francisco, and seven other gentlemen of account that accompanied the prince. He saith, the captain of this ship was Villa Franca of St. Sebastian's, and Matuta was captain of the infantry of the ship. There were also in her Captain Suares, a Portuguese, and one Garrionero, a Castilian captain; Lopicho de la Vega, a Castilian captain; Captain Montanase, a Castilian; Captain Francisco, a Castilian; and Michael d'Oguendo, who was general of the ship. There was also in the ship an Irish captain called John Risse, about thirty years of age, and another Irishman called Francis Roche. He saith, the prince was of about eight and twenty years of age." Another wrecked sailor, called Antonio de Moneco, cast ashore a couple of days after the native of Genoa from "Our Lady of the Rosary," gave a full description of the personal appearance of King Philip's son. "He saith," his examination ran, "the prince of Asculé was a slender made man, and of a reasonable stature, of twenty-eight years of age; his hair of a brown colour stroked upwards; of a high forehead, a very little beard, marquesotted; whitely-faced, with some little red on the cheeks. He was drowned in apparel of white satin for his doublet and breeches, cut after the Spanish fashion, with russet silk stockings. When the prince came into the ship at Calais, he was apparelled in black raised velvet, laid on with broad gold lace. He saith, that when they were at Calais the prince passed in a little felucca with six others from ship to ship, to give orders." The report that his son had perished, together with twenty thousand of his best sailors and soldiers, was brought to King Philip at the end of September, when the duke of Medina ran into the port of Santander, in the Bay of Biscay, with fifty-three shattered, leaky vessels, manned by half-starved, diseased, ghastly-looking crews, last representatives of the Invincible Armada. For a few days the ministers of Philip hesitated to break to him the terrible news, till one of his favourites, bolder than the rest, undertook to do so. The king was writing despatches when the favourite entered his cabinet; he lifted up his pen, listened quietly to the fearful tale of woe, and then continued his work as if nothing had happened.

Before the shattered remnant of the Armada had found its way into Santander harbour, Elizabeth broke up her camp at Tilbury, discharging the common soldiers, and rewarding the officers. The queen seemed to labour more than ever under the impression that the design of Philip had been frustrated less by her brave sailors than by the army under her own and the earl of Leicester's command, and her rewards were measured out accordingly. While Drake, Hawkins, and all the bold men who had fought with and under them, got barely thanks for the immense success that had crowned their efforts, the handsome earl was treated as if he had been the absolute saviour of the realm. Elizabeth ordered a patent to be made out creating for him the new office of lord-lieutenant of England and Ireland, which invested Leicester with almost royal power, raising him higher than ever an English sovereign had placed a subject. It was enough to frighten Burleigh, and he energetically opposed the wishes of the queen, pleading with so much effect as to induce her to postpone the signature of the patent. But this again greatly offended the favourite, who, to show his anger, withdrew from the court in a huff, without awaiting the completion of the great preparations on hand in the capital for celebrating his triumph as conqueror of the Armada. He left London on the first of September for his splendid seat, Kenilworth Castle, but fell ill on the road, and on the fourth of September expired at Cornbury Park, Oxfordshire—of fever, as stated officially, but of poison administered by his wife, according to the firm belief of the multitude. Elizabeth's grief for the loss of her old favourite, to whom she had been attached for more than thirty years, was remarkably slight. She cried somewhat when she heard of his sudden death; but her next step was to order his effects to be seized and sold by auction, so that she might repay herself for a loan made to him some time before in a fit of generosity. On the whole, the queen seemed rather pleased than otherwise at the exit of the noble earl, for the twofold reason that he was getting visibly old, and that she had enjoyed for some time the society of another favourite, in every way more attractive, in the person of Robert Devereux, earl of Essex. The latter, born in 1567, or just twenty-one years of age, was Leicester's stepson—offspring of that lady whom rumour made his murderess, accusing him in return of having poisoned her first husband, the earl of Essex,—and being early introduced at court, his handsome person and high accomplishments at once attracted the attention of Elizabeth, so that, young as he was, she did not hesitate to lavish upon him all imaginable honours and dignities. In 1587 Essex succeeded his stepfather as master of the horse, and in the year following, while the Armada was sailing along the English coast, the youthful earl was made captain-general of the cavalry, in which capacity he shared with the queen and Leicester the glories of the camp of Tilbury. For his deeds on this occasion Essex was created a knight of the order of the Garter, and Leicester dying soon after, he succeeded him as premier favourite of the queen. Having now arrived at the mature age of fifty-five, Elizabeth was fully old enough to figure as the grandmother of her new darling, yet this did not at all prevent her from toying with him like an amorous maiden of sixteen. Extraordinary as were Elizabeth's high qualities, her weaknesses were scarcely less extraordinary.

The great festival for celebrating the queen's victory over the Armada, long planned, but postponed for some weeks on account of the death of the Tilbury commander-in-chief, was carried out with vast pomp on the 24th of November. On this day, a Sunday, Elizabeth went in procession from Whitehall to St. Paul's Cathedral, seated alone in a triumphal chariot, drawn by milk-white steeds, and preceded and followed by an immense train of glittering courtiers, nobles, judges, public functionaries, pensioners, and halberdiers. Close to the throne-like chariot, which was surmounted by a high canopy raised on pillars, with lions and dragons supporting the royal arms, rode the earl of Essex on a prancing courser, and behind him trotted on foot a long file of ladies of honour, splendidly attired, and not afraid to soil their pretty shoes in the bottomless mud of the metropolis. The whole of the streets in the city through which the procession passed were lined by the guilds with their banners, while the houses were hung with blue cloth, every window from top to basement filled with enthusiastic spectators, anxious to burst in hurrahs for their sovereign. Arrived at the great west door of St. Paul's, the queen descended from her chariot-throne, while the whole of the clergy were singing the litany, and marched under a rich canopy of state to a closet prepared for her near the pulpit-cross. Here the queen listened to a sermon, or rather fulsome address of praise, delivered by Dr. Pierce, bishop of Salisbury; after which she sank on her knees, returning thanks to "the God of battles." The service concluded, her majesty dined with the bishop of London, whose residence adjoined the cathedral, and then returned to Whitehall in the same state she had come, amidst the glare of thousands of torches swung aloft by the city companies. The good Protestants of the capital were fairly beside themselves with loyalty and enthusiasm, and Elizabeth, acting the queen to perfection, raised these feelings to the highest pitch by her manners and behaviour. An eye-witness, Bishop Goodman, living as theological student "in the Strand, near St. Clement's Church," at the royal visit to St. Paul's, left a record of the impression made by Elizabeth upon her faithful subjects. "We stayed an hour and a half," says he, "there being a vast number of torches, when the queen came up in great state. Then we cried, 'God save your majesty!' when the queen turned to us, exclaiming, 'God bless you all, my good people.' Then we cried again, 'God save your majesty!' whereupon the queen said to us, 'Ye may well have a greater prince, but ye shall never have a more loving sovereign.' And so the queen and the crowd there, looking upon one another awhile, her majesty departed. This wrought such an impression upon us, for shows and pageants are best seen by torch-light, that all the way long we did nothing but talk of what an admirable queen she was, and how we would all adventure our lives in her service." None of her predecessors on the throne of England had studied the high art of kingship so well, and to so much advantage, as Queen Elizabeth.

KENILWORTH CASTLE.

Three months after the queen's triumphal procession to St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 14th of February, 1589, a new parliament assembled at Westminster. It had been called together chiefly for the purpose of voting supplies, the royal exchequer being in a very exhausted state; but the first meetings showed that the representatives of the people did not mean to resign themselves entirely to play the passive part of tax-imposers. The great truth proclaimed to all the world by the Dutch Protestants, that princes exist for their subjects and not subjects for the princes, was penetrating more and more the heart of the people of Protestant England, and exhibited itself strikingly in the parliament of 1589. Before entertaining the great question of supplies which had brought them to Westminster, the majority of the new members commenced the session with the discussion of a subject which sounded ominous to Elizabeth's ears—the "redress of grievances." The list of these was long and almost interminable, the one which presented itself in the first instance, though not being the most important, occupying several weeks. This was the ancient royal prerogative known as the right of purveyance, which enabled the officers and servants of the crown to levy provisions at a fixed rate, and to make use of the horses and carts of the agricultural population whenever they thought fit to do so. The rates, fixed centuries before, were merely nominal; and the whole privilege, liable as it was to endless abuse, was little else than a species of serfdom for a large portion of the people. Nevertheless, the queen got exceedingly angry on the commons beginning to discuss her right of purveyance, and peremptorily ordered them, in a message delivered by Burleigh, not to touch her royal prerogative. If there were any abuses, the message stated, either in imposing purveyance, or in the practice of carrying it out, her majesty was both willing and able to provide due reformation, but would not permit the parliament to meddle in matters far above its sphere. A few members found courage to remonstrate strongly against this right royal view of the functions of parliament, yet they were not backed sufficiently by the feebler spirits; in the end it was resolved to decide upon nothing, but to send a deputation to the queen. This was all that Elizabeth wanted. She received the deputation in the most gracious manner, assuring the members of her "great inestimable loving care" towards her faithful subjects, asserting, with an oath, that her solicitude for her people was "greater than of her own self, or even than any of them could have of themselves." She told them, moreover, that she had already, long before the meeting of parliament, given orders for an inquiry into the abuses attending purveyance, but that the dangers of the threatened Spanish invasion had impeded her design, for the execution of which now not another day should be lost. To such arguments, coming from royal lips, alternately threatening and coaxing, the commons had no reply; and the issue of the matter was the same as that of all previous contests between the queen and her parliaments. Wishing to atone for their little rebellion like good children, the representatives of the people, who but a moment before had got eloquent over the exceeding poverty of the tax-paying population, voted the queen two subsidies instead of one, and then separated to their homes, kindly dismissed by a speech from the throne.

During the short parliamentary session the warlike mood of the people, engendered by the defeat of the Armada, had risen to the highest pitch. The government did all in its power to discourage it, Burleigh especially feeling with increasing age the blessings of peace, and the wisdom of maintaining it whenever possible; however, the fever which had seized the nation was too violent to be kept under, and there was no remedy but to let it burst forth. At first the aim of the popular leaders who clamoured for war, chief among whom were Drake, Hawkins, Raleigh, and Essex, was somewhat undecided; but it settled gradually in the determination of wresting from the lord of the Armada the jewel of his crown which of all others he prized most, the kingdom of Portugal. The scheme offered considerable chances of success, inasmuch as Philip held the country by mere physical force, being hated by the people, who had lost their ancient liberties under the Spanish occupancy, and declared themselves anxious to be again placed under the rule of the descendant of their old kings, Don Antonio, a refugee in England since the year 1580. Poor Don Antonio, a quiet unassuming old gentleman, had been treated for years with woful neglect by Elizabeth, who, not forgetting the importance of his person for political objects, contented herself with doling out to him a few meagre alms, just sufficient to keep him alive. Brought into prominence now by the openly-expressed desire of the nation to make war upon Spain, the queen altered her demeanour towards the royal refugee, and inviting him to court, treated him as a real king. At the same time, she signified to Drake and his friends her pleasure at their patriotic intentions, and her concurrence in the scheme prepared by them, stating her readiness to assist them in every way, except in giving them money. "She was too poor," Elizabeth declared, "to bear the burthen of war herself; but her brave subjects were welcome to fit out an armament for the liberation of Portugal from the Spanish yoke, provided they would do it at their own expense." This was just to the taste of Drake and his companions, who, full of the spirit of their age, their training, and their profession, could not think of anything more glorious than a buccancer expedition for conquering a kingdom, and one of the richest kingdoms, too, of the civilized world. They set to work at once with immense energy to collect sailors, troops, ships, arms, ammunition, and, above all, money. The cash flowed in freely, and all the rest was easy; even Elizabeth thought the speculation so good that she invested sixty thousand pounds on her private account. In the spring of 1589, before the parliament, of which Drake with his friends took very little notice, had been dismissed, everything was ready for conquering the kingdom of Portugal by public subscription.

The common fund was found sufficient to raise sixteen thousand volunteers, and engage a fleet of nearly two hundred small vessels, which set sail from Plymouth on the 14th of April, Drake figuring as admiral, and Sir John Norris, famous for his failures in the Netherlands, as commander-in-chief of the land forces. Before starting, Drake in his flag-ship was joined by Don Antonio, who embarked in great state as king of Portugal, his new friends having fitted him out with a full stock of ermined robes, gilded head-coverings, and other upholstery things needful for the maintenance of royalty. The two hundred little vessels were not found sufficient at the last moment to hold all the eager volunteers who wished to join Drake, and a number of them having been left behind at Plymouth, they forcibly seized some ships of the Hanse Towns, turned out the crews, and started in the wake of their friends. All England for the time seemed in the throes of the war fever, and there was scarce a youth in any of the seaport towns who did not wish to leave his home and sail for the golden land of Portugal. Even Essex, the queen's favourite, upon whom honours, dignities, and riches were flowing down in constant showers, could not withstand the temptation of running away from his courtly paradise. Elizabeth had strictly forbidden him to join the expedition; but it had no sooner started from Plymouth when he broke loose from his soft bondage, and chartering on his own account a fast-sailing vessel, called the "Swift-sure," made off to the south, every inch of canvas set. The queen got into a terrible state of excitement at the news that her darling had made his escape, and at once despatched the earl of Huntingdon after him; yet Essex was already beyond the reach of pursuit, and in a few days joined the fleet of the adventurers, while crossing the Bay of Biscay. When Essex arrived, a cloud had already fallen over the prospects of the expedition. Drake's ships had been becalmed for several days, and being insufficiently and hastily fitted out, were short of provisions; but, what was worse than this was, that in consequence of it the two commanders had fallen out and were engaged in a hot quarrel. The original plan of the undertaking, as laid down by Drake, Hawkins, and Raleigh, was to achieve victory at one great stroke, by pushing up the Tagus and seizing the capital of Portugal. It was the best scheme possible, for the twofold reason that Lisbon contained more friends of Don Antonio and more enemies of Philip than any other town of Portugal, and that, besides, the possession of the capital involved to a great extent the possession of the kingdom. However, Sir John Norris, appointed to his high post at the desire of the queen, insisted when the fleet was nearing the coasts of Spain, that on account of their want of provisions the plan settled upon beforehand should not be carried out, and that instead of going direct to the mouth of the Tagus they should sail, in the first instance, to the nearer seaport of Corunna, or the Greynne, where they would find abundance of food and stores. Most unwillingly, and entirely against his own better knowledge, Drake was forced to give way, compelled as much by the persistence of Norris as the clamour of his republican crews, to whom the question of victuals was one of all-absorbing importance. Acquiescing in these views, well knowing that want of discipline was one of the drawbacks to the pleasure of conquering kingdoms by private subscription, the admiral altered his course for the Greynne, and on the first of May cast anchor in the Bay of Ferrol, in sight of the famous Tower of Hercules.

If personal bravery alone could have insured the success of the expedition, it could not have failed to be achieved. Corunna was strongly defended on all sides, and garrisoned by some of the best troops of Spain; but leaving everything out of account but the promptings of their courage, the English volunteers had no sooner come in sight of the shore when they insisted on being led to battle. The earl of Essex was the first to land, stalking through the surf sword in hand, the waves reaching up to his neck; and followed by a gallant company of friends and associates, he chased the Spanish troops who had come to oppose his landing by the mere daring of his act, which they looked upon as that of some demon of the sea. Under the weight of this first impression, the soldiers of Philip evacuated the lower town of Corunna, and were defeated with great loss in a pitched battle at Puento de Burgos, one of the main entrances to the upper town. But here the tide of fortune suddenly turned. Being without heavy artillery to effect a breach, and the rocky foundation of the upper town resisting all attempts to conquer it by mining, Sir John Norris saw when it was too late his folly of throwing himself with his volunteers upon a strong fortress; and to remedy his error if possible, he now proposed to fall into Drake's plan and sail for Lisbon. The decision had scarcely been arrived at when a pestilential disorder, aggravated by dearth of food, broke out in the English camp, and before the troops could be re-embarked nearly one-fifth of them had to be buried on Spanish soil. The plague continued on board ship, and when the Tagus was reached at last the spirit of the volunteers, broken alike by want, disease, and failure, had sunk so low as to make success all but impossible. Drake had told his colleague in command, when insisting that the expedition should first turn upon Corunna, that this would give time to King Philip to fortify Lisbon beyond reach of a surprise, and his prediction was found but too true when the fleet arrived in the Tagus. A month before, the road by water into the capital of Portugal had been entirely open; but now formidable batteries were planted along the shore on each side of the river, making the attempt to force a passage all but madness. The only means remaining to get to Lisbon was to attack it from the land side, and to do so the expedition sailed again northward, throwing anchor in the harbour of Peniche, about forty miles from the capital. Undaunted as ever, though nearly breaking down under sickness, want, and fatigue, the volunteers, headed by Sir John Norris, marched forward by way of Torres Vedras to Lisbon, and actually reached the gates of the city, but only to see that its capture was absolutely hopeless, defended as it was by a powerful army, abundantly supplied with war material, while they themselves were almost without cannon. The terror of the English name alone prevented Philip's soldiers from striding forth and annihilating the handful of men who had dared to invade the country; and so great was their awe, that they did not stir from their fastness, allowing the pale, plague and hunger-stricken foreigners to creep back to the ships. Nothing remained now for Drake and his volunteers but to return to England, which they did accordingly, though not till after they had disgraced themselves by plundering several open towns on the Portuguese coast. At last, after five months' absence, Drake cast anchor once more in Plymouth Harbour, landed the poor old Portuguese gentleman with all his royal trappings, and then proceeded to make out his death-list. He found that of the sixteen thousand men that had sailed with him not less than seven thousand had been buried on the shore of Spain, or let down, with upturned face, a bullet in their winding-sheet, to the bottom of the sea.

Elizabeth, against all expectation, did not show any anger at the fatal ending of the expedition, but received the unhappy leaders in a very friendly manner, going so far as to present Drake, Raleigh, and others who had personally distinguished themselves, with gold chains as marks of her favour. Her good-humour appeared to some to be mainly owing to the pleasure of seeing her beloved favourite again safe and sound; but there was a deeper cause, more worthy of the queen, in the fact that in the interval in which the expedition had taken place she had ceased to care much for the humiliation of the king of Spain, and had her whole attention directed towards the events that were taking place in France. These events, indeed, were as striking as important. The long struggle between the old faith and the new religion had come at length to a climax, and to all appearance a few months more, if not a few days, were to decide whether France was to be ruled for the future by a Catholic majority, imbued with strong physical force and full of the traditions of bygone ages, or by a Protestant minority representing the loftier moral aspirations and finer intellect of the nation. The mighty contest between the rival creeds had gone through some extraordinary phases during the time that the shadow of the great Armada was passing over England. After the duke of Guise, head of the Catholic League, had driven Henri III. from Paris, an assembly of the estates of the kingdom was called together at Blois to frame a new constitution and settle the laws of succession. The weak and imbecile king, a mere cipher in the government, having no children and representing the last of the line of Valois, the question mainly agitated between the two great religious and political parties dividing France was whether the crown should devolve, in the natural course of succession, to Henry of Navarre, or whether, he being a Protestant, it should fall upon another head, elected by the representatives of the people and confirmed by the head of the Catholic church. Simple as was the question, it had brought about already a singular complication of political and religious interests, the orthodox Roman Catholics becoming, in their zeal for religion, upholders of republican doctrines, and the democratic Huguenots making themselves, for the love of their brave leader, Henry of Navarre, champions of ultra-monarchical doctrines. According to the principles laid down by the chiefs of the Catholic League, and adhered to seemingly by the mass of the French people, as far as they could express their opinions, it was indispensable that the head of the state should be at all times head of the national religion, and the heir apparent of the crown being a dissenter, his claim lapsed "ipso facto," leaving to national sovereignty the right of filling the vacancy of the throne. In reply to this, the Huguenots, with whom were united the defenders of strict legitimacy, chiefly enrolled under the banner of the moderate Catholics or "politicians," maintained that by the ancient law of France there could not be any vacancy of the crown as long as there were heirs, direct or collateral, the maxim at all times being "le roi est mort: vive le roi!" The dispute was clearly one not to be settled by discussion, seeing the greatness of the interests involved; and the estates of Blois had not been assembled a week before it became apparent that their meeting was but the prelude of another great civil war. The contest, as had often before happened in France, was accelerated by the dagger of the assassin.

When seizing the sovereign power and driving Henri III. from his capital, the duke of Guise committed the vast imprudence to leave his weak and despised antagonist still the title of king, against the advice of Bernardino de Mendoza, who warningly told him that "subjects who draw the sword against their sovereign must throw the scabbard away." The counsel was neglected, for Guise not only kept the scabbard at his side, but put his sword into it again, and Henri III., false and cat-like as his mother, was not long in taking advantage of the terrible blunder. On the invitation of the head of the Catholic League, the king repaired to Blois to be present at the deliberation of the estates of the realm, almost entirely composed of the adherents of Guise. Being in the midst of his own friends, the duke felt so secure as to neglect even the ordinary precautions of safety, and hating him as much as his weak soul could feel hatred, Henri III. thought this a favourable opportunity for ridding himself of his great enemy. On the morning of the 23rd of December, 1588, Guise attended as usual the meeting of the council of ministers, all his own friends, when in the midst of their deliberations a message arrived from the king, summoning the duke to the royal presence. Guise obeyed without the least suspicion; but he had no sooner passed the short gallery which separated the council-chamber from the apartments of Henri, when he was pounced upon by half a dozen soldiers of the royal body-guard, and after a desperate resistance slain on the spot. The deed was witnessed by the king, who watched it through a hole in the wall from his well-secured cabinet, and seeing his great antagonist lifeless on the ground, rushed forth to rejoice in his victory. Kicking the dead body with his foot, he exclaimed exultingly: "Now, I am king again!" He then fell into a contemplative mood: "Mon Dieu, qu'il est grand! Il paroist encore plus grand mort que vivant." Full of frenzy inspired by terror, the king next rushed from one end of the palace to the other, brandishing a dagger, and screaming, "Morte la bête! Morte la bête!" At length he came to his mother's room, situated immediately below that in which the duke of Guise had been assassinated. Catherine de Medici was lying ill in bed, suffering from the gout; she had heard the struggling overhead, the cries for help, and the heavy thump on the floor, but all her inquiries as to what was going on had met with no reply, her attendants assuming an air of absolute ignorance. At last her son burst into the room. "Madame," Henri cried, full of bravado, "this morning I have made myself king of France: I have killed the king of Paris!" "Malheureux!" screamed Catherine, "the dagger which has fallen upon the king of Paris will spring back upon the king of France." Uttering these prophetic words, the terrible woman who had ruled France for thirty years sank back upon her pillow. Twelve days after, on the 5th of January, 1589, Catherine de Medici was a corpse.

The assassination of the duke of Guise, which was followed by that of his brother the cardinal de Guise, likewise massacred by the king's guards, created the most tremendous excitement throughout the whole of France. In Paris, where the popularity of the duke had been highest, the people appeared almost mad with grief and fury, vast crowds parading the streets night and day, kneeling before pictures of Guise as before a saint, and heaping curses upon his royal murderer. The priests did their best to keep up this excitement by preaching violent sermons against the enemies of the Catholic League, the effect of which was that before many weeks were gone a popular army had arisen ready to tear the king to pieces, and to appoint as his successor any member of the house of Guise. Henri III. was utterly amazed by the tumult engendered through the scene enacted at the palace of Blois. For years, before and after the great night of St. Bartholomew, murders and assassinations had become so very common in the kingdom reposing under his sceptre, that he did not for a moment imagine the stabs directed against the two brothers Guise would make much noise; and the news, therefore, that the friends of the slain men were raising an army against him took him completely by surprise. He would not have believed in the reality of the thing, but that daily reports told him the army of the League was coming nearer and nearer; till at last, at the beginning of March, the sound of the cannon against the walls of Blois announced that the revengers had arrived. Henri fled in great haste, scarce knowing where to go, hesitating between the fortified places of Bourges and Moulins, and finally throwing himself into Tours. But even here, approaching closely the territory occupied by the Huguenots, the king was not safe, and another week showed him that he had no choice left to save his head but to fly from France, or to beseech the assistance of those heretics whose persecution had been the chief feature of his reign. The king hesitated not, but sending a messenger to Henry of Navarre implored him to come to his aid against the Catholic rebels. Twenty-four hours after receiving the summons the Huguenot prince was at Tours, face to face with the king of France, telling him to be of good cheer, and to let the crown of the kingdom rest for awhile upon Protestant swords. The words and the whole appearance of Henry of Navarre—or, as his foes called him, mockingly, "the Bearnaise," as native and sovereign of the province of Bearn—made a deep impression on the feeble monarch, who since he had lost his mother was drifting about helplessly like a feather in the storm. As the Bearnaise stood before him, a long scarlet mantle thrown over his heavy steel armour, and his keen grey eyes looking out smilingly from under his wide slouched hat, the wretched king, trembling for his life, felt as if this was the only man left whom he could trust, and he unhesitatingly threw himself into his arms. Being successor to the crown, as well as leader of a great party, the Huguenot prince now proposed a plan to King Henri distinguished for its simplicity. It was that of marching upon Paris, of calling out the troops of the Catholic League, and of re-establishing the fallen royal power by encouraging industry, protecting all good citizens, and hanging all bad, peace-disturbing priests and monks. Henri III. accepted the proposal, the energy of his heir having imbued him with never-known enthusiasm; and at the beginning of May, 1589, while Drake was preparing to wrest Portugal from King Philip, a Huguenot army went tramping along the dusty highway from Tours to Paris to install the first Protestant sovereign of France.

Henry of Navarre did not find the road from Tours to Paris entirely open, but he had little difficulty to cleave his way. After defeating the duke of Mayenne, younger brother of the murdered Guise, and his successor as chief of the Catholic League, in several battles, and storming a number of fortified places, he found his progress unencumbered, and in the evening of the 30th of July had reached the hill of St. Cloud, looking down upon the capital of France. Within the city there was intense consternation. Since the night of the St. Bartholomew massacre the name of Huguenot had become a by-word in Paris, expressive of horror no less than of fear, the guilty consciences of the rabble who had partaken in the frightful scenes of murder trembling at the idea that retaliation might reach them some day. The priests had given them absolution from sin and punishment in the world to come; but there was no guarantee that the hard steel of earthly Huguenot swords would not reach their throats, or the lash of heretic provosts not be felt by their backs. Thus when the Bearnese approached the gates of the capital the despair was great, and when his stalwart soldiers were actually seen from the walls, universal fear and discouragement seized the people. The train bands, foremost in the work of carnage during the dread Bartholomew night, were the first to refuse service; and when, on the morning of the 31st of July, the Huguenots had taken possession of all the villages round Paris, and were making preparations for a storm, the general cry of the mob was for a capitulation. To the priests and the chiefs of the League this sounded like a death-knell, rousing them to a last supreme effort. They were fully aware that their dispirited, demoralized followers could not withstand the Huguenots for a moment, and to save themselves they resolved to have recourse once more to assassination. At a secret meeting, held at the residence of the duke of Mayenne, it was decided to murder both the king and Henry of Navarre, and to accept the services of two monks of the Dominican order, dwelling in the convent of the Rue Saint Jacques, who had offered their daggers for the purpose. The king, as the most important personage, was to be the first victim, a monk named Clement, a former soldier, undertaking to despatch him. On the evening of the 31st of July, Clement had a long interview with the duke, and afterwards with the duchess his wife, who hated Henri III. with fierce violence, arising from personal motives. The duchess promised Clement a cardinal's hat, and, moreover, as stated by contemporary writers, granted him "ce qu'il y avait de plus capable de tenter un moine débauché."

It was late at night when the monk left Paris, a poisoned dagger hidden in the sleeve of his coat, and his pockets full of forged letters, purporting to be from friends of the king, who wished to open the gates of the city to him and his troops. Arrived at the outposts of the besieging army, Clement delivered his letters, and was led for temporary accommodation into a guard-house, where he was closely watched till the next day, the 1st of August. In the meanwhile the letters—very clever fabrications—did their work. The king, in concert with Henry of Navarre, had resolved to take Paris by storm on the 2nd of August; but the liberal offer of his pretended adherents of opening the gates of the capital made him waver, and he entreated his Huguenot protector to postpone the assault. To this the Bearnese would not consent without having good proofs that the proposed capitulation was made in all sincerity, to get which he ordered the bearer of the message to be strictly questioned. The monk was proof to all interrogations, talked little, assumed a mysterious air, and wound up by saying that he had a great secret to communicate, but could tell it to none but the king himself. This being reported to Henri, he desired that the Dominican should be brought into his presence. Clement accordingly was led into the royal cabinet, where the king was standing surrounded by a number of the officers of his life-guard. Assuming an air of the deepest humility, the monk now begged to be allowed to whisper a few words into the ear of his majesty, stating that he was sworn to communicate his secret to him alone. The royal officers strongly opposed this demand; but Henri, whose curiosity was deeply aroused, insisted upon listening to what the holy messenger had to tell him. Stepping forward a few paces, the king bent his ear to the Dominican, but almost at the same instant uttered a short, sharp cry, and fell to the ground. Clement had drawn the dagger from his sleeve and plunged it into the stomach of the king, close to the navel. "Ah, le meschant moine, il m'a tué!"—Oh, the false monk, he has killed me!—Henri exclaimed, and then fainted. Some of the officers, with more zeal than wisdom, at once drew their swords, rushed upon the Dominican, and hacked him to pieces, while others lifted up their bleeding master. After a while the king recovered consciousness, and his physicians having examined the wound pronounced that it did not appear dangerous, not having touched any vital parts. They did not count upon the dagger being poisoned; but Henri suspected it, and at once told the prince of Navarre, who was standing at his bedside, that he was dying. With more earnestness and dignity than he had ever shown in the course of his kingly career, he next desired that all the members of the government and the chief dignitaries of the court should assemble around him; and they having taken their places at the foot of his couch, he proceeded to administer to them a solemn oath that they would accept Henry of Navarre as his successor. "I beg you as my friends," he exclaimed, "and I order you as your king, that you will recognize after my death my brother whom you see there—mon frère que voilà—as your sovereign; and I desire that, both for my satisfaction and your duty, you tender him at once the oath as subjects." The dying king stretched forth his hand, grasping that of the Huguenot prince, whereupon all the bystanders sank on their knees, tendering the oath of homage to Henry of Navarre. A few hours after, and the last monarch of the race of Valois—a race which had given thirteen kings to France, in the space of two hundred and sixty years—had ceased to breathe.

The sudden death of Henri III. was a great misfortune to the Huguenot cause. France was far from being prepared to accept a Protestant king, however legitimate his claim to succession, and however great his personal merits—claims and merits alike sinking into nothingness when balanced against fierce bigotry and the superstition of ages. Henry of Navarre was fully aware of the strength of the elements opposing his accession; and deeming it indispensable to increase his party before fighting his way to the throne, he entered at once into negotiation with the more moderate of his antagonists. He was driven to this step the more readily, as a few hours had sufficed to show him the extent to which his recent successes had depended upon the spell of ancient royalty which had clung to his weak and helpless predecessor. The morning of the 2nd of August had been appointed for the storm of the capital; but when the sun arose over Paris, four hours after the death of the last of the Valois, the new king found that the army which was to make the assault was in a state of dissolution. His own trusty Huguenots formed but the kernel of the vast cohort prepared to scale the walls of the great city, and they alone appeared inclined to remain attached to him, while all the rest took to flight. Even the men who had sworn fealty to him in the hand of the expiring monarch seemed to forget their oath in the general consternation that seized the army when the death of Henri III. became known; and twelve hours after the event, the besieging force under the walls of Paris, instead of being able to make an attack, had to prepare for the defence. The situation of Henry of Navarre would have been desperate but for the cool courage which animated himself and his Huguenots. While entering into negotiations with his opponents, Henry at the same time despatched an envoy to a body of Swiss mercenaries who had been fighting under his orders, paid by the late king, but who seemed doubtful now whether it would not be better to join the Catholic League, as the surer paymaster. It was known to all that the Bearnese and his friends were poor men, not possessing much else in the world but their Bibles, their good swords, and their stout hearts and arms; nevertheless, the Swiss allowed themselves to be persuaded to throw in their fortune with that of the new king, trusting that, if not at once, he would pay them at some time or other. This decision all but saved Henry of Navarre from being taken a prisoner by the troops of the League. On the 3rd of August, the day after the death of the king, they made an attack upon his camp; but he beat them with the help of his Swiss auxiliaries, and then prepared for the retreat which had become unavoidable. Not to give it the appearance of a flight, he kept the royal standard aloft for five days longer, and then, on the morning of the 8th August, marched slowly off to the north, carrying with him the corpse of his murdered predecessor. After depositing the body of Henri III. in the abbey of St. Corneille, at Compiègne, the king parted his army, now amounting, including the Swiss mercenaries, to about twenty thousand men, into three divisions, and directing the left wing upon Rouen and Havre, and the right upon Boulogne, he himself with the centre started for Dieppe. His plan of campaign was to take possession of the sea-board all along the Channel, so as to be able to keep up an uninterrupted communication both with England and the Netherlands. To England's queen and people Henry of Navarre looked above all others to help him to put the crown of France on his head.

Unwilling as Elizabeth ever was to enter into war, she could not help assisting Henry. It was not merely that the cause of the Huguenots excited the sympathy of all England, but there were the gravest political reasons for opposing the progress of the party standing out against the legitimate claimant of the French crown. For years the Catholic League had been little else but the tool of King Philip, who had paid regular salaries to the duke of Guise and the other principal leaders; and the murder of Henri III., so far from loosening the ties connecting him with the priestly party, increased them to such an extent as to induce him to become a claimant of the crown of France. The claim, put forward in the name of his eldest daughter, offspring of his marriage with the sister of the last of the Valois, was all but an absurdity, inasmuch as the fundamental law of the French monarchy excluded the succession of females; but this did not prevent the chiefs of the League from giving in, more or less openly, their adhesion to his pretended title. Philip, in reality, was the only serious counter-king whom the Roman Catholic faction could hope to oppose, with any chance of success, to Henry of Navarre, there being no other claimants of the crown possessed of the shadow of a title, save a poor old priest, the cardinal of Bourbon, who was kept in safe custody by the Huguenots. Under these circumstances, to assist Henry of Navarre meant but to make war upon Spain; on a field of all others the most important to England; and reluctant as Elizabeth was to risk either her gold or the blood of her subjects, she felt the absolute necessity of spending her last coin and her last soldier in keeping Philip from the throne of France. She received an envoy from Henry at the moment when he was burying his predecessor at Compiègne, and with unusual alacrity promised at once to let him have some money, arms, and ammunition. Neither arrived a moment too soon. Henry had taken possession of Dieppe on the last day of August, and established communication with his friends at La Rochelle and the Protestants of the Netherlands; but he had not more than eight thousand soldiers under his command, and the army of the League, increased by Spanish auxiliaries despatched by the prince of Parma, and numbering above forty thousand fighting men, was close at his heels. At Paris, his retreat to the sea-board was considered a flight, and his cause so hopeless, that when the duke of Mayenne, commander of the Catholic army, left the capital, he issued a proclamation engaging to bring "the Bearnese" as a prisoner to the Bastille in the course of a week. It was when Mayenne and his forty thousand had come to within a few leagues of Dieppe that Henry got the first instalment of the succours promised by Elizabeth, consisting of a sum of twenty-two thousand pounds.

Small as was the amount, the poor king was overjoyed at the receipt of it, frankly confessing to the English envoy that he had never seen so much gold in all his life.

A few days after he had received the money, on the 24th of September, 1589, Henry had the intense gratification of seeing twelve hundred English volunteers arrive at Dieppe, which raised his confidence to such a pitch that he resolved to take the field at once against Mayenne, although the forces of the latter were still more than four times as numerous as his own. At the foot of the castle of Arques, where the king had taken up a strong position, the two armies met, and after a tough struggle, which lasted, with short interruptions, for twenty hours, Mayenne had to beat a retreat. The victory, on Henry's part, was not very decisive, but it had a prodigious effect throughout the whole of France. From the accounts spread by the partisans of the Catholic League, the people expected the capture or annihilation of the king and all his adherents as an absolute certainty, and the battle of Arques so much surprised the ignorant multitude of the large towns as to cause a complete panic. Henry took advantage of it by marching straightway upon Paris; and on the last day of October he once more found himself on the hill of St. Cloud, looking down upon the capital of France. His intention was to make himself master of the city by surprise, but his design was frustrated by the watchfulness of the priests, his old enemies; and after holding the suburbs for a week, and seeing the hopelessness of storming the inner fortifications, he marched onward to Tours. From thence he made his way into Normandy, capturing Argentan, Domfront, Falaise, Evreux, and other strong places, the English volunteers distinguishing themselves everywhere by their undaunted courage. Various reinforcements, amounting on the whole to about three thousand men, had in the meanwhile come from England, encouraging the king to try once more the fortune of open battle with his enemy. Mayenne, after his rout at Arques, had been hovering about in the north of France, in communication with the prince of Parma; but pretending to fall again upon the capital, Henry succeeded in attracting him towards it, and on the 14th of March, 1590, the king found himself a second time face to face with the army of the Catholic League. The struggle that ensued was frightful, although the number of men on both sides was comparatively small. Henry had not more than eleven thousand troops under his command, eight thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and the Catholics about double the number, but each side fought with a courage approaching frenzy. From early morn till late at night the white plume of the Huguenot king, which he had stuck on the top of his helmet, a mark for his foes as well as his friends, waved in the thickest of the battle; more than once the ranks of the royalists broke under the terrific onset of the soldiers of the League, but again and again Henry rallied them, till at last the troops of Mayenne streamed backward in wild disordered flight, leaving nearly half their number on the field of battle. The victory was the most complete ever gained by the Protestants of France over their enemies.

The important events that were taking place in the neighbouring country absorbed completely the attention of Elizabeth's government. It was only after the great Armada had been shattered in the northern seas that the queen awoke to the full sense of the immense danger that had hung over England, and that, losing all her old trust in diplomacy, she resolved to face King Philip henceforth in no other way than sword in hand. After the failure of Drake's expedition to Portugal, there were rumours that Philip was making preparations for another invasion of England; but the better information of Burleigh's and Walsingham's spies soon proved that this was not the case, and that all his efforts for the moment were concentrated upon strengthening his influence in France, with the view of adding the crown of the Valois to his own. There was not a statesman in the councils of Elizabeth, Catholic or Protestant, who doubted that Philip would seek revenge, some day or other, for the loss of his great fleet; that he must be fought with somewhere was absolutely certain, and all agreed that it would be best to make France the battle-field. Thus the English government watched with a keen interest the career of the noble and illustrious knight-errant, styling himself Henry IV., who, with his stanch Huguenots, was struggling to grasp the blood-stained crown which the dagger of a Dominican monk had left vacant. As usual, Elizabeth was not in haste to part either with her money or her soldiers; and it was not until she had positive information that Philip was ready to enter into a death contest with Henry of Navarre for the French crown that she resolved upon openly throwing her sword into the balance on the side of the Huguenots. In the spring of 1590, immediately after the battle of Ivry, she concluded a regular treaty of alliance with Henry, stipulating to send an army to his aid, as well as to despatch a fleet to the coast of Brittany, where the Spaniards were expected to land. The first instalment of the English forces, numbering about three thousand men, under Lord Willoughby, an officer of some experience, arrived soon after, and more were promised. Elizabeth was importuned by the earl of Essex, now in higher favour than ever, to place him at the head of the army which was to hold France against the Spaniards, but she refused, although he kept kneeling at her feet for hours. Getting wiser by experience, the queen seemed to have become aware at last that her handsome favourites were not necessarily great commanders of men.

Henry scarcely profited by the arrival of the English auxiliaries. The great victory of Ivry had laid the road to Paris open to him; but instead of following up his advantage immediately, he lost more than two weeks at Mantes, for no other purpose than that of making love to a beautiful lady, Antoinette de Pons, dame de la Roche Guyon. The brave Huguenots, accustomed as they were to the gallantries of their princely leader, were scandalized at his behaviour in this perilous emergency, and demanded with loud cries to be led against the capital. Thus constrained, Henry broke away at last from the enchanting siren—about the fiftieth to whom he had sworn love unto death—and in slow stages marched upon Paris, taking possession of the suburbs of St. Antoine and St. Martin on the 7th of May. Five weeks before, the city gates had stood open to receive the victorious army of Ivry.

but now they were closed, with priests and monks patrolling on the walls. For the first time since the rise of the Huguenots, the fanaticism of the priests had impelled them to forget their calling to the extent of taking up arms; fearing the Parisians would capitulate, they had thrown off their cassocks, armed themselves with rusty swords and muskets, and formed themselves into a regiment, choosing for commander the bishop of Senlis, a stout prelate, with a fine development of muscle. For a few days the citizens laughed on seeing the monkish regiment parade the streets, with crucifixes carried aloft as banners, and rosaries slung across their guns. The firing of the priests was bad enough, destructive only to themselves; nevertheless the example took effect upon the lower classes, and in another week sixty thousand men had sworn on the host to defend the capital against the heretic king or to die the death of martyrs. The people kept their oath as never fanatics did. Henry had no sooner arrived before the city when he enclosed it strictly on all sides, deeming it more politic to force the people into surrender through want of food than to establish his government by bloodshed. But the king, himself wonderfully free from bigotry, little knew what was seething in the hot cauldron before his eyes, in the minds of the two hundred thousand human beings shut up within the narrow walls of the capital. There were scarcely any provisions in the city; but the people resolutely prepared themselves to die of hunger till relief should come from without. Nearly all the corn, flour, and meat was exhausted in the first fortnight of the siege, and then, the beginning of June having arrived, recourse was had to such unusual food as the flesh of horses, dogs, and cats. This, too, came to an end in another fortnight, when rats, mice, and other vermin were seized eagerly and devoured with avidity, together with thistles, nettles, and blades of grass growing between the stones in the lesser thoroughfares. All the while the priests and monks were feasting well, having laid by good stores in the immense granaries of their convents; but fearing now that the people would attack them, they distributed a small portion, taking care, however, to give to none but well-armed men, and preaching in all the churches and at every street corner the new doctrine, that of all martyrs going to heaven none were so acceptable to God as those that had died of hunger. Thus the end of July arrived, and with it horrors of horrors. The streets were strewn with skeleton-like corpses, frightful to look at; and the ghastly rumour spread everywhere that the living had commenced to eat the dead. It was on the suggestion of Bernardino de Mendoza, worthy ambassador of King Philip, that experiments were made to crush the bones of the dead in mortars, so as to convert them into flour; and this once commenced, the starving wretches threw themselves like vultures on the disgusting food, eating the corpses entire. But even this was not the climax of horrors. There were vague stories afloat—all but incredible—of mothers having killed and devoured their own infants; of whole families subsisting upon the corpses of their relatives. Every one that had tasted the nameless food perished soon after; and yet "Mendoza's mortar" continued its work, and the citizens, all but unanimously, refused to surrender. Never in the history of the world was the power of fanaticism exhibited as it was in this defence of Paris.

Henry looked on with somewhat too much complacency upon the unspeakable sufferings of his deluded subjects. There were two ways open to him to end them, to take the city by storm, or to retire from the siege; but listening both to his political advisers, who told him that an assault upon the capital would endanger his prospects of the crown, and to the preachings of the Huguenot ministers, who exhibited the horrors that took place within the walls of Paris as a picture of heavenly punishment for the massacre of St. Bartholomew, he could not make up his mind for either step, but kept hoping the people would surrender. He hoped from day to day, and from week to week, relieving the tediousness of the siege by an intrigue with two beautiful abbesses, of Montmartre and of Poissy, till one morning, towards the end of August, the sentinels reported the approach of an army from the north. It was Philip's general, the prince of Parma, who had come up from the Netherlands with forty thousand men to gain a new title to the crown of France by relieving the capital. Henry marched forward at once to give battle; but Parma skilfully evaded it, and by a series of strategic marches and countermarches enticed his adversary away from the capital, until he had been enabled to throw into it large stores of food, arms, and ammunition. Too late, the king saw that he had been duped; and the continuance of the siege having become useless, he galloped away with his Huguenots to the west. There was abundance of work for him in this quarter of France. A number of towns which had been royalist before had fallen off from Henry through the intrigues of priests, backed by Spanish gold, while a large fleet had sailed from the Tagus to take possession of Brittany. To prevent the landing of Philip's troops, the king hurried onward in forced marches, but without success. At the beginning of October, 1590, the Spanish flotilla threw anchor in the harbour of Blavet, disembarking six thousand men, and establishing a firm footing on the coast. The French Protestants and royalists were greatly alarmed at this movement, but scarcely so much as Elizabeth, whose fears were that Brittany might prove the stepping-stone of a new Armada. She hurriedly concluded another treaty with Henry, engaging to send a fresh body of troops to his aid, on condition that they be solely employed against the Spaniards, and be withdrawn on their expulsion from France. The English auxiliaries, to the number of four thousand, commanded by Sir John Norris, landed at Paimpol, on the northern coast of Brittany, at the commencement of 1591, and with them came a portion of Elizabeth's navy to watch the approaches into the Channel. There were rumours rife in London and all along the southern coast, that another host of big, slave-propelled galleys was about being launched towards the shore of England.

The march of the prince of Parma upon Paris, and the landing of Spanish troops in Brittany, which followed soon after, gave rise to an extraordinary warlike feeling among Elizabeth's subjects. It was embarrassing, in many respects to the queen, but still more so to Burleigh, whose increasing age did not favour any but thoughts of peace, the more so as he had lost the year before his trusty coadjutor, Sir Francis Walsingham, which made the burden of government hang heavy upon his shoulders. The earl of Essex, as one of the chief leaders of the war party, was most obnoxious to the old statesman, whose aim for more than a generation had been to make England great by peace; and to rid himself of his personal influence, Burleigh persuaded Elizabeth to send him into France as commander of a body of troops. The queen was loth to part from her handsome favourite; however, she could not withstand his own pressing importunity combined with that of her chief councillor, and in August, 1591, some six months after the despatch of Sir John Norris to Brittany, Essex sailed for Dieppe, at the head of a force of three thousand six hundred men, including three hundred gentlemen volunteers. Having thus banished in a convenient manner the chief adversary of his peace policy, Burleigh proceeded to moderate the war-fever by giving it an outlet. There were a hundred schemes afloat for laying hold of Philip's treasure fleets from the West Indies, and he made the queen sanction two of them, propounded respectively by Lord Thomas Howard and the earl of Cumberland, and which appeared the least mad of the whole. Howard started with seven ships, and Cumberland with eight, and both attacked the Spanish "plate-fleet" on the Atlantic, but met with a signal repulse, Philip having had the wisdom of ordering his treasure to be escorted by a powerful naval force, consisting of not less than fifty-five sail. In the attack of Howard's squadron, a fine ship had to be abandoned—the first English man-of-war that had yet fallen into the hands of the Spaniards. The ship was commanded by Sir Richard Grenville, acting as vice-admiral of the fleet, who did not give in till after a desperate fight, lasting from three in the afternoon till midnight, by which time nearly every man on board was either killed or wounded, masts, sails, and tackle cut to pieces, and nothing but a hulk left, lying on the water like a log. The brave commander was mortally wounded in the action, but dying addressed some cheering words to his companions. "Here die I, Richard Grenville," the old sailor exclaimed, "with a joyful and quiet mind, for that I have ended my life as a true soldier ought to do, fighting for his country, queen, religion, and honour."

The ill success of the naval expeditions against Spain had the consequence of making Elizabeth more cautious in her further proceedings, and King Henry soon began to feel the effect of it. He had been promised fresh succours in the wake of the auxiliaries commanded by Essex; but they failed to arrive, and instead of them came angry letters from the queen. She complained that her soldiers under Essex had not been exclusively employed, as stipulated in former treaties, against the Spaniards, but sent to assist in the siege of Rouen, undertaken in the king's interest alone. "I am astonished that any one," Elizabeth wrote to Henry, in her own energetic manner, "who is so much beholden to us for aid in his need, should pay his most assured friend in such base coin. Can you imagine that the softness of my sex deprives me of the courage to resent a public affront? The royal blood I boast could not brook from the mightiest prince in Christendom such treatment as you have

within the last three months offered to me. Be not displeased if I tell you roundly that if thus you treat your friends, who freely and from pure affection are serving you at a most important time, they may fail you hereafter in your greatest need." Henry was not a little offended at this letter, its boastfulness, as well as its evident injustice. It was sheer absurdity for Elizabeth to pretend that she was aiding him out of "pure affection" to drive the Spaniards from the soil of France; and this and the consideration that his haughty royal ally had hitherto doled out her assistance most sparsely to him, coupling every little service with remonstrances and conditions, made Henry silently resolve to free himself from her ties. He felt the more inclined to do so, as the aid he was receiving from England was gradually becoming more and more useless to him and tending to be dangerous. The forces under the earl of Essex had prevented his own army from capturing Rouen, the headlong impetuosity of the handsome favourite not being tempered by the smallest grain of military genius; while the English troops in Brittany, commanded by Sir John Norris, to whom misfortune clung as to an ancient friend, had met with nothing but a constant series of defeats. Weighing all these facts carefully in his own mind, the king arrived at the great resolution to make peace with the majority of his subjects in the only way he could hope to do, by becoming a member of the state church. It was more a conquest over princely pride than deep religious conviction for Henry to rush to this determination, which was facilitated by the counsel of some of the leading Huguenots themselves. They could not help seeing with him that the wild fanaticism of the multitude could not be kept down even by deluging the country in blood for another generation to come, and that the nominal conversion of their leader to the tenets of the majority, insuring his safe instalment on the throne, would be infinitely more favourable to the cause of Protestantism than a hundred won battles. Swayed by these weighty considerations, Henry publicly declared his readiness to become a convert to Roman Catholicism, and at the same time despatched an envoy to make his peace with the holy father at Rome.

Elizabeth professed great anger at the step taken by her ally, which, however, furnished real satisfaction to Burleigh. More sincerely attached to Protestantism than his mistress, Burleigh yet felt assured that it would be the greatest curse to England to be led into a vast continental war; and aware, at the same time, that the simplest way of driving the Spaniards from France would be the accession of Henry IV., he could not find it in his heart to blame the Huguenot prince for the intended apostacy. The earl of Essex, by the queen's desire, was recalled from Normandy; but to make up for this loss in the opposition to Philip's ambition, Burleigh encouraged the fitting out of several other naval undertakings against Spain. The ill-luck of the two last expeditions had done but little towards checking the desire of English sailors to have a peep into the contents of the wonderful "plate-fleet" which kept crossing the broad Atlantic once or twice a year, and there were scores of adventurers ready to stake their fortunes and their lives in the attempt. Among these most anxious to undertake the task another time was Sir Walter Raleigh, in momentary disgrace with the queen for having presumed to transfer his homage from her person to that of one of her ladies of honour, a beautiful creature, called Elizabeth Throgmorton; and it was with the double intention of repairing his shattered fortune, and of escaping imprisonment in the Tower, with which his sovereign threatened him for worshipping any other but her aged charms, that he planned a new expedition for seizing the Indian treasure. His name being in high renown as an experienced sea-rover, Raleigh had little trouble in getting the necessary capital for the speculation, so that nothing was wanted but the sanction of government to carry it out. This was obtained through Sir Robert Cecil, eldest son of Burleigh, who had just been appointed to the post of secretary of state left vacant by Walsingham, and being a violent enemy of the earl of Essex, thought fit to patronize Raleigh, who had engaged in many quarrels with the favourite. The squadron of Raleigh, consisting of thirteen ships, well manned but ill provisioned, left the River Medway, where it had been fitted out, in the spring of 1592, and kept cruising about the Azores for several months, without, however, meeting with the great "plate-fleet." Not to go home quite empty-handed, the adventurers kept watching the Portuguese coast till meeting with a good prize in a merchant vessel, called the "Madre de Dios," chartered with jewelry and other valuable goods to the amount of half a million sterling. But the honest sailors who followed the fortunes of Sir Walter pocketed the diamonds before they got to England, and when the shareholders in the expedition came to examine the prize they found it worth next to nothing. To crown his misfortune, Raleigh was thrown into the Tower as soon as he had set foot on shore, together with his fair sweetheart, Elizabeth Throgmorton. It had been reported to the queen that her old favourite intended to marry secretly the too beautiful lady of honour, and in her rage she thought that the crime could not be atoned for otherwise than by cutting off the heads of the two lovers.

There was a sad spectacle of decay of mental powers, and growth of all the meaner passions of the soul, in the declining years of Elizabeth. Though now close upon sixty, the queen was more absurdly vain of her charms than ever in her life, indulgent to none but the most outrageous flatterers, and thereby making her court a hotbed of intrigue and falsehood. Burleigh himself, in whose wisdom Elizabeth believed as in that of no other man, was more than once on the point of falling into irremediable disgrace by not chiming in with the fulsome flatteries of the courtly tribe; and but for the shrewdness of his son, the secretary of state, whose keen eyes, looking out from a deformed body, were bent upon watching every man and every action in the surroundings of the throne, he might have ended his career in prison, if not on the scaffold. This was the fate destined for Sir Walter Raleigh, but he saved himself for the moment by an extravagant piece of adulation. Hearing, a few weeks after his imprisonment in the Tower, that the queen intended to leave London on a journey, he wrote a long letter to his patron, Sir Robert Cecil, passionately asserting that he was dying for love of the royal maiden. In the epistle, which, as the shrewd son of Burleigh well understood, was meant for the eyes of Elizabeth, the much-experienced sailor drew a startling picture of the effects of the passion of love. "My heart," wrote Sir Walter, "was never broken till this day, that I hear the queen is going away, whom I have followed so many years with so great love and desire in many journeys, and am now left behind in a dark prison all alone. While she was yet near at hand, that I might hear of her once in two or three days, my sorrows were less great. But now my heart is cast into the depth of all misery—I that was wont to behold her riding like Alexander, hunting like Diana, walking like Venus; the gentle wind blowing her fair hair about her pure cheeks like a nymph; sometime sitting in the shade like a goddess; sometime singing like an angel, sometime playing like Orpheus—behold the sorrow of the world! I am bereaved of all." The ancient royal maiden, sharp-featured, grey-haired, and wrinkled, witch-like more than bewitching, very demurely accepted Raleigh's atrocious flattery, and to reward him and prove herself once more nymph, angel, and Venus, let him out of prison. As a further recompense, Sir Walter obtained, through the interest of the crown, a seat in the House of Commons; and early in the year 1593, a few months after his discharge from the Tower, made his appearance at Westminster as representative of the people. The keen-eyed sailor had discovered a shorter road to preferment than that viâ Spain and the plate-fleets.

The new parliament which the queen had summoned, and which was opened on the 19th of February, 1593, was remarkable as exhibiting the despotic tendencies of the aged queen. One of the effects of the indulgence of the horde of sycophants which surrounded her was that she had come to believe herself all but infallible, which made her treat the lords and commons in a style unknown since the days of Henry VIII. The haughty demeanour of Elizabeth, approaching the ludicrous in its vehemence and unreasonableness, became apparent on the first day of the session. When the speaker of the commons, Sir Edward Coke, made the three usual requests of freedom from arrest, of liberty of speech, and of right of remonstrance, she replied, by the mouth of the lord keeper, in a kind of invective which absolutely startled the loyal representatives of the nation. She told them that she felt graciously inclined to grant freedom from arrest, provided "that it was not to cover any man's ill doings," but that as to liberty of speech she warned them "that wit and speech were calculated to do harm; that their liberty of speech extended no further than 'ay' or 'no,' and that if any idle heads hazarded themselves by meddling with church and state, the speaker should not receive their bills." This was like a design to reduce parliament to a mere tax-voting assembly—a meaning not at all hidden by her majesty. "They were not called together," the lord keeper expressed himself very clearly, in the name of the queen, "to make new laws, or lose good hours in idle speeches, but to vote a supply to enable her majesty to defend her realm against the hostile attempts of the king of Spain." The majority of the members of the House of Commons were cowed under this show of despotism; and a few who dared to make a feeble show of opposition were silenced by the simple method of being thrown into prison. This happened to four representatives who had brought in a petition, couched in the most humble terms, entreating her majesty to declare herself regarding the succession, and to two others who had prepared bills for altering some gross abuses in the ecclesiastical courts. The mere allusion to the possible necessity of altering any part of her government machinery put Elizabeth in such a wrath that she sent for the speaker, telling him "to inform the commons that parliaments were the creatures of her will; that she might summon and dissolve them, nullify or give effect to their decisions according to her pleasure; that she was indignant at their presumption, and, once for all, forbade the exhibition of any bills touching the reformation of matters of church or state." This was enough to make all the members still out of prison kiss the rod very humbly. They voted with great alacrity two subsidies at once; and when the queen declared that this was not sufficient they voted three. The voting over, Elizabeth dissolved the parliament in person, severely reprimanding the members for their behaviour. Reprimand was never better deserved.

Elizabeth's arbitrary proceeding, like all despotic violence, was in reality but the cloak of weakness. Never since the accession of the queen had the policy of the government been more unstable, more aimless, and more under the vacillating influence of petty factions than now when she was trampling upon the rights of the nation. The cause of all was visible enough. The great brain that had ruled England for nigh forty years was losing its power: Burleigh was fast succumbing to age, and there was no man as yet to take his place. His son, Sir Robert Cecil, who, as quaintly stated by an old writer, "carried upon his little crooked body a head and a head-piece of a vast content," was still too young and inexperienced in affairs to exert much influence in the government; and above him and around him there was such wild turmoil of intrigue, strife, and ambition as might have bewildered the steadiest and wariest politician of the age. "There was never," Cecil wrote to a friend, "in court such emulation, such envy, such back-biting, as is now at this time;" adding that dishonour had become the best coin for purchasing honour. The result of all this was despotism at home and weakness abroad, the latter visible not only in the relations with France, but still more with the Netherlands. The aid given by Elizabeth to the Dutch Protestants in their struggle for independence had gone on diminishing for years; but the pretensions of the queen in directing their movements to her own advantage remained high nevertheless, and when some little spirit of opposition was shown she suddenly turned round upon them, demanding to be reimbursed for all her previous expenses. It was a harsh and cruel demand, and in reply to it the brave republicans, now under the leadership of Maurice of Orange, son of the murdered stadholder, pleaded their great poverty, and the extreme difficulty in supporting the war against the Spaniards, that made it impossible for them to discharge old liabilities, which, besides, by the terms of the treaties entered upon, were to be settled only at the conclusion of peace. The arguments had little effect upon the queen, and she continued to insist upon immediate repayment, exhibiting in a striking manner the increasing hardness of a mind soured with age, with hopes unfulfilled, and becoming more and more unsympathising. For a moment there seemed danger of the dispute with the fighting "beggars" of the United Provinces becoming serious; but fortunately for them, and still more for the honour of England, the matter was arranged finally by Sir Thomas Bodley, Elizabeth's envoy in the Netherlands. After long and painful negotiations, he succeeded in concluding a fresh treaty, superseding all former ones, by which the people of the United Provinces bound themselves to pay the queen annually twenty thousand pounds, till the extinction of her debt, to conclude no peace with Philip without her consent, and, in the event of a war with Spain, to assist her with a certain number of ships. These were hard terms for a people that had been struggling for more than a generation for its very existence, and was still in the death-throes of a war carried on against overwhelming odds.

The harsh treatment of the Dutch Protestants, with whom he was intimately allied, quickened the desire of the king of France to free himself from the necessity of the cautious assistance afforded by Elizabeth, by making peace with his Catholic subjects. On the 15th of May, 1593, Henry made the public announcement of his intention to be "instructed" by a number of bishops in the faith of the ancient religion; and the instruction, extending over exactly two hours, having been given, the Huguenot king was solemnly admitted as a member of the church of Rome. The ceremony took place at St. Denis, cradle and burial-place of the monarchs of France, on Sunday, the 25th of July. At eight o'clock in the morning the king, surrounded by an immense train of nobles and high dignitaries of state, and preceded and followed by his Swiss and Scotch life-guards, bent his steps towards the cathedral of St. Denis, through streets covered with flowers, and crowded by a vast multitude, who rent the air with their acclamations. The cathedral was shut when the king arrived; then his trumpets sounded, and he himself knocked at the gate. It flew open in an instant, and the archbishop of Bourges, with seven bishops and a countless number of priests, were seen ranged in a semicircle at the foot of the high altar. "Who are you?" demanded the archbishop, on Henry approaching. "Je suis le roi!"—I am the king!—was the reply. "What do you wish here?" again demanded the archbishop. "I demand to be received within the pale of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman church," said the king. On a sign from the archbishop, Henry kneeled down at his feet, to make his public declaration of faith. "I protest and swear," the king exclaimed slowly, "before the face of the Almighty God, that I will live and die in the Catholic religion, which I will protect and defend against all enemies, at the peril of my blood and my life." The archbishop now offered Henry his sacred ring to kiss, and giving him the absolution and benediction, led him to the foot of the altar. Here the king repeated his oath on his knees, while the priests and choir, joined by the vast assemblage within the cathedral, broke forth into the strains of the "Te Deum Laudamus." After this Henry confessed, attended high mass, and then returned through the flower-strewn streets to his palace, amidst crowds frantic with joy. Rome had conquered, and the faith of reason had lost its last chance of ruling France.

The apostacy of Henry IV. had not the immediate effect he expected from it. The civil war, in which religion was the mere pretext, as far at least as the leaders were concerned, was carried on with more or less intermission, and the chief enemy of Henry, Philip of Spain, got even fiercer in his warlike attitude. While forcing the pope not to acknowledge the conversion of the king as real, he kept pouring troops after troops into Brittany and the northern provinces of France, determined to gain a firm hold in the country for the assertion of his claims. Philip was now sixty-six years of age, and broken under disease; but his ambition seemed to be growing with his wasting body, and with one foot in the grave he continued dreaming of world-dominion. He kept working hard all day, writing despatches to his generals and ambassadors, assisted by none but his eldest daughter, aged twenty-seven, described as "a very lusty, beautiful lady," who had become his favourite child since the death of the prince of Asculé. "Her chief pastime," Mr. Stauden, one of Burleigh's secret emissaries, reported, "is the reading of history and writing with her father, the latter being his common occupation, whereby he despatched more than any three secretaries, and in this manner, with his pen and purse governeth the world." To seat this daughter upon the throne of France, leaving to his eldest son, a boy of fifteen, "of a fair, sanguine complexion, addicted to music and riding," the rule of all his other dominions, was the great ambition of Philip; and, according to Burleigh's agents at Madrid, he added to it that of seizing the diadem of Elizabeth, and uniting England and France under one crown. The latter scheme, or pretended scheme, wild and visionary as it seemed, met, nevertheless, with general belief; and after the invasion of Brittany by Philip there were few who doubted that another Armada would soon make its appearance on the coast of England. The belief found its expression in the constant organizations of naval armaments directed against Spain and the Spanish possessions. Although the more recent expeditions had turned out very unfortunate to the chief persons concerned, there was a never-ceasing crowd of adventurers ready to embark in new ones; and scarcely a season passed without some fleet or other setting sail from Plymouth or the River Thames to burn the ships and lay hand on the golden ducats of King Philip. The spirit, useful as it was to breed daring seamanship, was not altogether creditable to the English nation; but Elizabeth had neither the force nor the will to put a stop to it, and content of ruling her subjects on shore in despot fashion, she had not a word to say against her sailors turning pirates, as long as she could share in the spoils. "My sister of England does not care for glory unless it is gilded," said Henry IV. to the ambassador of Venice, on the latter proposing to fit out an expedition, with Elizabeth's aid, for exploring the Nile.

several defeats both in France and the Netherlands, acquired renewed strength in the spring of the following year. It was reported by the English spies at Madrid that the galleys prepared were ready to embark their cargoes of sailors, soldiers, and slaves, and that nothing was wanted to start the new Armada but the arrival of the Indian treasure-fleet. That Philip was in want of funds was already known in England, his enormous wars, and subsidies paid to adherents all over the Continent, swallowing up more than his gigantic revenues from the New World; and his credit had come to stand so low for the moment that even the Genoese bankers, always willing to issue loans to respectable kings at twenty or thirty per cent. interest, refused to honour his drafts. Based upon these facts and rumours, a great plan was brought forward by Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins. It was to ruin Philip by taking possession of the harbours in the West Indies, from which the annual "plate-fleets" set sail, and thus deprive him with one stroke both of his immediate supplies of treasure and of those for some time to come. The plan was received with great favour, not only by the people of England, but by Elizabeth, whose imagination was dazzled by the idea of streams of gold diverted from Philip's exchequer into her own. She therefore gave immediate permission to her two naval heroes to engage in the enterprise, promising that six of her own ships should assist in it. Thus encouraged, the preparations made quick progress, and in July, 1595, Drake and Hawkins set sail with a splendid fleet of thirty ships, carrying close upon three thousand men. It was the largest expedition ever sent from England across the Atlantic, and being in charge of two such leaders as Drake and Hawkins, there were few who doubted that the success would be more than adequate to the expectations entertained. But a few months sufficed to dispel these illusions, showing once more that since the defeat of the Armada Elizabeth's subjects were given too much to underrate the valour of their enemies. The adventurers commenced by attacking Porto Rico, but were repulsed with great loss, suffering a thorough defeat, which so much affected Hawkins that he expired of grief soon after. The death of the great sailor took place on the 12th of November; and the same evening Drake had a narrow escape from a cannon-ball that carried the stool from under him as he sat at supper and killed two of his chief officers. Nothing daunted, he pursued his voyage to Panama, which he attempted to take, but again failed, and in revenge burned and ravaged Nombre de Dios and several other towns on the isthmus of Darien. The ignoble warfare was ended by the death of Drake, on the 28th of January, 1596, little more than two months after that of Hawkins. Without leaders, and utterly dispirited, the survivors of the expedition now made their way back to England, where they were received with reproaches by Elizabeth. Grim old age was fast destroying all her nobler instincts, leaving her unable to admire anything but success.

Upon the people of England the defeat of the enterprise which had raised such high hopes had no other effect than that of begetting a loud cry for renewed exertions, greater than any yet made, to curb the power and pride of Philip. The queen made some efforts to discourage the war-fever, but was carried away by it before long, chiefly through the influence of Essex, whose passion for the pomp and excitement of the battle-field appeared to increase with age, growing into a sort of fury. He now proposed to Elizabeth a scheme of extraordinary magnitude. It was nothing less than that of invading Spain with an army of twenty-five thousand men, and of seizing Cadiz, the strongest naval fortress of the kingdom, and principal station of Philip's fleet. Burleigh declared himself strongly against this expedition, as fraught with enormous cost, and very doubtful of success; and Elizabeth seemed inclined to listen to his arguments, when a matter of very trifling importance threw her over to the side of Essex and the war party. There appeared a book at Antwerp, supposed to be written by Cardinal Allen and some of the English Jesuits at Rome, bearing the title, "A Conference about the succession to the crown of England: divided into two parts, whereof the first containeth the discourse of a civil lawyer how and in what manner propinquity of blood is to be preferred, and the second, the speech of a temporal lawyer about the particular titles of all such as do or may pretend within England, or without, to the next succession." The book attempted to prove, in a very able manner, the right of King Philip to the throne of England, based on his descent from John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; and dwelling strongly on the argued illegitimacy of Elizabeth, on account of the conviction of Anne Boleyn for adultery, it put her into an extraordinary rage. What added to it was that the publication was dedicated to the earl of Essex, who was overwhelmed with praises, being described as "a man like to have the highest part or sway in deciding of this great affair," namely of the succession. The object of this dedication, and of coupling her favourite's name with her own, was too evident to make the queen suspect for a moment that Essex could have had a previous knowledge of it; and while reserving, therefore, all her anger for the unknown authors, she resolved to chastise Philip as their patron or employer. Being printed at Antwerp, under the eyes of his chief representative in the Netherlands, there could be no doubt as to King Philip being the principal originator of the "Conference about the succession," in which his pretended claims were so well sustained; so that when she learnt that the book was distributed in thousands of copies all over the kingdom, she was ready for the invasion of Spain.

The preparations for the great expedition were carried on with much despatch all through the spring of 1596, when the news of another vast stroke of Spanish policy fell startling upon the ears of the queen. For some time past the northern division of the army with which Philip was prosecuting the war against Henry IV. of France had been making considerable progress, chiefly through the energy of a new governor of the Spanish Netherlands, the Archduke Albert, appointed to his high post after the decease of the prince of Parma. The archduke, in the summer of 1595, had taken the city of Cambray by surprise, and spreading his troops from thence westward was threatening the towns of Picardy and the French ports on the Channel, all of them but thinly protected by garrisons. Henry at once perceived the great danger to which he was exposed in losing these important places; but being engaged in sanguinary warfare in the south of France, against his old enemies of the Catholic League, he was unable to hurry to the relief of his threatened Channel ports, and had to content himself to invoke the aid of Elizabeth. The demand, preferred in the humblest manner by a special envoy, was refused by the queen, who for the moment felt incensed against Henry for several witty remarks which he was said to have uttered about her vanity and ill-temper. But not many days passed before she had seriously to repent the indulgence of such petty revenge. On the 5th of April, while Henry's envoy was still trying to persuade her to assist his master, eight thousand Spanish troops suddenly appeared before Calais, summoning the governor to surrender; and two days after the news reached London that, unless there arrived immediate assistance, the city would have to succumb. Now Elizabeth took the alarm. She at once despatched the earl of Essex to Dover, to cross the Channel with the fleetest ships that were being got ready for the invasion of Spain, and attempt to raise the siege of Calais at any cost and any price. Essex started as soon as he had received the queen's commands; but he had not gone many hours when another express arrived, reporting the fall of Calais as inevitable if not relieved within three days. It was a Sunday morning when the courier, booted, spurred, and dust-covered, made his appearance before Elizabeth, just as she was going to attend divine service at her chapel. She quickly put down her prayer-book, and calling her secretary, dictated an order to the lord mayor and aldermen of London to impress a few thousand able-bodied males, or as large a number as they could seize, and send them off to Dover, before the day was gone. The fathers of the city were listening to a sermon at St. Paul's Cross when the royal mandate arrived, and did not wait for the end to execute it. A brilliant idea flashed through the brain of the worthy lord mayor immediately on receipt of the order from his high, mighty, and most dreaded sovereign. It was no easy task under ordinary circumstances to catch so many able-bodied males at such very short notice given; and it struck his lordship that the very best way to net his victims would be to pounce upon them while lost in the tranquillity of prayer and meditation. The scheme was eminently successful. Before the morning service was over the doors of all the city churches were suddenly closed, and to the intense surprise of the congregations, sheriffs' officers marched in, and collared the stoutest and best-looking of the male worshippers. In the afternoon the pious citizens thus selected had arms put in their hands, and before the evening sun had set they were trudging along the old road to Canterbury. The queen greatly admired the prompt action of the lord mayor and his brethren; which admiration, however, was not shared by all her subjects.

Energetic as were the measures taken by Elizabeth to relieve Calais, they proved completely useless. Before the herd of poor citizens kidnapped for glory had been driven to the sea-shore, the report that the city, English for so many centuries, had fallen into the hands of the Spaniards had been brought to the queen. Her sorrow was the more lively from the knowledge that but for the refusal of a few men-of-war to her illustrious and brave ally of France the event could not have taken place, and that the hundredth part of the armament preparing to be thrown against Philip's dominions would have prevented him from hoisting his flag in sight of the English shore. But regrets were vain under the circumstances: to save Calais would have been easy, but to reconquer it was all but impossible; and nothing remained but to continue the preparations for the invasion of Spain with redoubled energy. Elizabeth had not been at first inclined to form the expedition on as large a scale as proposed by the earl of Essex; but the advance of the Spanish arms on the Channel decided her, and she seemed inclined for the moment to go rather above than under the estimate. Taking advantage of the treaty concluded just before with the United Provinces, she despatched Sir Francis Vere, a friend of Essex, to Amsterdam, to demand the assistance of the Dutch rebels in the attack upon Spain. The noble-hearted "beggars" responded to the appeal with great liberality by sending twice the number of ships they were bound to by the terms of the treaty, almost forgetting their own position in the desire to aid in the enterprise. To this resolution King Henry, whose influence was great in the Netherlands, contributed much. Philip was the only man upon earth whom the brave and good-natured king hated with all the fulness of his impassioned heart; for inclined as he was to think well of all men, pitying human weaknesses, of which he himself had not a few, he still looked upon the Spanish monarch as a sort of incarnate spirit of evil, full of malign and fiendish passions. It was not for the open warfare made upon him by Philip that he hated him thus, but for his old practices of launching forward assassins. Again and again the life of Henry had been attempted; and whenever he investigated the sources of the crime, he found that he could trace them to the little cabinet at Madrid, where the pale-faced ruler of millions was writing despatches with the "very lusty, beautiful lady," his daughter. To crush Philip, the royal Bearnese would have given half his kingdom, but unfortunately as yet not even the half was under his command; and his counsels to his Dutch friends, together with best wishes for success, were all that he could contribute to the great expedition about to invade Spain. Neither were without importance, for pressed by him, the parliament of the United Provinces decided at once that twenty-two of their best ships of war should be sent into the Channel to join the English fleet. The junction was effected at the end of May, Elizabeth's ships being ranged in the bay of Plymouth, ready to raise their anchors and sail away to the south.

On the morning of the first of June the great armament left the shores of England, favoured by a fair wind. The queen had appointed Essex the commander-in-chief of the troops destined to be landed in Spain, altogether about twenty-four thousand in number, including above a thousand English noblemen and gentlemen serving as volunteers; while Lord Howard, as high admiral, had charge of the sailing operations and all matters concerning the management of the fleet. It was not by any means a wise arrangement, Essex and Howard cherishing no friendly feeling towards each other; and to counteract the effect of this, and dreading a possible collision, Elizabeth nominated above and aside of the two commanders a council of five, "to keep them in due temper and harmony." The five councillors were Sir Walter Raleigh, Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Francis Vere, Sir Conyers Clifford, and Sir George Carew, all brave men and good sailors, but partizans more or less of either Essex or the high admiral. The whole of this elaborate machinery of command reflected but the turmoil and intrigues of Elizabeth's court, and seemed little fitted to advance the success of the expedition; however, the hopes of all were high when it started, and the fortune of the waves smiled upon it to such a degree that after a rapid run across the Bay of Biscay and along the Spanish and Portuguese coast, the fleet threw anchor in St. Sebastian's Bay, at the entrance of the harbour of Cadiz, without the loss of a single vessel. The passage had been so quick that no intelligence of the danger threatening his shores had as yet been received by Philip; and taking advantage of the panic which the arrival of the expedition created at Cadiz, the high admiral and Essex resolved to force their way into the harbour with the whole of the armament under their command. Soon after daybreak on the morning of the 21st of June the English fleet put itself in movement, Sir Walter Raleigh leading the van. The broad and magnificent harbour of Cadiz was protected by the guns of the fortress, as well as by a mass of large cannon upon the ramparts, while the entrance was barricaded by some thirty galleons, argosies, carracks, and frigates, all armed to the teeth, and stretching from one side to the other like a bridge. It seemed all but madness to rush upon such a gigantic bulwark of defences, yet the daring commanders of the English fleet did not hesitate for a moment in their course. Raleigh, leading the way in a vessel called the "Warspite," set the example of intrepidity by pushing right into the middle of the harbour, regardless of the hailstorm of fire from fort, walls, and ships, and hung on to the "San Philip," the hugest of the galleons, as a lion would put his claws into the sides of an elephant. Every captain of an English vessel, great or small, did the same, which frightened the Spanish sailors and soldiers to such an extent that they threw down their arms, while the officers ordered the anchors to be slipped, to gain the shore if possible. It availed them little. The big galleons, before they could run aground, lost most of their men, "tumbling," as Raleigh described it, "into the sea heaps of soldiers like coals out of a sack." Then, all on a sudden, the aspect of the Spanish fleet became still more terrible. A negro slave, full of hatred of his proud taskmasters, set fire to the powder magazine of the "San Philip," just after the big ship had freed herself from the grasp of her bold enemies. Then there flashed forth a broad sheet of lightning followed by thunder, and at the same moment the mainmast of the "San Philip" was seen shooting into the air like an arrow. The flames in a few minutes seized another large galleon, the "San Thomas," with two heavy argosies, and now the whole became a scene of unutterable horror. "The spectacle," says Sir Walter Raleigh, in his "Relation of the Cadiz action," written some time after, "was very lamentable; many drowned themselves; many, half burnt, leaped into the water; many were seen hanging to the ships' sides by the ropes' ends, up to the lips in water, and many swimming, with grievous wounds, stricken under water, and suddenly put out of pain; and withal so huge a fire and such fearing of the ordnance in the great "Philip" and the rest, as if any man had a desire to see hell itself, it was there the most lively figured."

Amidst the smoke and flames of the burning fleet Essex landed five thousand of his picked men, and led them to an attack upon the city gate nearest the harbour. There was but slight resistance from within; and in less than an hour Cadiz had fallen into the possession of the English troops, who immediately spread over the great and wealthy city, burning, killing, and plundering. Many of the officers and soldiers got hold of enormous riches, carrying off loads of diamonds, gold, and jewels; and although Essex did everything in his power to stop the plunder, his efforts could effect little more than protect the women and children. The sack of the city lasted the whole day and part of the night following; but in the meanwhile a prize greater than all Cadiz escaped the hands of the conquerors. During the attack of the English upon the great war ships, the famous "plate-fleet," which had just arrived from America, with millions of treasure on board, had prudently retired to the bottom of the inner bay, protected by strong batteries. To follow and to seize the golden argosies, in the first flush of success, while the air was thick with the smoke of the burning galleons, was Raleigh's intention; and though badly wounded in the leg by a splinter, he proceeded to carry it out, when he was called on shore by the commander-in-chief. Essex, noble and generous to a fault, was nevertheless not free from jealousy; and aware that the heart of his royal mistress was thirsting after the substantial contents of the plate-fleet far more than after the ideal glory of capturing cities, he had made up his mind to have no sharer in the renown of grasping the wonderful carracks. But his troops kept sacking and burning within the city, and before the bugle could call them together for fresh work, the chief of the Spanish forces, the duke of Medina Sidonia, had come to a decision of his own. The duke, since the defeat of the great Armada which he had commanded, hated the English with deadly hatred; and he now resolved without hesitation to destroy the vast treasure of his master rather than let it fall into the hands of the enemy. While still engaged in the sack of Cadiz, Essex's soldiers, who had been followed by most of the men of the expedition, all at once saw the heavens in a blaze. The great plate-fleet was burning: never before in the memory of men had there been such a costly bonfire. For miles and miles around the air was loaded with the perfume of the richest spices; the jewels crackled and sparkled, and the burning gold shot up in rich green flames. The illumination was said to be worth above ten millions of ducats: King Philip received the report of it with grim satisfaction, but the maiden sovereign of England was ready to cry at the news. She considered the bonfire to be paid out of her pocket.

After the capture of Cadiz and the burning of the Spanish ships, the leaders of the expedition were in some perplexity as to what to do next. An orderly plan of campaign had never been settled upon, and the widest divergence of opinion now began to appear among the seven chiefs among whom the queen had divided the commands. While Essex declared himself strongly in favour of prosecuting the invasion of Spain by marching into Andalusia, and establishing a firm hold upon the sea-board between the Guadalquivir and the Strait of Gibraltar, the lord admiral utterly opposed this scheme as visionary and impossible, and refused even to hold Cadiz itself. The five councillors, appointed to "keep them in due temper and harmony," did little but fan the flame of discord between Howard and Essex, by siding some with the one and some with the other, until an agreement between the conflicting opinions had become utterly hopeless. At last the lord admiral threatened to sail away with the ships under his orders, and leave his rival in command with his adherents alone on the foreign coast, and the threat was actually executed in part before Essex would give way. But his own officers before this had revolted against him; they all had their chests filled with the spoils of the rich city, and anxious to throw their gold and diamonds safely into the lap of their wives and friends at home, they were not in the least want of glory for the moment, but cheerfully ranged themselves at the side of the high admiral. He ordered Cadiz to be burnt, the inhabitants being allowed to quit their homes after paying a heavy ransom; and on the 5th of July, the English forces re-embarked, with the rich city behind them on fire. After taking and sacking the town of Faro, in Portugal, and carrying off, among other booty, the famous library of Osorius, the fleet made all haste homeward, and favoured by wind and waves, threw anchor again at Plymouth on the 10th of August, after an absence of little more than two months. Essex, without waiting an hour, immediately posted to court; he feared that a storm would arise against him, and tried to crush its effect by appealing to the love of her who had lifted him near to a throne.

The fears of Essex were but too well justified. Elizabeth's anger on learning that the expedition had returned with every man enriched, but with no other present for her than the bales of theology and philosophy netted at Faro, passed all bounds; and looking upon her favourite as chiefly responsible for the loss of Philip's golden carracks, she overwhelmed him with reproaches. Refusing to listen to him in private, she ordered that he should undergo an examination before the privy council, to justify his conduct both in allowing the treasures resulting from the sack of Cadiz to be appropriated by his men, and for distributing afterwards other large sums, proceeds of the ransom paid by the inhabitants of the city, among the chief officers of the expedition. It was easy for Essex to explain all, and to show that whatever riches his subordinates had amassed, he himself had come back with empty hands, the glory of England having been the sole object of all his actions. Burleigh, enemy though he was of the royal favourite, was so much impressed by his noble defence that he openly took his part in the privy council, with the effect of bringing down upon his own head the ire of Elizabeth. She called her aged minister "a miscreant and a coward," telling him that he was "more afraid of Essex than herself," and altogether rated him so fiercely that he fell seriously ill. Not content with this, the queen, whose fury against her favourite seemed to grow with the attempts of others to take his part, forgot herself so far as to strike one of her ladies of honour who presumed to say a few words in favour of Essex. The lady, a Mrs. Bridges, was presumed to be a mark of the gallantries of the handsome earl; and it was both on this account and of her interference in his favour that the queen laid hand on her. The event was gravely represented by contemporary writers as an important affair of state. "The queen," reported one of them, "hath of late used the fair Mrs. Bridges with words and blows of anger, and she and Mrs. Russell were put out of the coffer-chamber. They lay three nights at my Lady Stafford's, but are now returned again to their wonted calling." To make peace with her Mrs. Russell, Elizabeth immediately after presented the important wardenship of the cinque ports to one of her friends. It was but natural that under a regentarian maiden queen England should be ruled by maids, or widows, of honour.

In the intrigues which divided the court of Elizabeth, the great question of the succession played an important part. Notwithstanding that it was forbidden, under visitation of the severest displeasure of the queen, even to hint that she would die some day, and would therefore require a successor, the subject necessarily was in the minds of most men, and the engrossing thought of all courtiers. The fact that there seemed but one real claimant to the throne, in the person of the king of Scotland, altered little in the great turmoil of intrigue and speculation; for as long as Elizabeth had not recognized James as her successor his position was more or less doubtful, and there were none that could positively say what the next week, month, or year would bring forward. But very few dared to enter into any communication, open or secret, with James of Scotland; and among the more important personages at Elizabeth's court, Essex was the only one presuming, at very favourable moments, to hint at his claims to the succession. The claims had been strengthened within the last few years by the marriage of the young king with the Princess Anne of Denmark, which had already been productive of offspring. The union, which proved as satisfactory to the people of Scotland, on account of the bride being of an old Protestant house, as distasteful to Elizabeth, furnishing food for her envy, had given rise to a little romantic episode, in which James distinguished himself favourably. He was married to Princess Anne, not quite fourteen years old, by proxy, on the 20th of August, 1589, a year after the advent of the great Armada; and the ceremony accomplished, the juvenile bride was given in charge to Peter Munch, admiral of Denmark, to be carried to her husband across the North Sea.

The bridal voyage was beset with extraordinary dangers and difficulties. Thrice the Danish admiral, with twelve fine ships, attempted to make the Firth of Forth, and thrice he was beaten back by storms, the last time when already in sight of the coast of Scotland. Peter Munch was a brave old sailor, inured to the perils of the waves, but this was too much for him. He firmly took it into his head that the storms on the North Sea were produced by witches—one witch in particular, known to himself as the wife of a burgher of the city of Copenhagen. Brooding over these matters, Peter Munch, instead of making one more attempt to carry the princess under his charge to Scotland, or of undertaking the other alternative to bring her back to her Danish friends, sailed with her towards the arctic regions, throwing anchor finally at Opslo, a miserable little town of wooden houses—converted, in more recent times, into the Gamla-Byen, or Old Suburb, of Christiania—on the Norwegian coast. From here the Danish admiral despatched a letter to his court, begging the king would graciously hang the old witch of Copenhagen, who, with others of her tribe, was stopping his passage over the North Sea, promising that as soon as she had been tied up he would set sail again for his destination. At the same time Princess Anne, somewhat sceptic about witches, but with a little faith in love, sent a note to her betrothed lord, announcing her unwilling voyage to the northern latitudes, and her misery of being kept away from him. James received the message, carried by a young Dane named Steven Beale, passionately enamoured of the young princess, his mistress, at the beginning of October, and at once determined to dispense with the further services of Peter Munch by fetching his wife himself from Norway. His ministers strongly opposed the resolution; but James was not to be daunted, and setting sail with five small vessels, the biggest of them of not more than one hundred and twenty tons, he safely landed, on the 28th of October, in the bay of Flekkefjord, on the Norwegian coast, some hundred and fifty miles south from the dwelling-place of Admiral Munch and Princess Anne. To discover them was not an easy task; and the king had to stalk about among the pathless mountains of Norway for more than three weeks, till a lucky accident brought him into Opslo. James had forgotten all court etiquette by this time, and, booted, dirty, and snow-covered as he was, stormed into the presence of his poor little bride, whom he greeted with a hearty kiss, "after the Scottish fashion." Two days after there was a royal wedding at Opslo; and having spent his honeymoon in a wooden barn, the storms of the Skager Rack singing the epithalamium, King James and his bride set out on an overland journey through Sweden to Denmark. It was not a pleasant trip, in the depth of a Scandinavian winter, with the snow lying six feet high; but the matter was not to be helped, the royal pair and their suite being impelled onward by the sorrest of all wants, the lack of virtials. After a very cold and somewhat dangerous journey of more than a month, bride and bridegroom arrived at last at Copenhagen, where they were once more married with Lutheran rites, the friends of Princess Anne deeming the two previous nuptial ties not sufficiently strong. King James had no objection to be married on for ever, feeling excessively comfortable in the Danish capital, in a life of luxuries he had never before known. Spending his days in discussing knotty theological points, and his nights in getting drunk, he was not a little sorry when, in April, 1590, a deputation from Scotland arrived to see what had become of him. There was no help for poor James but to turn his face homewards; and, escorted by the fleet under Peter Munch—who, somehow or other, had disposed of all the Danish witches—king and queen safely landed at Leith on the first day of May. On the 19th of February, 1594, Anne of Denmark presented her lord with a son and heir, who was christened, a week after, as Henry Frederick.

The birth of a son was a tower of strength to King James, both among his own turbulent subjects and his friends in England; yet the very event served but to increase the jealousy of Elizabeth. She herself kept up a formal kind of intercourse with her prospective heir, but allowed no one to do the same; and on being made aware, through the report of her spies at the court of Scotland, that the earl of Essex was exchanging occasional ciphered letters with the king, she severely reprimanded him for it. This happened soon after the return of the favourite from the Cadiz expedition, and served to increase the cloud of royal disfavour against him to such an extent that he began seriously to fear for his position. To work upon the sympathy of his aged mistress, the earl had recourse to a remedy he had often before tried, that of pretending severe illness. The design proved effective once more, for no sooner had the queen heard that the life of her handsome friend was in danger, when she hurried to him, and peace was concluded on the fairest terms. But Essex was well aware that the peace would not be lasting unless he should succeed in repairing the Cadiz misfortune, and with this end in view he proposed another expedition to the Spanish coast, for the purpose of intercepting the next "plate-fleet," believed to be of more than ordinary importance and value. Elizabeth readily entered into the proposal; and the knowledge of the wealth amassed by individuals in the last enterprise attracting a vast number of adventurers, the scheme soon came to swell into gigantic dimensions. Early in the summer of 1597, a fleet of one hundred and twenty sail had assembled at Plymouth, of which seventeen were queen's ships, forty-three merchantmen of more or less size, well armed for the occasion, and the rest tenders and victuallers. The fleet carried five thousand newly-levied troops and volunteers, and one thousand veterans from the Netherlands, the latter under Sir Francis Vere. On the urgent demand of Essex, the queen nominated him commander-in-chief of both the naval and the military part of the expedition, investing him with absolute powers, unrestricted by any kind of supervision. Under him, Lord Thomas Howard was appointed vice admiral, and Sir Walter Raleigh rear-admiral, while the command of the principal ships was given to the most experienced captains of the royal navy, including Sir George Carew, Sir Thomas Vavasour, Sir Richard Lewson, and Sir William Monson. Thus prepared, the fleet set sail from Plymouth on the 9th of July, but had scarcely got out of sight of land when it was overtaken by a storm, and had to return into harbour, with the loss of many men, and great damage to the ships. On learning this mishap, and hearing that it would take a month to refit the expedition, Elizabeth ordered the disembarkation of all the land forces, except the veterans of Sir Francis Vere. Her majesty, as of old, kept carefully balancing her accounts, and, while investigating the law of chances, was getting afraid that the hunt after Philip's carracks would prove a non-paying speculation.

Essex set sail once more on the 17th of August; and this time was fortunate enough to reach the Spanish coast, with no more serious misfortune than that of scattering his fleet, by blundering directions, over a good part of the Atlantic Ocean. His incapacity to play the admiral, though no more than might have been expected, had become painfully apparent by this time, emboldening Sir Walter Raleigh to take matters to some extent in his own hand. It had been settled to wait for the "plate-fleet" at the Azores, the usual resting place of the Spanish argosies; and on Raleigh arriving there, separated from the rest of the expedition, he took upon himself to capture Fayal, the largest of the central islands. Essex, who arrived some days after, got into a great rage at the exploit of his subordinate, threatening to have him shot for breach of naval discipline. It was with difficulty Lord Thomas Howard succeeded in pacifying the handsome earl and patching up a reconciliation between him and Raleigh, so as to prevent the immediate dissolution of the enterprise. However, from this moment everything failed. Raleigh, conscious of being the true chief of the expedition, was too proud to allow himself to be guided by a man utterly ignorant of naval affairs, and the result was that the great "plate-fleet" escaped once again. But for a lucky accident which drove three small Spanish merchantmen right into the arms of Essex, he would have had to go back empty-handed, with the certainty of falling into utter disgrace. As it was, the earl felt humiliated enough on landing at Plymouth, late in October, and repairing to court to give an account of his expedition. Elizabeth received him with the most violent reproaches. She had learnt already that the vessels he had taken, the largest of which was of but four hundred tons, were not worth sufficient to cover one half the cost of the adventure; and the knowledge that the payment of the other half would chiefly fall upon her was enough to make her forget all her affection for the beautiful master of the horse whom she had turned into an admiral. The fiery nature of Essex could not brook the insults of the mistress who had so long treated him as a spoiled child, and he left the court in great anger, retiring to his country house at Wanstead. From here he sent a challenge to Lord Howard, the high admiral, whom he supposed to have influenced the queen against him, and who in his absence had been elevated to the earldom of Nottingham, "for services," as stated in the patent, "rendered at the taking of Cadiz." Essex considered this a reflection upon his own conduct, and notwithstanding the polite refusal of the high admiral to shoot him or be shot at, talked of murder and revenge in such a strain as to frighten the queen at last. She was getting heartily tired of her impetuous favourite, yet felt not sufficient strength within herself to cast him off entirely. To mollify his anger, she elevated him to a dignity he had long coveted, that of earl marshal of England, with which office he was solemnly invested in December, 1597. This momentarily suspended the court broils, which, with the increasing age of Elizabeth, began to influence to a high degree the government of the realm.

The return of the favourite to court gave not a little unhappiness to Burleigh. The aged minister, who had guided the vessel of state now for more than a lifetime, was beginning to feel the end of his career approaching; but there was one great desire still in his breast, which was to give a lasting peace to England before closing his eyes. Not unanticipated by him, though quite unlooked for by his colleagues in the government, the offer of such a peace arrived at the end of the year 1597. The man who had made Europe the plaything of his ambition, who had turned whole nations into ferocious savages to establish certain dogmas of his own, and who had shed the blood of hundreds of thousands, and destroyed the peace and happiness of millions to add a little to his imaginary power, the prime motor of all the wars that had afflicted the civilized world for nearly half a century, King Philip of Spain, was getting tired of war. At the age of seventy the fear of death suddenly opened his eyes to what the fear of God had never taught him—that men were something more than fighting animals, made to kill each other for the pleasure of princes or of priests. While writing despatches with his daughter, the only being upon earth he loved, illness suddenly struck the aged despot to the ground, and after lying insensible for several hours, his physicians had the courage to tell him that the disease under which he was suffering was incurable, and that his days were numbered. The effect of this announcement was instantaneous. All the untameable pride and haughtiness of Philip seemed to give way at the moment; and he who but a short time before had scorned the idea of even treating with his rebellious subjects in the Netherlands, as well as with the Bearnese ruler of France, humbled himself so far as to go begging for peace. To the infinite astonishment of Henry IV., a special envoy appeared before him, just as he was besieging Amiens, which the Spaniards had taken by surprise, offering peace on terms to be dictated by himself. Henry loved his subjects too dearly not to be delighted by the proposal; however, his feeling of honour forbade his entering into negotiations without his allies, and he therefore replied to the Spanish envoy that he was quite willing to make peace provided he was joined by the governments of England and of the Netherlands. To obtain Elizabeth's consent and co-operation, the king forthwith despatched to her a special ambassador, in the person of Baron du Plessis Mornai, one of the leading Huguenot statesmen. The baron was warmly received by Burleigh, whose delight at the prospect of a general and enduring peace was not less than that of the kind-hearted monarch of France. There seemed little difficulty in arranging matters with Henry's envoy, when all at once Essex, just appointed earl marshal, and in renewed favour with the queen, made the weight of his influence felt. He loudly protested in the privy council against peace being concluded with Philip, and kept talking about battles and glory till Burleigh thought it time to correct him. The aged lord treasurer quietly drew a prayer-book from his pocket, and pointing with his finger to the last verse of the fifty-fifth psalm: "Men of blood shall not live out half their days," laid it before the passionate favourite. The words were prophetic, though Essex knew it not.

Baron du Plessis Mornai was only partly successful in his mission to make Elizabeth join in the general peace about to be concluded. The influence of Essex, and of the war party which he was heading, was sufficient to keep her from joining Henry heartily; and all that she could be made to promise was that she would send an ambassador to take part in the negotiations for peace. In the choice of the ambassador Burleigh obtained what he believed to be an advantage, by having his son, the secretary of state, appointed for the important post. Sir Robert Cecil took his departure towards the end of February, 1598, to join the Spanish, French, and Dutch plenipotentiaries, who had met at Vervins, in Picardy, to draw up the peace treaty. But most desirous though he was to get England included in the treaty, his efforts were ineffectual, the queen, guided by Essex, laying down the most preposterous conditions. By her order, he had soon after to quit Vervins, drawing the Dutch envoys with him, and leaving Henry to conclude peace for himself. There was no difficulty as to terms, and on the 2nd of May, the representatives of King Philip signed a treaty stipulating the acknowledgment of Henry as king of France, and the restoration of all the towns taken during the war, including Calais. A long series of victories could not have given Henry more favourable conditions than these; nevertheless, the very eagerness of the king of Spain to conclude peace created distrust among the Huguenots, who doubted his death-bed repentance, and continued detesting him, calling him "the demon of the south." To restore confidence among his old friends, and show them that there was no secret understanding between him and "the demon," Henry proclaimed, previous to the signature of the treaty of Vervins, on the 15th of April, 1598, a decree of religious tolerance, celebrated for generations as the Edict of Nantes. "Now that it pleases God to vouchsafe to us the prospect of peace," the preamble of the edict commenced, "we deem we cannot better express our thanks than by providing laws securing the worship of His holy name by all our subjects; so that, until the time when it may please Him to let all men pray in one creed and under one form of religion, they may not hate and persecute each other for seeking the same high object in different ways." Next to the Reformation itself, the sixteenth century world had produced nothing so exalted as this noble law of tolerance, issued by Henry the Great.

The exclusion of England from the treaty of Vervins caused deep disappointment to Burleigh, venting itself in openly-expressed omity of Essex. The latter was boastfully proud of the victory achieved in this instance, and lost no occasion to return the hostility shown by the lord treasurer and his son, so that before long the war of factions around the throne was raging more fiercely than ever. In the prolongation of this struggle Essex was no match for the two Cecils, as he had to find before many months were over. The great subject of discussion in the privy council, during the whole of the spring of 1598, while Philip II. was burying his sword and Henry IV. was proclaiming universal toleration, was the state of Ireland. The chronic malady of rebellion which had prevailed for generations in Ireland, making it a nominal more than a real appendage of the English crown, had become so terrible as to render some sort of action indispensable, leaving little more than the choice between giving up the country altogether, or restoring order at the point of the sword. To the constant fights between the native chieftains, who kept devouring each other, ignoring altogether the existence of a distant king or queen, there had been added of late attacks upon the small territory known as the Pale, occupied by English troops, and which formed the only portion of Ireland over which the government of Elizabeth exerted actual sway. Even this was disputed now by Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, a chieftain risen to power by swallowing some dozen of his brethren, and who dreamt of making himself lord of the whole island, with the help of the pope and the king of Spain. To submit having terms dictated to her by this breechless hero was too much for the proud spirit of Elizabeth, and after taking the advice of the privy council, she determined to send sufficient forces into Ireland to punish Tyrone, so as to reconquer at least the nominal sovereignty of the country. On the recommendation of Burleigh, Sir William Knollys, an experienced old soldier, was nominated to the command-in-chief of the troops; and all seemed on the point of being arranged, when the earl of Essex lifted his voice against the appointment at a meeting of the council held in June, 1598, and presided over by the queen. He insisted, in a very haughty manner, that the nomination of Sir William Knollys should be cancelled, and that one of his friends, Sir George Carew, should be appointed in his stead. This led to an altercation, in which Elizabeth took part, and words grew hot, until Essex, entirely forgetful of the respect due to his royal mistress, jumped from his seat and turned his back upon her with an expression of contempt. Her three score years did not prevent the infuriated queen from instantly punishing the insult. With a "God's death! Go and be hanged!" she rushed upon Essex, treating him to a hearty box on the ear, in good schoolboy fashion. To see the aged queen thus attack her tall lover was excessively droll; but unfortunately the favourite wanted the sense of humour necessary to appreciate the ludicrousness of the action, and instead of kissing the thin fingers that had touched him, he stamped his foot and grasped the hilt of his sword. Several members of the privy council, the high admiral among them, instantly threw themselves forward to prevent the earl disgracing himself by unsheathing his weapon, and he was hurried from the room, though not before giving vent to some vituperation about "kings in petticoats."

Had any other man but Essex ventured to threaten Elizabeth in the manner he did, his head would have instantly paid for the audacity; him she pardoned, but did not absolve. The scene in the privy council was overlooked the sooner, as the queen had little time to think of the misbehaviour of her pouting favourite, an event of infinitely more importance absorbing her whole attention. In the middle of June, Burleigh fell
